NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AT the moment of going to press the war-cloud hangs over Europe and no one dares to prophesy what may happen before the end of the week. All the efforts of the friends of peace are being directed to a limitation of the conflict between Austria and Serbia to the two combatants immediately concerned. Austria is said to have declared that she has no intention of annexing Servian territory. If this could be regarded as an honourable undertaking in the sight of Europe it might go far to allay Russia's apprehensions, and the conflict would be reduced to punitive measures against Serbia for the faults she has committed against her great neighbour. Meanwhile preparations for war on a gigantic scale are being pushed forward with feverish haste, the people who shout in the streets are drunk with false patriotism, and the pleadings of reason and goodwill have little chance of being heard.

THE prophecies of Mr. Norman Angell are finding a sinister fulfilment after one week of European tension. Everybody has been suddenly plunged into financial anxiety. The prices of food are rising; in many places stock-exchange business is at a standstill; and some serious failures have already been announced. To many people this far-reaching commercial disturbance seems almost the chief evil of war, or at least it is the evil which comes home to them most quickly and acutely. But it is well to remember that it is even more fatal to our moral equilibrium. The mad frenzy of a city crowd shouting for the triumph of their arms—the fierce hatreds which spring up against another nation because in the artificial arrangements of European diplomacy it happens to be on the other side—the creed that whatever happens “our country can do no wrong,” these things paralyse moral insight and reduce religion to the bombastic phrases about the Almighty which adorn military manifestoes. Nothing reveals more sharply how easily the Christian creed is held by masses of men, how little there is in it of the spirit of Christ.

It seems like a master stroke of irony that the final programme of the Twenty-first Universal Peace Congress to be held in Vienna from September 15 to 19, should have reached us this week. Many of the subjects—“The economic reactions of armaments upon commerce and industry,” “The reduction of armaments,” “Parliamentary government and foreign policy”—have suddenly become strangely remote. But the friends of peace must recognise that the day of discouragement is not one for timidity or silence. If the Congress must be abandoned there is all the more need for the propaganda of private conversation and personal influence, and this will require far more moral courage and clear conviction than membership of a congress which was to include a reception by the Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs and a gala performance at the opera.

THE sanguinary conflict between the military and an angry but defenceless crowd in the streets of Dublin last Sunday has sent a thrill of horror through men of all political parties. The question of responsibility for an action which is unworthy of the traditions of the British army is to be the subject of inquiry; but the whole affair reveals in a flashlight the extent to which Ireland is still under military rule, and the passion of resentment which military rule almost inevitably engenders. Meanwhile we hope that those who have suffered in this horrible tragedy will feel a wave of sympathy with them in their sorrow from all parts of these islands. Here we transcend all differences of political belief. It is a matter of common humanity.

WE should like to advise our readers to procure Sir Horace Plunkett's pamphlet on the Irish question, “A Better Way.” It is not only a brilliant piece of political writing, it is instinct with the spirit of lofty patriotism and goodwill, and may be read with profit by men of all parties. No Irishman of this generation has a more intimate understanding of the problems of Irish life than Sir Horace Plunkett, and certainly none has served his country with a more single-minded devotion. On the religious difficulty, which has monopolised a good deal of public attention, he takes the hopeful view, which we have more than once supported in these columns. Dealing with the fear of oppression of Protestants by Catholics and the tyranny of a priestly caste, he writes :—

“It is strange but true that many devout Catholics fear that it [i.e. Home Rule] will lead to anti-clericalism and to attacks on their Church similar to those which have taken place on the Continent. I believe both these fears to be unfounded. Protestants who live among the Catholic population in the South of Ireland, and observe their tolerance and their devotion to their Church, do not expect that a political change will destroy either of these characteristics. Such cases of intolerance as are cited are usually found—if true—to have a social or political and not a religious basis.”

“CONSIDERING both the example of other countries and the peculiar circumstances of Ireland," he continues, "I anticipate that under Home Rule the people will retain their faith and the Catholic Church all its legitimate influence. But Catholic laymen throughout Ireland will be led by their new political duties to draw distinctions between the ecclesiastical and political spheres which they do not at present recognise. They will thus gradually relieve the priesthood of a class of responsibilities from which all the more judicious priests will be very glad to escape. It must be remembered that the Irish Catholic priests took no part in politics until they were brought in by O'Connell to assist in the fight for Emancipation, and that the Land War and the struggles for Home Rule have forced many of them into a position of political leadership for which their training has in no way fitted them. They were compelled to lead the people in the direction in which the people wished to go, or else be cast aside. It is no wonder if some of them, sympathising as they necessarily did with the ideas of the class to which they belonged, acted in a manner unfitting the priestly character. They will not be too harshly condemned by any fair-minded Protestant who reflects upon the part which the clergy of his own faith have felt it their duty to play in recent events."

THE trial and acquittal of Madame Caillaux on the charge of murdering M. Calmette must have filled most English people with amazement. The main facts of the case were not in dispute. She shot the editor of the Figaro, but on the ground of extreme provocation the law refuses to take any notice of her crime. Probably she owes this strange result to the fact that she is a woman. Had she been a man there might have been a duel and honour would have been satisfied; but for a woman there was only the furtive method of assassination. If this is the way things are done in France we have all the more reason to be satisfied that our moral judgment is no longer at the mercy of a private code of vengeance. Duelling is a relic of barbarism, but so long as it is allowed it is bound to create serious sentimental disturbances in the administration of criminal justice.

THERE seems to be no reasonable doubt that terrible atrocities have been committed by wandering bands of Greek soldiers in Southern Albania. It is said that in some places the Albanians have killed their own wives and children to prevent them falling into the hands of the Greeks. A question was asked on the subject in the House of Lords on Monday with a view to some measure of protection being extended to the people, as has been done in Northern Albania. Lord Morley's reply was extraordinarily cold and unsympathetic, and we are not surprised at the almost passionate tone of Lord Loreburn's retort. Recognising that here was a part of the world for which we had a certain amount of responsibility, he pleaded that the miseries of these people really concerned our own Government. Nobody, he pointed out, would desire to press the Government unduly, but he did not think what Lord Morley said was adequate. He had said that we should not be averse if any other Power was willing to come forward in a fair spirit. Could he not extend that by saying that we should be willing to assist if other Powers would share the task? To this Lord Morley replied that he was willing to suggest that to Sir Edward Grey, but he was not sure that he should back it. Lord Loreburn thereupon expressed his great regret at what he called "such a decadent answer."

THE Westminster Gazette has given some interesting particulars of the work of the New Zealand Society for the Health of Women and Children. The Society, which is largely officered by women, has for its aims:—

(1) To acquire accurate information and knowledge on matters affecting the health of women and children, and to disseminate such knowledge, through the agency of its members, nurses and others, and the use of such agencies as periodical meetings at members' houses, demonstrations, lectures, correspondence, newspaper articles, pamphlets, books, &c.

(2) To employ specially trained and qualified nurses, whose duty it is to give sound reliable instruction, advice, and assistance on matters affecting the health of women and children, and also to endeavour to educate and help parents and others in a practical way in domestic hygiene in general.

(3) To promote legislative reform in matters pertaining to the health of women and children.

The work of the Society is supervised by the Government, which makes a grant towards its work of £1 4s. for every £1 raised by voluntary subscriptions. The best tribute to the value of its work is the reduction in the infant death-rate in recent years. In Dunedin in 1900-7 the average death-rate per 100 births was 8. In 1912-13 it had sunk to 3.8. The percentage in London in 1912 was 9.1, and in New York 10.5.

THE following paragraph, which appeared in the Manchester Guardian on Wednesday, is an interesting commentary upon these facts:—

"An extraordinary attempt to ban a poster seems to have been made by the chief bill posters of London—or to have been somehow imposed upon them. The International Women's Suffrage Alliance have a poster designed by Mr. Willy Pogany, an artist of repute, to symbolise the effectiveness of the vote to reduce infantile mortality. It represents a woman warding off an attack of Death upon her infant. A broken chain symbolises that she is free to do so with all her powers. Arrangements were made to have the bill posted on the Underground stations. A number of the bills were actually put up, but later they were all taken down, and the publicity firms refuse to go on with the work, their only explanation being that objections had been made as the picture was of a controversial character. The Alliance were told to-day that the ban applies to all the six Underground railways, and also to the public hoardings. This is amazing. "Controversial" posters are common on the Underground. The anti-vivisectionists' poster showing a dog begging for its life before a surgeon—a poster which has provoked more bitter feeling than any, apart from politics—has been shown in most of the "Tube" lifts, and the religious texts in the same places are open to the keenest controversy. The suffrage poster in question has nothing to do with violence, and is only a striking and sensible plea for the vote. Who is responsible for this amazing ban?"

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN made an excellent speech at the prize-giving of the Manchester Grammar School on Monday. He warned the boys against the ideal of having a "good time." They were in the world to live a truthful, a strenuous, and, above all, a good life. The love of excitement, he maintained, was at the root of all forms of unhealthy sport. It was an exciting thing to see two men knock each other about. That was why idle ladies as well as idle rich men in London and elsewhere found a passionate delight in watching a fight. We wanted excitement, antagonism, conflict. We came into the world for these things. We were not the right sort of people if we did not want some struggle and conflict in life. But let us seek, not in unhealthy forms of sport, but in the common work of everyday life, the opportunities for excitement and for joining in a tussle of war. In every city and town was there not a party of right and a party of wrong? Were there not sinister interests to confront, and evil tendencies to oppose? Were there not in the great arena of public and national life causes worth espousing? Was it not worth while to champion the weak against the strong; to be on the side of enlightenment, liberty, purity, and truth? If we espoused what we believed to be the right we should have plenty of opposition and fighting. He did not envy the youth who failed to enter with some zest and confident hope into the struggle for goodness and for right.

WHAT FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE did for nurses, and for every profession where religion is combined with hard work, was revealed in her biography. But we feel it, with a quickening of the pulse and a heightened sense of vocation, in reading her own words. In compiling a selection from her addresses to probationers and nurses of the Nightingale School at St. Thomas's Hospital, Mrs. VAUGHAN NASH has made us all her debtors. Nothing could illustrate better the remarkable combination in Miss NIGHTINGALE'S mind of practical sagacity with religious fervour. She speaks of religion with a simplicity and directness which have become all too rare. She appeals to religious motives, to the desire to please God, without a trace of self-consciousness. For it must be remembered that these addresses were sent annually to a private meeting of the nurses to convey her affection and to help them to realise the good life in the richest sense of the word. There was no thought of publication. There were certainly no reporters present when they were read. But no confidence is broken after the lapse of years by the gift of their spiritual counsel and their shrewd common-sense to a wide circle of readers. It is only necessary to change a few words here and there to make them suitable to ourselves, whatever our gift and calling may be, for they are human to the core.

There are three qualities in these addresses which will strike the reader at once. The first is the complete confidence of their religious faith. For Miss NIGHTINGALE the reality of God and the spiritual appeal of CHRIST to the deepest instincts of the soul are never for a moment in doubt. She speaks of them in a tone of radiant certainty. The difficulties of faith are for her chiefly moral. She pleads for the spirit of meditation and prayer, for the need of quietness and depth, and above all for strict daily faithfulness to the Divine teaching and guidance. The second quality is the close connection, deeply felt and often expressed, between loving God and the life of activity. It is the best part of religion "to imitate the benevolence of God to man." And so the efficiency and thoroughness demanded by a high standard of duty become aspects of prayer. There is no such thing as standing still. We must try to be learning every day to the last hour of our lives. "When I could no longer learn by nursing others, I would learn by being nursed, by seeing Nurses practise upon me." There are three needful things, she says elsewhere, religious feeling, practical interest, and joy in work. Thirdly, there is here an apostolic plainness of speech. Miss NIGHTINGALE never wraps up her meaning in vague language. Her words must have led, as they were evidently meant to do, to a great deal of candid self-examination and genuine contrition. Like all skilful doctors of the soul, she knew how to probe the weak places of character, and was more concerned to expose and eradicate faults than to find easy excuses for them. For her the very first element for having control over others was to have control over oneself.

But anything in the way of comment upon a book of this kind seems almost an offence. It is so simple, so personal, so intimate. It overflows with spiritual solicitude and affection for the human lives which were committed in a special sense to her guidance and keeping. Let us follow the better way of quotation.

"The world, whether of a Ward or of an Empire, is governed not by many words but by few; though some, especially women, seem to expect to govern by many words—by talk and nothing else. There is scarcely anything which interferes so much with charge over others as rash and inconsiderate talking or as wearing one's thoughts on one's cap. There is scarcely anything which interferes so much with their respect for us as any want of simplicity in us. A person who is always thinking of herself—how she looks, what effect she produces upon others, what others will think or say of her—can scarcely ever hope to have charge of them to any purpose."

"A Sister of ours once remarked this of one of her probationers (who was not a lady in the common sense of the word, but she was the truest gentlewoman in CHRIST'S sense), that she was too refined (most people would have said, to do the indelicate work of the wards, but she said) to see indelicacy in doing the nastiest thing; and so did it all well, without thinking of herself, or that men's eyes were upon her. That is real dignity—the dignity which CHRIST had—on which no man can intrude, yet combined with the greatest gentleness and simplicity of life."

"The poorest, the meanest, the humblest patient may enter into the kingdom of Heaven before the cleverest of us, or the most conceited. For, in another world, many, many of the conditions of this world must be changed. Do we think of this?"

"We have been, almost all of us, taught to pray in the days of our childhood. Is there not something sad and strange in our throwing this aside when most required by us, on the threshold of our active lives? Life is a shallow thing, and more especially Hospital life, without any depth of religion. For it is a matter of simple experience that the best things, the things which seem as if they most would make us feel, become the most hardening if not rightly used."

"We would not always be thinking of death, for 'we must live before we die,' and life, perhaps, is as difficult as death. Yet the thought of a time when we shall have passed out of the sight and memory of men may also help us to live; may assist us in shaking off the load of tempers, jealousies, prejudices, bitternesses, interests which weigh us down; may teach us to rise out of this busy, bustling Hospital world, into the clearer light of God's Kingdom. . . . This is the spirit of prayer, the spirit of conversation or communion with God, which leads us in all our Nursing silently to think of Him, and refer it to Him."

"This is the whole intention of training, education, supervision, superintendence: to give self-control, to train or nurse up in us a higher principle; and when this is attained, you may go your ways safely into the world. But she who nurses, and does not nurse up in herself the 'infant CHRIST,' who should be born again in us every day, is like an empty syringe—it pumps in only wind."

"Prayer is communion or co-operation with God: the expression of a life among his poor and sick and erring ones."

"What is the Christian religion? To be like CHRIST."

"And what is it to be like CHRIST? To be High Church, Low Church, Dissenter, or orthodox? Oh, no. It is: to live for God and have God for our object."

THE PRACTICE OF THE PRESENCE OF GOD.

"It is by the communications that we have with the Infinite that we are to be distinguished from one another," writes Maeterlinck the wise. The saying is one of profound significance. The soul which has climbed the Hill of Difficulty, and set foot upon the towering peaks of the spirit, has a final standard by which it tests those who claim experience of the spiritual life, the extent of their knowledge, and the depth of the sense of consciousness which they possess of the Presence of God.

It may be argued that dogmatism upon such a subject is impossible; and, indeed, to those uninitiated into spiritual mysteries it doubtless appears a question of pure conjecture; at best, one entirely regulated by the varying states of the emotions. Nevertheless, such sceptics are, at the outset, confronted by the testimony of spiritual seekers of all times; a weight of evidence which it is futile to gainsay or ignore. The fact of the possibility of living a life in direct communion with God is not one which can be dismissed in a word as wild hyperbole or hysterical credulity. It is a gift which the world can neither bestow upon, nor of which it can rob, the possessor; a treasure of such indescribable value and beauty, that men and women have ever been content to count gain but loss in order to obtain it.

The "spiritual" is hard to define. For purposes of speech the term may be used as synonymous with all that elevates, ennobles, and beautifies the life of man. It would be impossible to class such things in any other category. Life is a process of evolution, and every product of man's aspirations and endeavour which inspires and stimulates human existence, urging men towards further and finer achievement, must truly be termed "spiritual." The artist, the writer, the musician, all these agents of God, are contributing to the great aggregate of divine power and revelation. It is impossible to relegate to the realm of the secular, or to define as alone "spiritual" that which, in orthodox phraseology is termed "religious." All life is one, expressing itself under varying forms; the manifestations of the spirit are numberless, given to each man, according to his capacity, "to profit withal." Yet there is one aspect of spirituality which may be considered as the topmost pinnacle of divine consciousness; that experience known to mystics as the Practice of the Presence of God.

No wonder that initiates of all religions have sought to hide their mysteries from the rude stare of the world, realising that none can hope to understand, save by experience. Knowledge of this particular form of spiritual consciousness can never be learned secondhand. "My secret to myself," says the mystic. Such profound secrets are not communicable, except to the few. "Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven," said the Christian Master to his disciples, "but unto them (unto the worldly) it is not given." In order to understand the deep things of the spirit, the soul must enter alone the Holy of Holies, and stand, naked and not ashamed, face to face with God himself.

The Practice of the Presence of God is no mere vague term of religious phraseology. It stands for a definite experience, common to all those who have, in any degree, attained to the sense of the abiding consciousness of God within the soul. Not content with a belief, whether of head or heart, in the Divine spirit, they have craved for a further revelation, seeking by concentration of mind, ardent longing of the heart, and prayer, to gain direct contact with the Father; to live in a constant and ever deepening sense of His abiding Presence.

This effort on the part of the soul, is answered by a corresponding advancement of the spirit, producing a glow and warmth of spirituality which stirs and vivifies the whole being of the seeker. Filled and encompassed by the Divine Indweller, there wells up within him a fountain of peace which passeth understanding. He ceases to be disturbed by sorrow or fear. Anxieties are laid to rest. Dissatisfied longings are soothed. God is felt within, sustaining, possessing the soul, which becomes united to Him in complete at-onement. The Christ is born anew.

Those to whom this profound revelation has been vouchsafed are easily recognised. By their very presence they create an atmosphere from which sadness and gloom are dispelled. A radiance from within lights up the countenance. The consciousness of God fills the soul with a glory which the face reflects.

The initiates into this mystery are not confined to any one creed or church. Where the ardent, desiring soul is, there is God. Those who seek shall find. As a man enters the state of God consciousness, and realises within him the Presence of the Divine, he attaches less and less importance to outward observances and forms of worship. Such a one, basking in the warmth of the spirit, may feel no call to set times for prayer, for he becomes aware that, "a little lifting up of the heart suffices, a little remembrance of God, one act of inward worship. And a soul truly possessed by God is constantly turning towards Him in acts of loving remembrance." Yet the desire for an outward expression of his devotion may often bring a man to his knees. While not despising the means of grace, he ceases to consider them of the first importance, for his whole life is "hid with Christ in God."

The Practice of the Presence is no matter for argument or intellectual reasoning. Oftentimes it is the unlearned and ignorant in whom the consciousness is most vivid, while to those who are merely scholars, these things seem but foolishness. In order to enter the secret realm of the spiritual life, the heart must become as the heart of a little child, for, as Emerson says, "a man's talents often stand in the way of his advancement in truth."

In the forefront of those who have attained to a complete and supreme consciousness of God, is Brother Lawrence, the humble member of a Carmelite fraternity, and the writer of that truly inspired little manual of devotion, "The Practice of the Presence of God." "Poor, and of no reputation," he may well be classed as a prince among the saints. He has bequeathed to spiritual seekers the record and example of a life lived in daily, hourly communion with the Father. In spite of uncongenial surroundings and distasteful tasks, he nevertheless attained to heights of spiritual consciousness which few have surpassed. "The Practice of the Presence of God" is the outpouring of the experiences of a devout, spirit-filled soul, deprived of all that to most men makes life sweet, finding his highest bliss and absorbing peace in a constant realisation of the God within him. Than it, there is surely no holier register of the high tide of a spiritual life, lived, not in the calm of the cloister, but in the bustle and distraction of a kitchen. For he was cook to the brethren of the Carmélites Déchaussés. "The time of business," he writes, "does not, with me, differ from the time of prayer, and in the noise and chatter of my kitchen, while several persons are at the same time calling for different things, I possess God in as great tranquillity as if I were upon my knees at the Blessed Sacrament."

He would have us remember that spiritual consciousness depends upon recollection and recalling of the mind from wandering thoughts, not upon the conditions of life being such as we would desire. "Let it be your business to keep your mind in the Presence of the Lord. If it sometimes wanders, and withdraws itself from Him, do not much disquiet yourself for that; trouble and disquiet serve rather to distract than to recall the mind; the will must bring it back in tranquillity; if you persevere with your whole strength, God will have pity on you."

An entire dependence upon God for joy, for consolation, for reward, is the sublime teaching of this book. It reveals a life lived in the Presence and Power of the Divine spirit, in constant communion with the Father. It points to every seeker the way of possible attainment of the same ideal state of life, independent of any earthly satisfaction. The only condition is the ardent desire, the direction of the will and the love towards the highest. "Where our treasure is, there will our heart be also." "In His Presence is the fullness of joy."

THE PENDULUM.

"The Ever-Womanly draws us onwards and upwards."—GOETHE'S "Faust."

LITTLE Andreas sat beside his great-uncle, Skipper Hendrik Jansen, in the church at Rye. It was a hot summer afternoon, and the preacher's voice sounded to Andreas like the hum of a sleepy bee that had got inside the church, and could not get out again. He was not listening. His eyes were fixed on the great pendulum that hung down inside the southern porch, and he was trying to count how many words went to each of the times it swung slowly to and fro. When the preacher let his voice sink, he could hear the clock tick; when it was louder, he had to imagine it. The rising and falling of the voice reminded him of the bee, and he seemed to see it, large and sleepy, flying round the church in a surplice and white tie. This idea made him laugh, so that Uncle Hendrik touched his shoulder, looking very much displeased. Andreas wondered whether the end of the world would come, since he had been so very, very naughty as to laugh in church. How dreadful if it did, and he had no time to be better! He became very serious, and tried to think of what the clergyman was saying. But he was preaching about forgiving one's enemies, and as Andreas had no enemies yet, his attention soon wandered. He tried to find out what seventy-times seven made, and was pleased to discover that though he couldn't multiply it like that, yet, by turning it the other way, he could do it quite easily. "Seventy-times seven, seventy-times seven," the pendulum seemed to say, and Andreas wondered how many times over in the day it ticked four hundred and ninety times. He thought next about Time; what a strange thing it was, since it could, as it were, be both heard and seen when the pendulum measured off a little piece of it like this, yet generally it was silently all round one in the world, and slipped away without one's knowing, so that he was always being scolded for not having done his sums or his copy by the right time. He wondered whether, if everybody were out of the church, and there were no other sound, he would be able to talk with the angel who held the pendulum (Andreas was sure there was an angel), and ask him exactly what Time was. He grew quite excited by this idea, and did not notice that the sermon had come to an end, so that his uncle had to touch his sleeve, and he scrambled to his feet, rummaging in his pocket for twopence for the offertory. He hoped in a dim kind of way that this would make amends for his being such a bad boy to-day.

He glanced timidly at his uncle's face, and saw that it was looking very stern. As they left the church, Uncle Hendrik grasping Andreas' hand firmly, as if there were no saying what he might do if left to his own devices, the great pendulum, under which they passed, looked like an accusing eye to Andreas, and he wished more than ever that he might be in the church alone, as then he knew he could explain to the angel that he didn't really mean any harm. At last he summoned up courage to speak.

"Uncle," he said, "do leave me behind in the church."

"Ay, to be skeered wi' boggats," said the old man grimly. "It's no more nor what ye deserve, ye young limb. But your mother were my niece, so she were, though she were flighty an' well-nigh fey, to my thinkin', an' I promised her as I'd see arter you when your poor feyther went down on the lifeboat, and she near her end with your little sister what didn't live."

"Is Mother an angel, Uncle Hendrik?" said Andreas; then, without waiting for a reply, his face lighting up with excitement, he exclaimed, "Perhaps she's the pendulum angel! O, do let me stay!"

"Loose hold o' me, youngster, or I'll smack your head!" said Uncle Hendrik sharply. "My rheumatics is that bad."

"Does God send rheumatics?" asked Andreas.

"God sends old age, and that brings them, as ye'll know yourself some time," growled the old man.

"Old age comes from Time, doesn't it, Uncle?" asked Andreas timidly and eagerly. "Do you hear it ticking?"

"I think sometimes it comes from the Devil, lad, an' the rheumatics as well."

"O, not the Devil, Uncle!—if it's Time! I'm sure there's an angel holding the pendulum, if you'd only let me run back and look."

"Nay, I want yer arm. Who's yon on 'tother side the way? My eyes ain't so good as they used to was."

The old man and child were now opposite the Mermaid Inn, and across the narrow cobbled street they saw another old bent figure of a man, apparently belonging to a wealthier class than Skipper Hendrik. He wore a light grey suit and a white wide-awake with a black band, and he leant on a polished ebony stick.

"It's Squire Fleming, Uncle," said Andreas.

"Devil take him," muttered the old sailor. "Come along, youngster. Squire Fleming and me don't want no words together; we've had 'em once for all, and he won't forget the way I cursed him neither, when he let the old house over my head to that stranger chap from Maidstone, just because he'd got his pocket better lined wi' gold nor mine!"

"Is the Squire your enemy, Uncle?" asked Andreas in an awe-struck voice.

"Enemy? What need ye for to ask?" The old man hastened his pace over the cobbles, digging his ash stick into the spaces between them. "Sometimes I think, Andy, you're a bit of a 'natural' like your poor mother before you."

"O, Uncle," said Andreas, "I was only wondering whether you'd counted up to 490 by this time!"

"Are ye daft, lad? Whatever do you mean?"

"Because the Bible says we're to forgive our enemies seventy-times seven, and you've known the Squire such a lot of years, haven't you, Uncle?"

"I'm darned if I'll forgive him!" said the old man in a loud harsh voice. "Some things as the Bible says is only po'try; they goes contrary to flesh an' blood. Come along, lad, I wants a cup o' tea."

They quickened their pace, and no further talk passed between them, except that Andreas heard his uncle now and then mutter under his breath, or groan when the rheumatism gave him a sharper twinge than usual. But the boy was off again in a dream-world of his own, and only awoke to reality when they reached the tiny cottage close to the old ramparts overlooking the sea, and Neptune, the red setter, came to welcome them with volleys of barks. The old man threatened him with the ash stick to keep him off his rheumatic arm, but Andreas hugged the dog, and then ran on to the cottage to get tea ready. There were only two rooms in the cottage—a kitchen and a bedroom, where Andreas slept with his great-uncle. There was a very small paved yard at the back with a narrow strip of soil round it, and here a few scarlet-runners were growing. Uncle Hendrik's old house had been a four-roomed cottage with a garden, and one of his grievances against Squire Fleming had been that he now had to walk half a mile to a little allotment which he had hired as a garden, where he grew cabbages and potatoes. Another grievance, less easy to express, was the fact that the twenty years of his married life had been spent in the cottage; that his wife had died there, and that together they had there mourned the death of their only son, lost in a cod-fishing expedition to the North Sea. Elizabeth did not long survive the grief, and after about a year of loneliness, old Hendrik took Andreas to live with him. Their ejection from the cottage followed soon after, the Squire having found a desirable tenant willing to pay a higher rent, and, no doubt, thinking that an old man and a boy could make shift with less space than a married couple.

Andreas was happy as the day was long in the little house, though he never forgot his great-uncle's terrible anger with the Squire. He had such a sunny nature himself that he did not understand anything of the darker side of life, but some instinct told him that the old man was often deeply unhappy, and that he must do his best to take the place of those who were gone.

He began now to lay the tea on the small round deal table near the window, getting out the real china teapot which Uncle Hendrik had brought from Pekin, and which was only used on a Sunday, first laying a cloth which had been Elizabeth's work. It had a motto embroidered in blue and red, and the motto was Dutch, out of compliment to Hendrik's forefathers, who, like those of many of the Rye folk, had been Dutch skippers. Hendrik meanwhile watched the kettle, which had been simmering on the fire during their absence at church, feeling his late anger and pain somewhat soothed by the prospect of tea, and by watching the quick, tidy way in which Andreas got it ready. Though so fond of dreaming, he was very neat with his hands, and, though this would have made him all the better sailor, old Hendrik, after a struggle of mind, had decided to apprentice him to a joiner when he left school, feeling that the sea had claimed victims enough in his family, and that Andreas was the last of his line.

"Here, Handy Andy, th' kettle's on the boil; come an' take it; I canna lift it myself."

"Just let me give you a rub with the turpentine after tea, Uncle," said Andreas. "It always does you good."

"Well, mayhap I will. It's rare stuff for the rheumatics."

They ate their tea in silence, except for old Hendrik's remarks to the dog, who always begged for a bit of the Sunday seed-cake, but was only given fragments of the tough sea-biscuit that the old man still liked to have on his table. When they had finished, he drew his elbow-chair to the back door, and laying an old spotted handkerchief over his head and eyes, he soon dropped off to sleep. An occasional humble-bee floundered about among the scarlet runners; or a white butterfly, snapped at by Neptune, flitted across the little yard. Inside the cottage, Andreas made a faint clatter, washing up the tea things, but he was as quiet as he could be, for he knew that his uncle always felt better after a good sleep. The slanting rays of the sun enveloped the old man in a wholesome sense of warmth and peace, and, as he slept, he had a dream.

He thought he was in the old church, and was standing under the pendulum, and looking up into the tower as Andreas had wanted to do. And there, sure enough, he saw that the pendulum was being held up by someone with an indescribably beautiful face, lit by a light which was not that of the sun nor of the moon. Was it an angel? Was it his own Elizabeth? or his mother long dead? or Andreas's poor, pretty, young mother, her face all joyous tenderness as it used to be when she looked at her little son? He could not tell who it was; he only knew that it filled him with extraordinary happiness to look into that face. The angel—if so it was—swayed the pendulum slowly from side to side, and, as it swayed, it seemed to say, instead of its usual ticking—or, rather, mixed up with it in a way that seemed perfectly natural:—

"Time is Love—Time is Love," and, now and then; "Love is God." And at the same time, yet heard distinctly through the other words, it said, "Seventy-times seven."

And then Hendrik noticed that Squire Fleming was standing beside him, in a fustian coat and trousers and thick boots, just like his own, and that he was also looking up at the Angel of the Pendulum. And Hendrik heard him exclaim in a tone of the utmost surprise and joy, "Mary!" and his face was the face of a happy young man. And somehow Hendrik never thought of forgiving him; he felt that he was just a comrade, sharing in the same kind of joy and sorrow. His whole heart went out to the Squire, and he wanted to grip his hand, but at that moment he awoke. Andreas was teaching Neptune to do "Trust," and a sudden yelp of excitement may have been the cause of Uncle Hendrik's awakening. But his dream remained with him, and Andreas wondered at his happy look.

"You're better, aren't you, Uncle?" he said. "Shall I rub you now?"

"Nay, lad, there baint no need—'cept that I likes to feel your hands on me. Ay, come on, rub me a bit. I've had a rare dream. Thee was right, Andy, about th' old pendulum. There's an angel, sure enough, at 'tother end of it."

"Oh, uncle, do tell me!" exclaimed Andreas, his eyes shining with excitement.

"Nay, my lad, I can't tell thee nor nobody. Whether 'twere an angel, or my old woman, or your poor mother, or Squire Fleming's young missus what died, I can't rightly say. But when I see'd that face, and heered what the pendulum seemed to be saying, I know'd all at once as there were nobbut the matter wi' Time, or Old Age, or any of us what be bothered with 'em. 'Twere just as if a fust-rate Captain were heading the ship for harbour, spite of foul weather, and one hadn't any call to worry. Thank ye, Andy, my boy, the pain be powerful better, and I want ye just to step round to Squire Fleming's this evening with the stuff, and say I'll be main glad if he'll try it, for I've noticed as his rheumatics is main bad. And he's a lonesome old chap, too; he ain't got no handy lad wi' him. Ye needn't say who it comes from unless he asks, but if he do, why, I've no call to be ashamed on't."

Andreas threw his arms round his uncle's neck, and then rushed off to find a bit of paper to wrap the bottle in. He was somehow too happy to speak a word. Uncle Hendrik lit his pipe and began to stroll towards his little garden. He leant on his stick, but he somehow felt as if his wife were beside him again, and they were walking arm in arm as they used to do on Sunday evenings, and as the bells of the old church began to ring for the evening service, they seemed to say, "Time is Love—Time is Love," and Uncle Hendrik was very happy, though a tear rolled down his wrinkled face.

"Seems like as if the dream ought to ha' been sent to the little feller instead o' to a cross old chap like me," he muttered to himself. "But the Lord knows His business, and mayhap it'll steer me through the rough water into port."

THE DROUGHT.

ONE morning during a long spell of dry weather, a man was walking in his garden and wondering at the beauty and vitality of the plants. Presently he stopped before a rose-bush in full bloom, and speaking his thoughts as though to the tree, said, "I cannot imagine how you can flourish as you do, your branches laden with glorious crimson flowers, while for the last eight or nine weeks there has not been a drop of rain. Are you not famished for want of water?"

The rose-bush replied, "And yet you, too, flourish and bloom without rain. For, though you seem not to be blessed with great wealth and substance, or with people to work for you, I sometimes hear you laughing and singing; you must have live thoughts and feelings in you which make you happy. Is it not because the Great Life is beneath you and is always ascending through your soul within until it breaks forth into a kind of blossom? So it is with us. When the rain falls not from without to sustain us there arise from the deep hidden fountains of the earth, which are never dry, streams of moisture which no eye can see, but which fail not to find our far-searching roots."

THE BLUE BUTTERFLY.

It is a very old church. Outside it is crusted with lichen and cushioned with moss, and the tower is enveloped in ivy. In the spring-time the great elm trees standing round the graveyard, a solemn guard, smother it as with confetti at a wedding with their winged but barren seeds. In the autumn they empty their armfuls of dead gold over its roof. This quick, azure-domed summer morning I pass through the open porch. It is shady and cool within, but the atmosphere is faint and dank, and there are smears of pale green mould upon the walls. Through the narrow lancet window on the south side of the choir streams the sunlight. Something flutters against the glass in the bright light. I step forward to see what it is. Lo! a small blue butterfly entangled in a cobweb. Having drifted into the church it had flown straight to the light to escape; but instead of reaching freedom and joy it is now a helpless captive.

I carefully gather the web about my fingers and carry it out into the sunshine without injuring the frail prisoner. I rest it on a mossy tombstone and gently liberate its exquisite limbs. Now it is free. Will it understand? It remains motionless with wings closed—opens and closes them again. Now it rises, flutters over my head, and is lost in the light of the blue sky through an opening between the trees.

I wonder if it was a human soul.

"A NEW TYPE OF CHRISTIAN."

SIR,—I had taken pains in my contribution under the above title to your issue of the 18th ult. to make it quite clear that Dr. Fr. W. Foerster had arrived at the conviction that "the Christian religion is the sole foundation for both individual and social life" as the result of being a psychologist, a sociologist, and an educator, and that he challenges his critics to confront him only as such. I am therefore surprised that your correspondent, Mr. Cyril Flower, in your last issue, should have deemed it necessary to remind me that "Unitarianism is a fellowship of religious people who do not accept conclusions on the mere authority of others." Whoever, in his very wildest dreams, imagined that they did! I, of course, claimed for Dr. Foerster no other kind of a hearing and no other kind of authority than the scholar in all fields commands. And the whole purport of my article was to show that a man of the Foerster type has to be met with altogether different arguments from those addressed to the average "babe in Christ."

I am well aware that your correspondent could not in a brief letter deal adequately with such an assertion as that of Dr. Foerster, startling as it is when it claims to be, and is, not "mere authority," but the result of the most thorough psychological experience and aptitude. But I do not, as Mr. Flower holds, think that "the trouble in the matter is largely terminological"; certainly it is not mainly so. And Mr. Flower tells us enough to prove that it is not so with him. The trouble goes far deeper.

of the standpoint of historic Buddhism" as I am with that of the historic Christian Church, writes Mr. Flower, and whether I am accounted Buddhist or Christian—"What does it matter?" What's in a name anyhow? And what, after all, is Christianity? The residuum of Harnack, or of Eucken (in the latter case, according to Mr. Flower, not differing essentially from that of Buddhism!)? The precipitate of Schweitzer when critics of the historic Jesus have done their worst? One might equally reasonably assert—I am quite as much a German as an Englishman (and cite no less eminent scholars on racial questions in support of the contention!), and whether you account me the one or the other—What does it matter? What's in a name? For, after all, when you get to the ultimate residuum of the German and the Englishman—What's the difference? Are they not most obviously as alike as two peas? Of course they are, when you get to the residua! But we are more than residua! And so is Christianity, and so is Buddhism! Indeed we are all skeletons underneath, and the ape, in undress, has a striking resemblance to his human brother! Brothers, let us all call ourselves apes, or skeletons, or that ultimate residuum of all—dust—and avoid henceforth the peril of names! We are all one there. Let us follow Mr. Flower into "the wild" and bleach quietly. The rest will follow!

But it is the life that matters, not the skeleton; the life that differentiates not the dust-particles. And if I want to get at the life of Christianity, I do not go to the residua of Harnack or even of Eucken; I prefer rather to go to the New Testament itself, to Thomas à Kempis, or St. Francis, or possibly even to some Salvationist lad or lass of our own day with the light of the Gospel upon them. Which suggests to us that our criteria of judgment in religious matters are frequently quite false to-day, and that the very A, B, C of the matter has escaped us. We turn naturally to the scholar and not to the saint. We reach down some learned theological tome of passing moment and think we have settled the question. Would it not be well to remind ourselves that the saint would posit such conditions as the following as necessary preliminaries for recognition of religious truth or of religious authority?

(1) A wide and deep experience and knowledge of life from the very pages of life itself.

(2) An almost limitless self-control and self-mastery such as enabled Christ to say—"I have overcome the world," or such as the ancient world required as a preliminary of all philosophic study only entered upon after the severest course of ascetic self-discipline.

(3) An utter preparedness to follow Truth at all costs, even of life itself.

If those who speak loudest to-day, whether as Theists or Christians, or in whatever other capacity, would subject themselves first of all to these inexorable conditions, they would speak either with more conviction or else with a greater humility, and would awaken the ears of the world to a deeper hearing. It is so easy to say, with Mr. Flower, "I am heir of all the ages and all the religions." It is so hard to enter into that heritage.—Yours, &c.,

THE ETHICS OF SELF-DEFENCE.

SIR,—The question raised by Mrs. Du Vallon presents so many difficulties, especially at the present time, and opinions differ so much as to the exact point at which methods of violence, hateful in themselves, become justifiable, and even heroic, that I think more than one article in THE INQUIRER would be necessary to state the whole problem fairly and adequately. And yet, for those who are endeavouring to live in the spirit of Christ's teaching, the way out of all this perplexity ought to be fairly obvious if we had enough faith and courage to take it. The question for Mrs. Du Vallon, as for the rest of us, is simply this:—Where do you draw the line—if you think a line has to be drawn—in following the command to "love your enemies," and "do good" even to those who persecute or illtreat you?

In the long upward ascent towards the great ideal of universal peace to which we are all—theoretically, at least—committed, there are, of course, various stages, and the actions of the individual must inevitably depend upon the position at which he has arrived. Some think that big navies and armies are the best means of ensuring peace because they enable a strong nation to keep the foe at bay by sheer intimidation. Some have reached a point at which it seems as clear as daylight that the increase of armaments is detrimental to progress and social prosperity, and that wars must be prevented because they spell financial disablement for the countries which engage in them. Others realise that the method of settling international disputes as well as personal quarrels by brute force is a relic of barbarism, and morally wrong for enlightened people, though they reluctantly admit that there are times when it must be resorted to for the purpose of defending an oppressed nationality, or preserving a place in the sun for their descendants. And there are those who take a view, regarded even by many earnest pacifists as impracticable and extreme, namely, that the wholesale slaughter of our fellow creatures is never justifiable, and that the only right course for those who believe in human brotherhood is to devote themselves to the gradual improvement of individual character, and the steady, if pitifully slow permeation of the mind of man with the spirit of friendly co-operation, mutual understanding, self-sacrifice, and goodwill. People belonging to this class can scarcely take part in the forcible defence even of their own country, though they may possibly be serving it in countless other ways that will secure its lasting welfare more effectually. Their position in time of war must always be that of non-combatants, striving to maintain an impartial attitude, and free to perform acts of mercy wherever there is suffering, to friend and foe alike, and do all that lies in their power to allay the tigerish passions that are the source of battle and murder and race hatred.

Mrs. Du Vallon is perfectly correct in saying that she is not "all wrong" in wishing to defeat the enemy of her country, so long as she sincerely believes that the victory of her country is the only thing that matters. Indeed, most people would agree that she is entirely "right" and sane in her views, and urge that to plead for due consideration of both sides of the question when the time for mutual restraint and fair dealing is supposed to be at an end, and full rein is given to the fighting instinct so strong in us all, is to show evidence of a dangerous and unnatural state of mind of which no true patriot could ever be accused. Nevertheless, thousands of people whose memory we dare not hold up to scorn have behaved in this way, and if Mrs. Du Vallon were a Quaker, like her ancestors, or had become profoundly convinced of the truth of Tolstoy's interpretation of Christ's teaching in this connection, she would find the question of self-defence no longer perplexing, and realise what it is that we really must do if we would help civilisation to take that "further step" which will enable us to abolish war.—Yours, &c.,

"BOOKS OF LIFE."

SIR,—Having for some years felt the inspiration of George Meredith's philosophy of life, I was delighted to see the tribute paid to it by your correspondent in your issue of the 25th inst.

Surely Meredith's name should be in the van among "the teachers and guides of this and other generations," by reason of the sane and virile philosophy to be found, not only in his poems, but also in his novels. I fear, however, that the chief obstacle to the popularity of his writings is not, as your correspondent hints, the present lack of cheap editions of his works, but more probably lies in the very real obscurity to be found in many of his novels and most of his poetry.

Given a passion for Meredith's writing and ideas, and the difficulties may be met and conquered—but the passion must be there first—and I can well imagine that many a would-be reader has been deterred because he has at first chanced upon one of the more complex novels. If readers began, for instance, with "Evan Harrington," that "most exquisite comedy in the English language," as it has been fitly called, the charm of the book would then lead them gradually on to the difficult novels; but the intricate opening of "Diana" must have scared away many embryo Meredithians.

Knowing by experience that to tackle the "Poems" unaided is a somewhat severe task, may I advise any of your readers to whom they are as yet unknown; but who desire to study them, to do so after reading G. M. Trevelyan's "The Poetry and Philosophy of George Meredith" (Constable), a book which I have found immensely helpful? Particularly stimulating is the contrast the writer makes between Browning's optimism and that of

Meredith—greatly to the advantage of the latter—and his comments on the poems in general, notably the noble "Faith on Trial" mentioned by your correspondent, are most enlightening. Meredith's philosophical mood was what G. M. Trevelyan describes as "a mood of agnosticism wedded to faith," and it is characteristically summed up by the closing lines of his fine little poem "Whither?":

"Then let our faith be firm in good,
Though we be of the fasting,
Our questions are a mortal brood,
Our work is everlasting;
We children of Beneficence
Are in its being sharers,
And "whither" is as vain as "whence"
For word with such wayfarers."

THE VETERAN MINISTER.

SIR,—Reading the J. Ll. Jones story in the last INQUIRER reminds me of another I heard my father relate. It must have referred to an early period in the nineteenth century. I am not sure I can identify the personalities, but I know they left Cardiganshire for the United States, where they settled in a sparsely populated district. Later, a relative thought he would like to join them. He reached the other shore safely. There were no trains then, and he had to push on as best he could. At last he came where he had no choice but to trust to Shanks's pony. After travelling for many hours, he began to fear for himself. He did not know where he was. There might be wild beasts about. He was getting tired and the shades of night were closing around him. What was he to do? When suddenly he heard a voice in the distance, and the word "Proody, Proody Fach!" His heart leaped for joy. "Proody" is the word understood by the cows in Cardiganshire and apparently by these particular cows. It is used by the lasses to summon them home to be milked. There followed a happy reunion—and after that the curtain drops.—Yours, &c.,

R. J. JONES.

THE DECLINE IN PUBLIC WORSHIP.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

Why is it? This is a perennial question coming up as often as the proverbial sea serpent in the silly season. Perhaps the very frequency with which it has been asked blinds us to its tremendous importance. It is a question to which recent experience has given me a clue to a solution, or partial solution, and in regard to which, if a layman may make so bold, I should like to offer a suggestion.

Having recently to spend some little time in London, I visited several churches in company with a friend, a business man. The first we went to was a City church, the building ugly and dull, the service bare and unbeautiful, the congregation small. The sermon was about things not to be believed, controversial, antagonistic, negative. Another experience was much the same. "You get nothing to go on there," said my friend. We tried another. If not quite beautiful, this church had gone several steps in the direction of beauty, and boasted some stained glass windows. There was a tolerably good congregation in the morning, composed, it appeared, of highly respectable folk, with thoughtful, intelligent faces. In the evening, we were told, the place was nearly empty. The service was correct and cold, the minister, a man of attractive personality, discoursed pleasantly on a volume of recently issued ethical philosophy; but when we got outside my friend said, "He isn't a man."

We next went to a church, which, so far as its means permitted, was aesthetically pleasing, the service also. The preacher there divided all men, with a very firm division, into two groups—Idealists, who, it appeared, loved Italy and all things Italian; and Materialists, business men whose interest centred in commercial dealings and in the management of affairs. When we got outside my friend said, "Well! I'm a business man, but I'm not a materialist, and I don't want to go to Italy or to that church again." I wondered how much that preacher, or the others we had heard, knew of life as it is lived to-day in big cities, and I thought of another young minister brought up, almost in seclusion, by a widowed mother, seeing very few friends during his school and college life and those only of the refined, studious type he found congenial. Suppose he went to some church in a big city, what would he know of the business man's temptations in respect of commercial morality, money-making, illicit amours? Or the allurements to young men of the music halls, the streets, joy rides, or the latest in prize fights? Or the temptations to women of the struggle for pre-eminence, the fashion and frivolity, if nothing worse, of social life?

And it occurred to my lay mind that it would be a good thing if, instead of, or rather in addition to, four years of preparation at a theological college, a candidate for the ministry could have a year of "secular" training in some ordinary business or professional life. A year spent at one of the big London establishments, D. H. Evans' or Selfridge's, would teach men something of the world to which they were undertaking to preach. The discipline for them would be splendid, better than hair-shirts, and the savour of their salt, if it was strong enough, would be a fine seasoning for their fellows. Remembering a certain thirty years spent in private, in preparation, they would not grudge the extra time given, and perhaps they would learn that what men want, what congregations want, what the world wants is not to be preached to about Bergson, or Eucken, about theology, literature or art, but about the all-enveloping, ceaseless, kindling, burning, everlasting Love of God."

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

WALTER BAGEHOT.

The Life of Walter Bagehot. By Mrs. Russell Barrington. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 12s. 6d. net.

WE do not believe in hurried biographies. An interval of a few years is often necessary before a man who has been loved ardently by his friends or has played a conspicuous part on the public stage can be seen in true perspective. But in the case of Walter Bagehot the interval has been too long. He died in 1877, and since that date much private information, especially the personal recollections of his friends, has ceased to be available. In these circumstances Mrs. Russell Barrington has had no easy task, and her book must be judged leniently, if here and there it shows signs of vagueness of outline or unnecessary padding. As a critical estimate of Bagehot's powers it gives us little that is new, and indeed relies largely upon the opinions of other people; but as a portrait of character it has the advantage of the intimate touch of one who after his marriage stood within the circle of his home life. From that home life Mrs. Barrington has lifted the veil with a reverent hand, and we think she is more successful in describing the influences which surrounded him in youth and early manhood than in depicting the public activities of his later years. The fact that he was the only child of most devoted parents, the divided religious interests of his home—his father was a Unitarian, his mother an evangelical churchwoman,—his acquaintance from childhood with one of the most mysterious forms of human sorrow, due to his mother's recurring fits of insanity, all these influences imparted a peculiar tinge to his genius and made him something much more than a man of brilliant intellectual gifts. Combined with the rare intimacy of his friendships—among his friends Richard Hutton was facile princeps—they gave him the clear and penetrating insight into human nature which is conspicuous in many of his essays.

"Bagehot's sorrow, I believe," such is his biographer's verdict, "tended to ripen all that was distinguished in his character, and stimulated rather than suppressed his intellectual forces. The necessity of having to face the inevitable, without loophole for hope, to acquiesce in the necessity without flinching; to learn through experience the deeper secrets of life in which mysteries are so closely interwoven with realities, such was the training which ripened very exceptional qualities in a finely wrought nature. Among the fruits of this experience were a dispassionate equilibrium of judgment, a wide sympathy with, and tolerance towards those who are maimed by any of the various evils which befall humanity; above all, a diffidence in asserting that any conclusive methods, any hard or fast theories, can rectify such evils. He knew only too well that human nature is constructed of so delicate and varied a make of machinery that it is useless to generalise as to its treatment; that the mysterious and the unexpected may always crop up to confront and confound any maker of fixed rules."

Bagehot was saved from the conventional influence of the public school followed by Oxford or Cambridge, which stifles originality in so many able Englishmen, by his father's Nonconformity. He breathed the larger air of London, and though University College was lacking in many of the amenities of older foundations its intellectual atmosphere was highly stimulating, and it taught men to be independent, to live plainly and simply and to think for themselves. In a word it supplied educational advantages which may be sought for in vain in the older Universities, with their tradition of convention and conformity. It was here that Bagehot formed some of the most stimulating friendships of his life. Richard Hutton, W. C. Roscoe, and T. Smith Osler were members of the group. Mr. Osler has left the following vivid account of the stimulus, the sense of intellectual excitement which his friends always found in him :—

"As an instrument for arriving at truth, I never knew anything like a talk with Bagehot. It had just the quality which the farmers desiderated in the claret of which they complained that though it was very nice, it brought them 'no forrader'; for Bagehot's conversation did get you forward, and at a most amazing pace. Several ingredients went to this; the foremost was the power of getting to the heart of a subject, taking you miles beyond your starting point in a sentence, generally by dint of sinking to a deeper stratum. The next was his instantaneous appreciation of the bearing of everything you yourself said, making talk with him, as Roscoe once remarked, 'like riding a horse with a perfect mouth.' But most unique of all was his power of keeping up animation without combat. I never knew a power of discussion, of co-operative investigation of truth, to approach to it. It was all stimulus and yet no contest."

It is chiefly as an economist and a political thinker that Bagehot is remembered, though he approached economic and practical affairs with a mind humanised by his passion for literature. He belongs, however, to the Whig tradition with its aristocratic limitations, and there is already something a little archaic in his attitude towards the problems of society. Some discussion by a competent authority of the permanent value of his contribution to the stock of ideas and its power of adaptation to our rapidly changing social conditions would have added greatly to the interest of the book. What, for instance, would his attitude have been to recent legislation like the Insurance Act, or to the new orientation of economic problems suggested by Mr. Graham Wallas's book "The Great Society"? A fuller discussion of his attitude to religion in his later years would also have been welcome. Mrs. Barrington is careful to point out that he never accepted the Unitarian position, but it is clear that while he retained his early religious sensitiveness he had little intellectual sympathy with the steady trend of Hutton's mind towards orthodoxy.

There was a distinctly mystical strain in his character. "There certainly are kinds of truths," he wrote, "borne in as it were instinctively on the human intellect, most influential on the character and the heart, yet hardly capable of stringent statement, difficult to limit by an elaborate definition." But these shadowy truths, these elusive states of feeling, were never allowed to control and dominate his thought. Here, probably, he owed a great deal to the stimulating influence of Martineau. In a letter to Hutton he discusses the origin and authorship of the Gospels in a very suggestive way, which reveals his own inclination to assimilate the study of the New Testament to that of other great literature. This is in accord with his decisive rejection of the textual authority of Scripture as positively harmful to religion.

"There is," he writes, "an intense, anxious story-telling impulse in some states of society which produces of itself wonderful narratives. The authors are as unknown as the authors of old ballads. Such traditions though inaccurate in facts are most sensitive to truth of effect, the latter is their canon of truth in fact. You are to remember that the theory of the historical origin of the Gospels is very recent. The old theory was that they were written by the 'Spirit of God.' I think, or incline to think they were composed by intense, half-inspired, most affectionate story-telling impulse. Of course with this sort of view the question of Christ's nature is simple. Any sort of incarnation requires to be proved by the most close positive historical testimony."

We hope that we may be forgiven if we close this notice on a rather personal note. It must always be a matter of pride to THE INQUIRER that Bagehot began his literary career as a contributor to our columns. It was in 1851 that he wrote the striking series of letters from Paris on the French Coup d'Etat, in which he played the unexpected part of an enthusiastic apologist for Louis Napoleon. Mrs. Barrington says that by means of these letters he escaped "once and for all from what was expected of him in Unitarian circles," oblivious of the fact that as a contributor to the Prospective Review, and later as editor of its successor the National Review he kept in close touch with the intellectual leaders in the Unitarian movement and showed his active sympathy with two journals, which alike in breadth of outlook, in intellectual temper, and in their sources of financial support had much in common with THE INQUIRER. It is a pity that on these matters Mrs. Barrington did not go to more reliable sources of information than an essay by an American Professor, for it has led her into some mistakes and one unfortunate fault of taste. She always mis-spells our name, "Enquirer" instead of "Inquirer." The name of the Rev. John James Tayler appears as Taylor. There is also a reference to him in one of Bagehot's letters, which was certainly never meant for publication, and would, we feel sure, have been omitted if Mrs. Barrington had known enough to realise its unfitnes. These, however, are slight blemishes upon a piece of work which has been carried through in a spirit of loyal affection, and considering the difficulties incident to imperfect records and fading memory with remarkable success.

A PLEA FOR SOCIAL SANITY.

Psychology and Social Sanity. By Hugo Münsterberg, Litt.D., LL.D. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.

THIS may be described not unfairly as a volume of lay-sermons, and when the professional psychologist mounts the pulpit some people will at once tell him to mind his own business. Those who do not agree with some of the views which Professor Münsterberg has expressed in very plain language in these essays will probably take this line of resistance, but we do not think it is valid. Even the psychologist has the rights of the average citizen to form opinions upon social tendencies and dangers, and to advocate them with emotional force; and in some respects his special line of research gives him exceptional qualifications for doing so. The most important and in some respects the most controversial essay in the book deals with the subject of "Sex Education" in a spirit of trenchant opposition to the new demand for plain and outspoken teaching on the subject; but any careful reader can see that a large amount of close observation lies behind these few pages of popular advocacy. Professor Münsterberg's plea is for traditional modesty and reticence as the truest safeguards of virtue. Knowledge imparted in the form of lessons in physiology may, as he points out, lead quite as easily to prudent self-indulgence as to difficult self-control. It is refreshing to find a man of his scientific training full of old-fashioned confidence in the power of religion. "Instead of relying on physical conditions, on fear of diseases, on merely eugenic improvements and on clever reasoning, the reform must come from within, must be one of education and morality; must be controlled, not by bacteriology, but by ethics, must find its strength not from horror of skin diseases, but in the reverence for the ideal values of humanity." The same spirit of critical hostility to modern tendencies, which are often regarded with indulgence if not with positive approval, is seen in the essay which bears the significant title "The Intellectual Underworld." Professor Münsterberg is full of healthy antagonism to every form of quackery which gives a "sham fulfilment to the human longing for knowledge and truth." He selects the ugly term "intellectual prostitution" for the fashionable indulgence in astrology, fortune-telling, and magic, and pleads "no spirit of false tolerance ought any longer to be permitted, when the treacherous danger has become so nation-wide." It is the conditions of American life which he has specially in mind, but the evil has spread to an alarming extent among ourselves. We agree that our habits of easy tolerance ought not to make us blind to the fact that it is the badge of a decadent culture, which has lost its taste for hard thinking, a reversion amid the outward splendours of civilisation to the lowest forms of superstition. Other essays in the volume deal with "The Mind of the Jurymen," "Social Sins in Advertising," "The Mind of the Investor," and "Society and the Dance." Even those who want to enter many a demurrer to Professor Münsterberg's opinions will be wise to forgive his breezy dogmatism for the sake of his success in forcing us to think, and helping us to see familiar problems from new angles of vision. His confidence in the sanity of the slowly garnered experience of the race is a form of conservatism which must make an instant appeal to the religious mind.

ELIZABETHAN LITERATURE. By J. M. Robertson, M.P. Home University Library. London: Williams & Norgate. 1s. net.

THE Home University Library has produced several excellent studies in literature, and Mr. Robertson's volume will take its place with the best. It is free alike from the controversial tone of the athlete of rationalism and the weariness of the over-worked politician who has sought relief in other tasks. If we may judge from the wide and accurate knowledge and the tone of enthusiasm in which the book is written, Mr. Robertson's many-sided mind finds its highest satisfaction in literature. No one in reading these pages could discover that its author was not a teacher of his subject, except possibly for a tone of freshness and enthusiasm in handling familiar themes, which seldom survives the first years of professional study. His treatment of the Elizabethans culminates necessarily in Shakespeare, but the Shakespearean interest is not allowed to dominate the stage, as though no other writers had superlative claims upon our attention in their own right. Some of Mr. Robertson's happiest pages are devoted to Sir Philip Sidney and Spenser. On the latter he avoids the conventional platitudes, which obscure the less admirable qualities in his character and work. Spenser, he pleads, was not a moral force. His social influence was hardening rather than otherwise and he had little power to enlarge men's outlook on life. "But he gave his countrymen of his best, and the gift has ever since been cherished. He made for them a manifold music; and to few is it given to render a more excellent service." There are two excellent chapters on the development of English prose, an art quite as characteristic of the 16th century and as significant for the future as lyrical poetry. Considering the limitations of space, Mr. Robertson has been very successful in avoiding the faults of compression so often found in the old-fashioned primer and in retaining the ease and dignity of his own style. He has also been very happy in his selection of illustrative quotations.

AMONG the announcements of Mr. Murray is a new volume by the late Sir Alfred Lyall to be called STUDIES IN LITERATURE AND HISTORY. The contents will illustrate the author's varied interest in the fields of literature and religion, and will include essays on the Life and Speeches of Sir Henry Maine, English Letter Writers in the XIX. Century, Characteristics of Mr. Swinburne's Poetry, Race and Religion, and the State in its relation to Eastern and Western Religions.

MR. MURRAY will also publish shortly the second volume of THE MAKING OF WESTERN EUROPE, by Mr. C. R. L. Fletcher, which takes the narrative down to 1,400; and a new and cheaper edition of Mrs. Ady's (Julia Cartwright) ISABELLA D'ESTE, a study of the Renaissance.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE STICK AND THE MOUNTAIN.

Do you know that one of the hardest things in climbing a mountain is to come down again? Doesn't that sound nonsense? How can it be as hard to come down a mountain as it is to climb up? Well, once when I was a little boy I had an uncle who lived quite close to some splendid big hills. They were stony hills, and very steep, and there were walls instead of hedges, and rocks instead of trees, so that they were hard rocky hills to climb, and slippery rough hills to come down. We used to enjoy going to stop at my uncle's house, because although he was busy himself all day at other work, he let us run about where we liked, and he only laughed when we tumbled about on the hills and hurt ourselves. There was only one hill he warned us about. It was no higher than the others, in fact it was not quite so high, but it rose straight away from the back of my uncle's house, and there was a small precipice just above his back garden. He told us that it was dangerous because of this precipice; people came running down the little sheep path that seemed so easy a way of descent, and then when it turned sharp to the left just before the edge of the precipice, where there was a broken stone wall, they could not stop themselves, and turn so easily as the sheep could, and there had been one or two bad accidents. "If you are going to climb it," he used to say, "take my stick. It has a spike in it, and is very useful. It will help you to the top, and if when you are coming down again you dig it into the ground behind you it will act as a brake, and there won't be any trouble." He showed us the sticks, he had two or three, and we thanked him and went out.

And one day, when we climbed the hill, we took his advice, and his sticks. I had the one with the sharp spike, the others had older ones, with the spike worn down. We found them very useful as we toiled up to the top; indeed, I don't think we should have got to the top without them.

"But what nonsense it is to say we want them on the way down," said my friend. "Why, you simply start, and the steepness of the hill makes you run and you reach the bottom in no time."

"Yes, and probably head first," said another; "my father always says your legs take you up, but your stick brings you down."

I laughed; it seemed so absurd that you should need the same care and effort step by step to come down as to climb up.

My friend ended it all by throwing his stick right down the hill. "There," said he, as it rattled down to the precipice-wall, "It can get down by itself; so can I," and off he went.

I followed his example; it seemed the brave thing to do. As boys we had curious notions about courage; it never seemed brave to be careful and steady when the path lay down hill at your feet, and it was so easy to run. Only one of us kept his stick, and he was afterwards glad that he did. Indeed, it is harder to come down than climb up. The hill runs away with your feet, and your feet run faster than you, and at last you are stumbling, panting, slipping, gasping, and looking anxiously for a tree to catch hold of, or a little green patch on which you can fall. But no trees were there, and only hard rocks on every side, and the hill got steeper and steeper, and the precipice nearer and nearer; the very sheep seemed afraid of us, and stood baaing and staring, as we sped wildly by. It was the wall that saved us in the end, and oh, it was hard and stony. We felt the shock of its hard stone front on our knees and chests for days; but it saved us. Only one of us came down hill without hurt, the one who had kept his stick. Believe me, you want your stick of carefulness and steady perseverance step by step more in coming down hill than in climbing up.

Once a little Princess was released from a Paris prison, and allowed to go to her friends. The Republicans, who had imprisoned her, had executed her father, her mother, and her aunt, and her little brother had died from the cruelties they had practised on him. She was the only one left out of the whole family. Her uncle, King Louis XVIII., an exile in Italy, felt sure that she must hate the Republicans as he did, and long for revenge. But she had learned from her father and her aunt that love is a good stick to climb over difficulties with, and when the way suddenly opened before her and the children down out of the rocky trouble time to the happy valley below, she knew better than to throw the stick away. Though only seventeen, you may see that she wrote to her uncle and told him that revenge was always a bad tool, that love and forgiveness were better, and she not only said it but meant it, as we see from what she did.

She could have stayed with her mother's relations in Vienna—they were the Emperor's family there—and been always rich and comfortable, and sought after and spoiled. But when she knew how lonely her poor old uncle was, and how wretchedly unhappy he was in his poverty-stricken exile's home, she gave up the comfortable life in Vienna and went to take care of him. And once she had taken the step, and gone to share his poverty and his wanderings, she never looked back or regretted it. She was cheery and bright and loving every day. There came a time when they were so homeless and poor that they were on the borders of Poland in a bleak snowstorm, with nowhere to go and no money. The King of Prussia had refused them permission to pass into his dominions, and for a while they knew not where to turn. Did she despair? Not at all. There is a picture still to be seen, showing her as she then was, bright and cheerful as ever, tramping bravely through the deep snow, the stolid old King Louis leaning heavily on her arm. And when permission was at last given to them to go into Prussia and make a home there, all the poor Frenchmen who had followed them, hoping to be found homes too, were turned back and refused admittance, she, hearing their cries for mercy, for they were starving, took her necklace from her neck and sold it, so that they should have food and money to pay for a home. It had been her mother's necklace, and she treasured it for that reason, but in times of great trouble for others even treasures must go, and so I like to remember the act of this little Princess Royal of France. Her life was never as bright and happy, perhaps, as is yours, she lived in such troubled times; but I am sure she made it as bright and happy as it could be for those about her if not for herself, by remembering that love is for dark days as well as fair.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION. A STRANGE ENGLISH VILLAGE.

THE Rev. T. P. Spedding writes:—

On the suggestion of the Sheffield and District Association the Midland Van has been spending some weeks in the neighbourhood of Mexboro' and Bolton. Three miles from Bolton is the small town of Wath-on-Dearne, and here the Mission remained a fortnight, the meetings being conducted by the Revs. George Pegler and George Lansdown. There were large audiences every night, and the work was splendidly supported by Bolton friends. One of the older members of the congregation there walked over 60 miles in the course of the Mission in order to attend the meetings; and one weary missionary tells how he sat down to supper at twenty minutes to one on Sunday morning after the long walk back to Bolton and a heated and arduous night's work on the platform. Some strong opposition was encountered, but the Mission spoke a new word to its hearers, and steps are now being taken to start a series of regular meetings in response to the requests of a large number of earnest inquirers. Last week interesting meetings were conducted by the Rev. J. Cyril Flower at Bolton, where the little church makes steady progress, and is urgently needing more accommodation for its constantly increasing Sunday school. The congregation is the largest in the village; the Sheffield lay-preachers take most of the services and the Rev. T. Anderson helps with the pastoral work.

If appearances mean anything there should be a fine opportunity at Wath; and it would be worth a great effort on the part of the local society to attempt some religious provision for the village of Highgate, where the Van spent a week prior to coming to Wath. Highgate surely stands alone. It has been asserted that one or other of the religious bodies is at work in every town and village in the land; but Highgate seems to have been forgotten or ignored. Here is a place of nearly three hundred houses with a population which cannot be less than 800. But there is no church, chapel, Sunday school, institute, hall, society—no single agency for the betterment of the people, old or young, with the exception of the council elementary school, which appears never to be used apart from its particular purpose. True there is no public-house either; but there is an off-licence house, and two working-men's clubs, which are merely drinking shops, open at all hours, and a veritable blot on the place. These clubs were crowded on the Sunday afternoon; men and women were brawling in the streets, drink was in evidence everywhere; the children swarmed in their dirt and the dirt around. When the Van was in the place the drink shops discussed the fear that a — chapel would come next; a few men and some mothers gathered round; but it was a children's week. They mustered from all the village; they enjoyed Mr. Pipkin's stories, and they followed the missionaries as they carried their harmonium about the village and tried at one street corner and another to catch the ears of a few of these heedless folk. Plenty of the mothers pleaded that the Mission should start a Sunday-school; for no one seemed to think Highgate was worth helping. Yes, anybody who would come would be welcome, if what a few of these mothers said was true; and one man was willing to help if a school could be started. Better anything than nothing. He shied a little when it turned out that the people who were looking round were Unitarians; and perhaps the village had better be left to its destitution than that the work should be done by people with a name like that, even though he knew nothing about them or their ideals and beliefs! A little talk, however, showed him that Unitarianism was not so very dreadful after all; and if something can be done he will help "for the sake of the children." What we would like would be to see an iron building put up to give our Bolton friends, with the help of the Sheffield Association, an opportunity of trying what could be done. The workers would be forthcoming; but there is no place to be hired except the day school, at the rate of nearly £40 a year, whereas for £150, at the outside, a building could be put up that would answer all immediate necessities. The work for the work's sake and for the sake of the children would surely be reckoned for righteousness, and it could be done without any regard to the denominational advantage. If the Van Mission could get the promise of that £150 I believe the Sheffield Association would do the rest. In any case it would give them the opportunity they have more than once discussed; and if the task could not be undertaken the money would not be called for. I shall be glad to hear from everybody who would stand by us in this matter.

The South-East Wales Society have now taken over the guidance of the newly started cause at Tredegar; and are prepared to do work as well at Abertillery, where there is every likelihood of another society being formed. Services are to be held in the home of one of the sympathisers, now that the Van has left this big town of over 30,000 inhabitants; and the number of people who intimated that they would assist is considerable. The meetings during a fortnight were conducted by Mr. Fred Cottier and the Rev. W. T. Davies and Mrs. Davies. Mr. Davies is conducting week-night meetings at Tredegar until the autumn, and the Sunday services are supplied by the Welsh Society. The Van also spent a week at Brynmawr with Mr. Litman as missionary; but very little response was elicited.

The North Wales Van did well at Connah's Quay, where the Rev. E. T. Russell was missionary, and there was a very large meeting on the Sunday night. The Van should then have moved to Flint, but in consequence of a strike there and disturbances in the town, it was taken to Holywell, a centre for the miracles of the Catholic Church. In this small place extraordinary meetings were held, by the Rev. J. D. Evans, of Chester, who had the advantage of being able to address his audience in the vernacular. Night after night great audiences assembled, until well over a thousand—a third of the population—were present on the Sunday. The local cinema proprietor had a quiet week, and on more than one evening failed to get an audience; the interest in the Mission for once exceeding that in the pictures. The Van has now got into touch with the holiday resorts. At Rhyl the meetings were conducted by the Rev. Horace Short, and were fairly successful. At Colwyn this week the Rev. T. Van Ness and the Rev. T. F. Bullock, of Ottawa, are responsible for the Mission. Next week the Van will be at Llandudno; on August 10 at Conway, August 17 Penmaemawr, August 24 Bangor, August 31 Carnarvon, September 7 Llanfairfechan.

The London Van has been at Stamford-street, where the Rev. W. J. Piggott is conducting weekly open-air meetings at Webber-street, near Waterloo Station. The Van occupied the same site and very satisfactory meetings were held. For the past fortnight the time has been divided between Forest Gate and Stratford, where the Pioneer Preachers are in charge, and where weekly meetings have also been held during the summer months. Good audiences have ruled, and a few members have been added to the cause. Next week the Van is at New Cross, and on August 10 at Deptford.

A BROAD CHURCH CONFERENCE. MEETING OF THE CHURCHMEN'S UNION AT RIPON.

THE Churchmen's Union held a four-days' Conference at Ripon at the beginning of July. Only slight references to it have appeared in the public press, but alike in intrinsic importance and in the quality of its papers and discussions it surpassed many crowded and well-advertised meetings. It has long been a reproach to the liberal group in the Church of England that it is powerless to effect reform. It exhausts its energies in futile protest or critical attack, but it has not hitherto succeeded in fusing the isolated individuals of which it is composed into a common movement, with definite aims, a power of popular religious appeal, and the sense of a prophetic message for the age. The recent Conference, which it is intended shall be annual, sprang largely out of the consciousness of the need of corporate action and a common witness. It was attended by about one hundred clergy and laity including Archdeacon Lilley, Canon Foakes-Jackson, Canon Glazebrook, Canon Rashdall, Professor Percy Gardner, Professor Lake, and the Revs. H. Handley, W. Manning, and J. M. Thompson. We are indebted to our contemporary, The Modern Churchman for the following impressions of the Conference. Our readers may be referred to the current number of The Modern Churchman for the full text of many of the papers and addresses.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE CONFERENCE.

An important step forward was taken in the cause of modern churchmanship, when it was decided to hold a Conference at Ripon of members of the Churchmen's Union and those in sympathy with its ideals. A Conference among Churchmen of different degrees of knowledge and experience, yet all of whom felt the pressure of modern knowledge and ways of thinking, and desired to see these employed in the service of the Christian religion, has been desired for some time past by those who realised how much might be learnt from such a gathering.

It appeared, however, to those who promoted the Conference that if it were to serve the best interests of our cause two things were needful. First, there must be a considerable amount of common feeling and common knowledge among the members of such a Conference. Without these the Conference Meetings would be rendered fruitless by arid disputations and ignorant and unsympathetic criticisms. Secondly, the meetings must be to a large extent private. Some of the members of the Conference Committee feeling sure that the ideals and utterances of the members of the Conference only needed to be presented to earnest and thoughtful Churchpeople to obtain immediate recognition and welcome acceptance, desired the Press to be admitted to the Conference Meetings. On the other hand the majority of the Committee knowing that the Press could not possibly publish the discussions in full, and realising how easily and innocently compressed reports of enthusiastic extempore utterances and intricate arguments may give entirely wrong impressions, which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to correct afterwards, were opposed to publicity. In the light of actual experience, we realise the wisdom of this decision. With full reports of the Conference speeches in our hands, we have decided, as we cannot possibly find space to give them in full, to give the briefest summary of them. A published précis of such discussions can give no adequate impression of the influence which the speakers exercised. There is a moving and convincing power which is due as much to the speaker's personality as to his actual words, and these in the case of an extemporaneous speaker it is practically impossible to reproduce in a synopsis of his speech. It is of no little interest to reflect how much of the impressiveness of the meetings and the assurance which they gave of the strength and rightness of our cause was produced by this magnetic force of the speakers. It is in this, rather than in the papers, valuable as they are, which we publish in this Conference Number of The Modern Churchman, that the promise of the potency of our movement is to be discerned.

There were none, we believe, who attended the Conference who have not come away with pleasing recollections of delightful social intercourse, amid attractive scenes and beautiful weather. But this is not all. Many have come away with something deeper and more precious. They realise now, what perhaps they but very dimly perceived before, that the movement with which they are connected, and in a sense most inadequately represent, is a vastly greater and more inspiring thing than they had ever dreamed. They feel now that it has in it a constructive and poetic power which will enable it, if wisely guided, to mould the future of the Church. They know that those who with the best intentions would frustrate this movement are striving not only blindly but in vain. That we have reason to believe was the general impression which the Conference left on its members, but it left other impressions besides. It was clear to the critical, yet sympathetic, observer that the movement is not entirely coherent; that it does not fully comprehend itself; that there are wide divergencies in the views of its members; that it does not know how far it is going; that it does not see clearly its future or its road. But it was equally clear that it knew it was going and that it was going to arrive. It might not know its road, but it was convinced that God knew it. It might not see its way clearly, but it was satisfied that God should be its Guide.

The feeling which pervaded the Conference was one of invincible hope and prayerful expectation. Its members felt like men "marching into the dawn"; as those about to witness a second Reformation of Christendom.

Yet with these high hopes was the solemn realisation that only fearless truthfulness, spiritual faith, and self-sacrificing love could cause the movement to prevail; that great aims mean great pains; that not in deserting the Church of our fathers, not in weakening or destroying her, but in her renovation and inspiration as the outcome of sustained corporate effort, resolute, untiring, self-sacrificing, could enduring success be achieved.

This sense of eager, fearless looking forward to and striving after new truth, combined with profound and loving reverence for the past as gathered up for men of our race in the history and future of our Church and Nation was well expressed in the noble words of Psalm cxxii., with the recitation of which the Conference concluded:—

O pray for the peace of Jerusalem:

They shall prosper that love thee.

Peace be within thy walls:

And plenteousness within thy palaces.

For my brethren and companions' sakes:

I will wish thee prosperity.

Yea, because of the House of the Lord our God:

I will seek to do thee good.

THE SAGAMORE SOCIOLOGICAL CONFERENCE.

SAGAMORE Beach is a summer resort on the northern shore of Cape Cod, and here what Dr. Wendte describes in the Christian Register as a summer extension of the Ford Hall Open Forum movement, which is known throughout New England and the United States, is held annually. Social workers from all parts come together, as they do at the Swanwick Summer School in England, for mutual consultation, comparison of methods and results, and general encouragement, and receive much hospitality from Mr. and Mrs. George W. Coleman, the inspirers of the Conference, Dr. Francis E. Clark, founder of the Christian Endeavour Movement, and other philanthropists and reformers who make their summer home at Sagamore. Some two hundred delegates reported this year on the activities of half as many forums, representing various nationalities, types, and opinions—religious and otherwise—in the community. Such subjects as "The Race Problem," "Is Race Antipathy Rational?" "The American Negro," "Race Psychology: the Hindu, Chinese, and Japanese," and "Race Prejudice against the Jew," of vital importance to Americans, were discussed, and earnest appeals were made for the encouragement of the spirit of charity, mutual sympathy, mutual knowledge and respect. One speaker—Professor William Elliott Griffis—provoked a lively debate and much opposition by his vehement assertion, not only of the equality, but the superiority of the Asiatic people, especially the Hindus and Japanese, and incidentally the question of Asiatic immigration into the United States assumed the chief importance.

SOCIAL WORKERS IN SWITZERLAND.

THE Rev. R. P. Farley, who is spending the summer in Switzerland, contributes an article on the National Exhibition at Berne to the July number of Progress. One of the chief features of the Exhibition, he says, are the collections dealing with social work in the broadest sense, whether undertaken by the Confederation, the cantons, the great municipipalities, or private individuals and societies. "In Switzerland, as elsewhere, it is now recognised that exact investigation must precede action, and the authorities of the exhibition have secured a collective section to which all the existing official bureaux of statistics have contributed. . . . This is indeed the first systematic exhibition of Swiss towns, and nineteen municipalities contribute officially to a section descriptive of town planning, in which it is possible to see what Swiss towns have been, what they are, and what it is hoped to make them." The statistical side of the exhibition also contains many diagrams and documents furnished by the Swiss Association of Labour Exchanges, which was founded in 1906. "Unemployment insurance has not made great progress in Switzerland, though a voluntary system has been in existence in Berne since 1893, and it is now proposed to assist this by a municipal subsidy. Bâle, since 1909, has had a voluntary system, subsidised by the municipality, and Zürich and St. Gall propose to follow its example. Other forms of insurance have long been securely established in Switzerland. In addition to the ordinary voluntary forms of insurance against death, fire, and other risks, some recent developments are worthy of notice. In 1911 the Confederation, after a referendum vote, passed a law providing for a State monopoly of insurance against accidents and sickness. Some cantons provide insurance against fire, while Neuchâtel has public life insurance. In the latter case the cantons compete with the private companies for business."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Billingshurst.—A sale of work was held on Tuesday, July 28. Mrs. Alfred Wilson, of London, who opened the sale, referred to the fact that her grandfather had often ministered in the chapel. Many friends were present from Horsham and the surrounding district. Tea was served in the chapel grounds under the superintendence of Mrs. S. Carter, and the Rev. V. Moody, of Horsham, gave a selection of music on the organ. A substantial sum was realised for the chapel funds.

Hastings: Presentation.—Mr. H. G. Proctor, who has been a member of the Free Christian Church for 35 years, and has ably filled the office of hon. treasurer for more than ten years, has been presented by the congregation with a purse of money and an illuminated address in recognition of his faithful services. The presentation was made by the minister (Rev. E. Lockett) after the evening service on Sunday last. The Rev. Gardner Preston (Warwick), a former minister of the church, was happily present and addressed the meeting. The terms of the address were read by Mr. A. M. Elliott, hon. secretary, and Mr. Proctor suitably replied.

Ipswich.—The Sunday-school anniversary was held on Sunday, July 26, when the services were conducted by Mrs. Broadrick, Bridgewater, whose husband, the late Rev. T. B. Broadrick, was at one time minister of this church. The school, which was reformed last year through the efforts of Miss Robinson, has largely increased, and now numbers 60 scholars.

London Lay Preachers' Union.—The monthly meeting of the Union on Monday, July 27, took the form of a conference, opened by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, on the subject of "Hymns in Public Worship." Mr. Drummond pleaded for more care and thought over the selection of hymns than he feared was usually given. After a brief glance over the history of hymnology, it was pointed out that hymns should be judged both by literary and by religious standards. Religious poems suitable for private reading were not necessarily good hymns; and there were some hymns which some congregations might like to sing, but which it was not good for them to like, e.g., the cheaply rhetorical hymn with the jingling tune. It was also undesirable to confine one's selection to a few personal or congregational favourites, thus running good hymns to death. Neither should all the hymns in a service be in the same key, for then almost certainly someone in the congregation would find himself unhelped by this most important part of the worship. Stress was laid upon the value of hymns with historic association, and of children's hymns. An interesting discussion followed.

Newbury.—The 217th anniversary of the Presbyterian Meeting House was celebrated on Sunday, July 26, when the Rev. W. H. Drummond preached morning and evening. After the evening service a meeting of the congregation was held in the schoolroom to consider ways and means for a renovation scheme, the chapel being in urgent need of decoration and repair. The Rev. Richard Newell was in the chair, and Mr. Drummond, in the course of a short address, spoke very warmly of the success of Mr. Newell's ministry. There was a new spirit of activity and earnestness, and the congregation that evening was the largest he had seen in the chapel. He felt that the renovation scheme should be taken in hand as soon as possible. It was, however, too large for them to attempt without some financial help, which he hoped would be forthcoming after they had done their best to help themselves.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—We regret to announce the death of Mr. John Duncan Donald, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in his 45th year. He died in a private nursing home in that city as the result of an operation for appendicitis. He was a native of Cumnock, in Ayrshire, and a younger son of Mr. Robert Donald, a very old and valued servant on the Boswell estate. Mr. Donald was an apprentice to an ironmonger in his native town, and subsequently removed to Glasgow to join the staff of Messrs. Edgar & Crerar, Ltd., in whose service he remained until his death. After a few years he was transferred to Newcastle-upon-Tyne as the representative of the firm in that district. He had entire control of the Newcastle works, and also served on the board of directors. Soon after his settlement at Newcastle he came under the influence of the late Rev. Frank Walters, and very soon began to take an active interest in the affairs of the denomination, becoming an effective lay preacher. As a lecturer Mr. Donald was also in great request. He was for many years financial secretary to the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, an office which he filled with great success. For several years he was also librarian to the Association. He was one of the founders of Unity Church, Gateshead, and attended both services for a number of years, walking over 12 miles every Sunday. He leaves a widow and a young son and daughter to mourn his early death. The funeral took place at St. Andrew's cemetery, Newcastle, and was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall. Among those present were Mr. Donald's two children, father and brother, the Rev. Lucking Tavenor, who had travelled from Aberdeen, and the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, who took part in the service.

York.—A very successful garden party in aid of funds for a new organ was held at St. Paul's Park, York, on Wednesday last. In the course of the evening competitions in tennis, croquet, bowls, balloon race, hat trimming, &c., attracted a number of enthusiastic participants. At a recent congregational meeting at St. Saviourgate Chapel, the committee appointed to investigate matters in connection with a new hymn book presented their report, and recommended the compilation of a new book. Last Sunday evening the minister concluded a series of addresses on the "Hard Sayings of Jesus," and presided over a conference at which the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount were sympathetically discussed. The attendance during the summer months has been most satisfactory. The chapel will be closed for the annual cleaning until August 30. The building of a new vestry is in contemplation.

Yorkshire Ministers' Union.—A meeting of the Yorkshire Ministers' Union was held at Mill Hill, Leeds, on Tuesday, July 28. The Rev. J. Wain presided over an attendance of 18 ministers, including the Revs. C. J. Street, A. H. Dolphin, and T. Anderson from the Sheffield district. The Rev. C. Hargrove heartily welcomed three new members into the Union, the Revs. J. T. Davis, J. M. Bass, and J. Lord. The Rev. J. Wain expressed the goodwill and best wishes of the brethren to Dr. Thackray, who will soon leave Yorkshire for Lancashire. The Rev. W. L. Schroeder opened a discussion on "Ministerial Culture," in which many of the brethren joined. In response to an invitation from Mr. and Mrs. Verity, the ministers went to Highbank, Roundhay, where they were entertained. On the motion of the Rev. C. Hargrove, seconded by the Rev. C. J. Street, a hearty vote of thanks was expressed to the host and hostess for their generous hospitality, which Mr. Verity acknowledged.

ROUND THE LIGHTHOUSE LANTERN.

The idea of trying to save the lives of thousands of migrating birds that are attracted by the glare of lighthouse lanterns, as moths are attracted by a candle, may seem a little fanciful and even absurd to those who have not heard of the experiments of Mr. Thijssse, the Dutch naturalist, or the efforts of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds to preserve these visitors to our shores. Mr. Thijssse's plans for providing resting places for the birds, which, as he holds, are not killed by dashing against the lanterns, but fly round them dazed and weary until they drop down exhausted, have now been tried at St. Catherine's, in the Isle of Wight, and the Caskets, off Alderney. Bird-perches and bird-rests have been installed in such a way as not to interfere with the light, and upon these the bewildered little travellers are only too glad to settle until daybreak, when they resume their long flight with fresh vigour. They are for the most part insectivorous, and of economic importance to the land. The greater number of them are also song-birds. When, therefore, many thousands of these are destroyed in a single season, it is clear that whatever is possible ought to be done to save them in our own interests, apart from the natural desire to preserve life for its own sake. Those who are interested will find further information about this humane scheme in the columns of the summer number of Bird Notes and News.

STANDARDISED CIVILISATION.

Visitors from the old countries travelling through America soon discover that, although there is almost as much variety in the scenery as there is in Europe, the cities are terribly alike, and there is an extraordinary sameness about the dress, occupations, and habits of their inhabitants which seems all the more curious when we remember how many nationalities have contributed to the vast population. Perhaps the sameness is only superficial, and certainly there is no lack of individuality among American men and women. But a correspondent from Washington writing to the Times is probably quite correct in attributing the love of travelling in European countries, which infects them all, less to a genuine love of what is old and picturesque than to the desire to escape from the monotony of American civilisation. This monotony is by no means the result of stagnation, but of large-scale production and progressive efficiency re-acting upon a people who care very little about the traditional way of doing things and a great deal about the effective and easy way. The national characteristics of those of other races who adopt the United States as their home tend to be obliterated in a most extraordinary way in the second and third generation, and it is America's proud boast that she not only "absorbs" them, but fires them with her own ideals to such an extent that they very shortly become more proud of being called her citizens than of any other distinction. All this may seem to increase the tendency to standardisation, but we may be consoled by the thought that a new race is said to be springing up of quite a different type to the American even of to-day, a race with larger ideals, more attractive personalities, and finer physique, from which much may be expected in the future. It should be remembered, also, that modern commercialism tends to produce a deadly sameness of character and interests—to say nothing of social problems—in every large city in the world. We shall all suffer from it soon if the race for wealth goes on unchecked.

THE RECOVERY OF PAPYRI.

We are indebted to the Times for an excellent report of Mr. Johnson's recent lecture on the recovery of papyri in Egypt in connection with the exhibition of the Egyptian Exploration Fund. The earliest Greek papyrus they had found was a marriage contract of the date 311-310 B.C., and the latest dated from 710 A.D. There were various methods of obtaining papyri. They were found in rubbish mounds pure and simple which covered in buildings. They were found in buildings which were partly filled up with rubbish, and they were also found in buildings which had never been used as places for rubbish but which had simply collapsed. Some valuable discoveries had been made in cemeteries, since it was often the custom to bury with the dead copies of the works of their favourite authors. It was in this way that the Bodley Homer was discovered. It was the custom of the Egyptians in early times to convert the dead body into a kind of portrait statue, but in the Ptolemaic age more attention was paid to the decorations of the coverings of the corpse. Of these there were five sections, and at first only cloth was used. In the third century before Christ, however, it became the custom to use strips of papyrus for the purpose. Several strips of used papyrus were glued together, and a solid surface was obtained to receive the paint. They had been able to remove the paint, and had revealed the writing underneath. By that means they had recovered valuable additions to the history and literature of the country. The earliest complete papyrus recovered by this method was a contract for the sale of wheat dated 300 B.C. The latest belonged to the time of Augustus.

ONE of the most interesting items at the exhibition, which is being held in the rooms of the Royal Society of Antiquaries, is a parchment bearing a fragment of Theocritus, which was fully described in the Times a couple of months ago. There are many other MSS., which cover a very wide area of subjects. There is, for example, a fragment some 3 in. square inscribed with some lines from the Second Epistle of St. John; this is, with the exception of that in the Vatican, the oldest of such MSS. known to exist. Close by it may be seen an extract from the symposium of Xenophon belonging to the third century, and a page from a medical work by Hippocrates, and a therapeutic medical charm of the sixth century. There are pages, too, from the Psalms, from the Book of Job, and the Book of Kings. The exhibition is also rich in objects throwing light upon the domestic life of the early centuries in Egypt. There are cotton and woollen socks with a toe-division to admit of the fastening of the sandal-strap. Beside these is shown the full equipment of a shoemaker, and close at hand are bobbins for spinning and specimens of sewing and embroidery. There are also many relics of the nursery, dolls of leather and rag, and others in wood with movable legs and arms, toy whips and whistles, and carved counters for draughts.

THE QUESTION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Dr. Josiah Oldfield, President of the Society for the Abolition of Capital Punishment, explained to a representative of the Daily News and Leader recently, that fifty years ago the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment, realising that crime varied in enormity, recommended that according to circumstances murder should be classed as of the first degree or the second degree, and that capital punishment should be reserved for crime of the first degree only. "It was not an extreme, but, on the contrary, a very logical, quiet, scientific recommendation on a very important matter, and yet in the stress of party politics the report has been shelved for fifty years in what we are pleased to call sensible England."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It will always be a proud memory with us that we have tried to take our full share in the movement for peace between England and Germany. We have done our best for some years to give publicity to the proceedings and manifestoes of the Anglo-German Friendship Committee. We have set our face as flint against the campaign of enmity and dark suspicion which has been supported by a certain section of the press. It has been with us a matter of deep conviction, a natural expression of one of the elementary principles of our religion. At this moment, when our dearest hopes have suffered defeat, we are undismayed. We still believe in the cause and principles of peace, because nothing which this world has to offer seems so good to us as the kingdom of the Prince of Peace.

THE crisis which has ended in war came upon us so suddenly in the midst of the holiday season that it was difficult to mobilise the forces of peace for effective expression before it was too late. Still, an extraordinary amount of work was done, and it became evident that anything in the way of a war policy, advocated by a certain section of the press, would meet with stern opposition not only from the mass of organised labour, but from every section of the people. This opposition was growing steadily in volume, and represented much that is at once ablest and most admirable in the national mind and character, when Germany took the fatal step of first trying to seduce Belgium from her neutrality and then invading her territory, in flagrant defiance of the rights of nations, when Belgium met her demand with a courageous refusal.

It was this capital blunder on the part of the military dictatorship of Germany which suddenly reduced all the pleadings of the peacemaker to silence. Many people who remained unconvinced by Sir Edward Grey's speech felt themselves with infinite regret unable to say any more when Belgium was openly attacked. Apart from our treaty obligations, all our traditional instincts to defend the freedom and independence of small nationalities were instantly on the alert. And something more impalpable but not less precious seemed also to be at stake: we mean, the code of international honour, the sanctity of common undertakings publicly accepted in the sight of the world. If these are to be violated with impunity the whole fabric of international law will come tumbling about our ears, and European civilisation would be reduced to a system of brigandage. We have no desire to put forward this position dogmatically, but we think it represents the saddening thoughts which have filled the minds of many of the best friends of peace during the last few days.

* * *

On this point it is worth while to quote the opinion of Professor J. H. Morgan, one of the ablest and most enlightened authorities on questions of international law. It is contained in an article on the neutrality of Belgium which he contributed to the Westminster Gazette on Tuesday.

Belgium, he writes, is not in the position of an ordinary State. In international law a State has neither the right nor the duty to remain neutral. Any State may attack her or she may attack any State. But a neutralised State in return for undertaking the duty of remaining neutral acquires the right to have her neutrality respected. She becomes, as Belgium and Switzerland have become, the ward of Europe. She has a right to be left alone, and she has corresponding duties. It is her duty to forbid, nay, to resist, any attempt to use her territory as a basis for operations against any Power or to use it as a means of passage for a belligerent force. Her neutrality does not admit of qualification, and, indeed, the whole tendency of international law is to reject all qualification of the meaning of neutrality; there is no such thing as "friendly" or "benevolent" or impartial neutrality. The Hague Convention No. 5 of 1907 on the duties of neutrals in war upon land lays it down explicitly that not only is "the territory of neutral Powers inviolable" (Article I.); but also, "Belligerents are forbidden to move troops or convoys of either munitions of war or supplies across the territory of a neutral Power." To that Convention Germany was a signatory! Germany's demand is as cruel as it is unjust, because for Belgium to comply with it would mean that France would thereby be given a casus belli against her, and, to quote the words of one of our greatest international lawyers: "If the respect due to our neutral territory was violated by one party, it would soon provoke similar treatment from the other, with the result that what was neutral ground would soon become the theatre of war." The right of a country so placed to resist any such violation is expressly recognised in the Hague Convention (Article X.): "The fact of a neutral Power resisting, even by force, attempts to violate its territory cannot be regarded as a hostile act."

SELDOM if ever has there been a war with so little popular enthusiasm behind it. Everywhere all over Europe people are asking what it is all about, and find themselves quite incapable of feeling enmity against the nation with which they happen to be at war. In this respect it is one of the strangest and most maddening wars in history. But there is this one ray of hope about the situation. The war may be of short duration. The mass of the people cannot be dragooned into any prolonged acquiescence in a military dictatorship for which they have no genuine enthusiasm. And when the war is over nothing is likely to be as it was before. It may be the bitter death struggle, costing us all incalculable treasure in blood and tears, of the old order whose effete devotion to military ambitions and dynastic interests is making its last stand against the new forces, which it hates but can no longer resist. The nations are not likely to go to war again in obedience to the formula of the balance of power, about which Mr. G. M. Trevelyan with his wide historical knowledge advises "a wholesome agnosticism," and we ourselves along with the other countries of Europe may awaken to clearer and more honest relationships, without the traditional secretiveness and the practical divorce between popular government and foreign policy, which at present is a source of unhealthy dualism in the state.

* * *

THE resignation of Lord Morley and Mr. John Burns from the Cabinet is a matter for very deep regret, and it ought not to be passed over even at this time of grave absorption in other matters without a warm tribute of gratitude for public services of no common order. Mr. John Burns has shown himself an administrator of great independence of mind, and neither the House of Commons nor high official position has been able to tarnish his bluff straightforwardness of character. To Lord Morley our debt is too manifold to be summed up in a few words. A man of genius in more than one department, he has left a permanent impress on his time. At the present moment we think of him as we heard him before the outbreak of the South African war in the St. James's Hall in Manchester, pleading with passionate conviction for peace. His resignation in obedience to a high sense of public duty is in harmony with a great career and a still greater character.

BOTH Lord Morley and Mr. John Burns are men of strong and sober judgment, and no one will imagine that they have acted, as sometimes happens in the case of smaller men, in a temper of moody disappointment or injured pride because they could not get their own way. For this reason we hope that even those who are least inclined to agree with them will pay a tribute of admiration to their patriotism and courage, for it requires courage of no common order to withstand the popular voice and the earnest pleadings of friends at a time of crisis; and there is a type of patriotism, so deep and pure, that it regards any violation of conscience as an injury inflicted upon the soul of the nation. We could not make a greater mistake than to suppose that the need of union means that we are to surrender all independence of judgment and simply to think as we are told to think. We must suppress all embarrassing and unprofitable discussions, and give no rein to the merely captious spirit. But we must still bring public affairs before the living tribunal of conscience. That is an essential condition of national well-being. It is an inestimable moral benefit to the country as a whole that we still have the Quaker protest in our midst, and that it was so ably represented in the House of Commons the other night by the speech of Mr. T. Edmund Harvey, with its restrained quietness of manner, and its firm appeal to principles of conduct which do not alter in the dark and evil day.

A GREAT Women's Meeting was held in the Kingsway Hall on Tuesday evening. Originally summoned in the interests of British neutrality, the rapid movement of events led inevitably to some change in its tone, but its international character bore splendid witness to the solidarity of the women's movement in its opposition to war. Mrs. Fawcett was in the chair, and on the motion of Mrs. Creighton, representing the National Union of Women Workers, the following resolution was carried unanimously:—

In this terrible hour, when the outbreak of war in Europe is depending on decisions which women have no direct power to shape, this meeting of women, held under the joint auspices of many women's organisations, yet desire to face their responsibilities as citizens in dealing with the situation which has been brought about by the present crisis.

They deplore the abandonment of peaceful negotiations, the failure to settle the present international differences by conciliation or arbitration, and the outbreak of war in Europe as an unparalleled disaster.

Women find themselves in the position of seeing all they most reverence and treasure, the home, the family, the race, subjected to irreparable injury, which they are powerless to avert. In addition to all the horrors of slaughter, women are to see their countries impoverished, their homes broken up, their children and their friends dying of starvation and disease.

Whatever its result, the conflict will leave mankind the poorer, will set back civilisation, and will be a powerful check to the amelioration of the condition of the masses of the people on which the real welfare of nations depends.

The women here assembled call upon the Governments of their several countries to support every effort made to restore peace, and urge all Governments not yet involved to work unceasingly towards a settlement, not by force, but by reason, that by their united efforts the war may be speedily brought to an end.

Subsequently, on the motion of Miss Mary Macarthur, the following resolution was also carried:—

That this meeting urges women's societies to use their organisations for the help of those who will be the sufferers from the economic and industrial dislocation caused by the European war.

WE print elsewhere an article from the pen of the Rev. V. D. Davis describing the Peace Conference of Christian Churches at Constance last Saturday and Sunday. It was a brave adventure on the part of the English members of the Conference to go at all, and their hurried journey home was only made possible by the intervention of the noble-hearted Dowager Duchess of Baden, an aunt of the German Emperor, who has taken a deep personal interest in the movement from the beginning. The following resolution was passed by the Conference:—

The Conference of members of Christian Churches, representing twelve countries and thirty confessions, assembled at Constance to promote friendly relations between nations, solemnly appeals to Christian rulers to avert a war between millions of men amongst whom friendship and common interests have been steadily growing, and thereby to save from disaster Christian civilisation and assert the power of the Christian spirit in human affairs.

We salute the brave band of idealists at Constance with reverence and gratitude.

JEAN-LÉON JAURÈS has fallen a victim to an assassin in Paris, the first martyr to the military fever in Europe; and the war is not likely to claim as a victim any man of wider influence or more distinguished gifts. He was a dedicated apostle of peace; a Socialist whose socialism meant the unselfish service of his fellows; an orator of European reputation. We cannot refrain from quoting the noble tribute to his memory which has been sent to the Manchester Guardian by M. Anatole France: "I say it with mingled pride and sorrow—he was my friend. I knew him in his most intimate moments. Great man as he was, he was simple and warm-hearted in his private relations. He was the very embodiment of sweetness and kindness; of all the gifts with which nature had endowed this superman, that of loving was perhaps the one that he used in the fullest measure. I have heard that mighty voice, whose clear and terrible echoes resounded through the world, become, in speaking to a friend, tender and caressing. His learning was sure and profound. It extended beyond the limits, wide as they are, of social questions, to the whole field of the intellect."

"I SHALL be forgiven," M. France continues, "for recalling a day during the Dreyfus affair when we were with Jaurès in the lobby of the Palais de Justice. After giving us a comprehensive and profound epitome of that case, which was troubling every conscience, he quoted some of the finest lines from the poets of the Louis XIII. period and commented upon them with exquisite taste. Less than a month ago I went to see him at his house at Passy, so modest, ay, so poor, and yet so glorious. I found him reading a tragedy of Euripides in the original. His mighty intellect found relaxation in turning from one study to another, and rested from one task only to take up a new one. Serene in the possession of a pure conscience, pursued by terrible hatred and made the target of murderous calumnies, he hated none. My heart is too full for speech, I can but stammer. My grief chokes my utterance. Never to see him again—that great heart, that mighty genius, that noble personality. I offer with respectful tenderness my profound sympathy to his widow, his children, his friends, his colleagues, and to the great Socialist party for whom he still lives."

* * *

It is with sincere pleasure that we are able to announce the acceptance by the Rev. W. E. Orchard of the invitation given to him by the congregation of the King's Weigh House Church. Dr. Orchard has been marked out for a considerable time for a position from which he can exert a wider influence than is open to him as minister of a church in a rather remote London suburb. He may be described as a constructive liberal in religion in the best sense of the word. A scholar of ripe attainments, his interest in religious questions is spiritual rather than intellectual, and denominational barriers mean little to him compared with the realities of faith and their application to modern needs. As a preacher he has retained the best elements of the evangelical tradition, with its imaginative insight into the depths of Christian experience and its power of personal appeal to the needs of the individual soul. From the pulpit of the King's Weigh House Church, with its fine traditions and its central position, he will have an opportunity of speaking to the conscience and heart of London in words which we are sure will compel attention.

TO OUR READERS.

Has the world gone mad? Is it all a nightmare from which we shall awaken in the sweet light of the dawn? How often these thoughts have coursed through the mind during the last few days. No, we say to ourselves continually, it is grim reality, the grimmest reality we have known in our lives, till the stern fact is beaten into our brains. But it has come upon us with such overwhelming suddenness that for the moment the power of thinking is numbed. Why, it was only the other day that we were chatting with German and French acquaintances at a mountain hotel in Switzerland, feeling once again the pleasure of those international relationships which have grown more intimate and natural every year. On our way home we came in leisurely holiday mood through France. Not a suspicion of trouble darkened the horizon. Rheims was gay with a light-hearted throng celebrating the festival of the Republic, while the great church brooded over the town in the peace of the summer night. At Laon we strolled along the ramparts and read the story of her military importance in the past, feeling in the security of the moment that such things could never happen again. Were we dreaming then? Are we awake and in full possession of our senses now?

What can we say to these things? At the moment it would be worse than useless to spend time in discussing the question, who is chiefly to blame. We are face to face with grave national peril, and we must meet it without the weakening influence of divided counsels. History will make a stern inquisition into the causes which have suddenly paralysed the life of Europe and plunged it into the horrors of war. But that day is not yet. What we have to consider now is how we shall live worthily through the coming weeks, which are likely to test us as most of us have never been tested before.

Most of our readers belong to a group of people who have been marked in the past by a close alliance between faith and character, by firm loyalty to principle in face of hardship and persecution, by simplicity in the daily habits of life, and by a temper of quiet generosity for the world's need. These are qualities which we have inherited from our ancestors. They are bred in our blood and bone, though their influence may have grown a little faint in days of prosperity and ease. We can be nobly faithful to them now. As the war in which we are engaged goes on with its quick alternations of hope and fear, it may be of success and defeat, strong feelings are likely to be aroused and the spirit of hatred may take possession of many hearts. Let it be ours never to forsake the holy tasks of the peacemaker. At present there is no element of popular dislike between nation and nation in this most unpopular war. We can do much to keep it so by setting our faces with courage against everything which savours of the jingo spirit, whether in the press, in conversation, or in our own hearts. At the beginning of the terrible ordeal, for which the rulers and not the nations of Europe are responsible, we would assure the German people that we are innocent of any feeling but those of cordial friendship. The Editor of this paper studied at a German University; he has enjoyed the hospitality of German homes; he has many German friends; and the spiritual influences of Germany, its poetry and its idealism, have entered into the very texture of his mind. He is only one among many. How should we belie our own past or turn our back upon some of the happiest experiences of our own lives? We can do much to keep the spirit of a good understanding alive in days when it will be sorely tried, when the path of the peacemaker will be a hard one to tread amid the hot passions which are engendered by the fortunes of war.

And there will also be need of courage of another kind. This war will probably bring overwhelming disaster to thousands of homes. Poverty will stalk through the land, and it will be no respecter of persons. We may have to meet want and suffering for ourselves and those dear to us in ways which even a week ago it seemed impossible to contemplate. There is no need for panic, but we ought to brace our hearts to meet misfortune with quiet dignity, and try to think more of others than of ourselves. Upon all of us who have been accustomed to live in anything approaching to affluence there is the duty to simplify our mode of living without delay, to reduce our expenditure to what is necessary, and to be more than content to do so because it will enable us to spare all the more for those who are worse off than ourselves. Our vast industrial population will be hit the hardest; they will suffer most terribly. We must live as far as possible a common life with them, bearing as much of the burden as we can, helping and sharing to the uttermost.

But with this thought of life stripped bare by misfortune, there comes this other—of the citadel of the soul which no calamity can touch. It is the one thought of joy and exultation in this welter of blind human passion. If in the day of prosperity alone we have faith in God we are of all men the most miserable. But it is not so. Have not some of us talked with our own hearts in the night watches, and found ourselves thrown back as perhaps never before upon the love of God and the help of Jesus Christ. Only let the strain be severe enough and the Christian knows with strong personal assurance that faith will not drag at its anchor. And so we venture to give our readers this advice, which we shall try humbly to follow ourselves. Trust in God. Read your Bible as well as the newspaper. Give yourselves to prayer. Nourish your hearts on the hopes and promises of the Gospel. Be strong and of a good courage, knowing this, that whatever disasters may befall us outwardly God is still able to keep the hearts of his faithful people in the fellowship of immortal love and the peace of JESUS CHRIST.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

NATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

"EACH nation, discriminated by its individuality from all the rest, forms a separate organism, and lives a distinct life, and expressing its unity in some sovereign head, the symbol and embodiment of its being, claims and takes its place among the administrators of this world and the agents of history. It thus becomes invested with all the attributes of a Person; performing responsible actions; possessing indefeasible rights; making binding engagements; animated by a common consciousness; maintaining its identity from age to age, and gifted with indefinite life. To give intenser expression to this undying personality of the State, and cover over the very semblance of interruption, most nations have symbolised their life by hereditary servants, as the nearest approach to perpetuity of aspect and of will. Those who cannot conceive of a person apart from the corporeal shape of a man may be inclined to treat this doctrine of the personality of the State as a mere legal fiction; yet without it they cannot advance a step in describing the simplest historic realities. When they say 'England did this,' or 'France pledged herself to that,' they mean neither the soil, the living inhabitants, nor the men in power, of these countries; for the first is not an agent, and the others will pass away, yet the act and pledge be visited on fresh generations. This moral continuity of a State, whereby without offence to justice the sins of the fathers are visited on the children, and retribution strides by centuries yet finds the delinquent out at last, has in it something more than you can explain and justify by any mere individualism; it implies a collective life and collective accountability, distinct from the cycle of private experience; a law between whose pulsations guilty generations may escape, but whose solemn throb is felt through history. To me, I confess, there is something very mysterious in this personality of nations; nor can I persuade myself that it is a mere fiction of human thought. Certain it is that God's government goes by it, and it is hard to think that He would conform Himself in His facts to our empty tricks of abstraction. He treats a nation as if it were a person, calling it to account as identical when not a creature in it remains the same; crowding it with recompense when the heroes that made it have made way for degenerate heirs. If God acts upon a fiction, who will tell me what is real?

"On what terms then are national personalities to subsist side by side, and adjust their lodgment on this earth? All are alike amenable to the universal moral law, and bound to act wholly within the limits of justice and veracity. This is a condition into which everything human, every will, individual or collective, is born, and from which no social partnership, no plea of polity, will enable it to escape. The doctrine that truth, honour, and magnanimity are good only for private life, and have no place in the intercourse of nations; that self-interest is the single aim, and chicanery and violence the allowable means of action in the State; that history can be summoned before no moral tribunal, but must have a character of its own entitled to brand the noble and justify the guilty, is the creed, however common, of a shameless atheism which believes in force and ends in tyranny. Between State and State, as between person and person, the right and true has eternal obligation, which no human vote created, and no human vote annuls. It is in vain that men in their lax tolerance and affected wisdom pretend to slur a public crime or canonise mendacious promises; God abides the same, and only waits to show Himself inexorably just; the false race withers from the root, and proves to be no perennial in the field of time."

JAMES MARTINEAU.

(From National Duties and other Sermons.)

THE flags of war like storm birds fly,
The charging trumpets blow;
Yet rolls no thunder in the sky,
No earthquake strives below.

And, calm and patient, Nature keeps
Her ancient promise well,
Though o'er her bloom and greenness sweeps
The battle's breath of hell.

And still she walks in golden hours,
Through harvest-happy farms,
And still she wears her fruit and flowers
Like jewels on her arms.

What mean the gladness of the plain,
This joy of eve and morn,
The mirth that shakes the beard of grain
And yellow locks of corn?

Ah! eyes may well be full of tears,
And hearts with hate are hot;
But even-paced come round the years,
And Nature changes not.

She meets with smiles our bitter grief,
With songs our groans of pain;
She mocks with tint of flower and leaf
The war field's crimson stain.

Still, in the cannon's pause we hear
Her sweet thanksgiving-psalm;
Too near to God for doubt or fear,
She shares the eternal calm.

She knows the seed lies safe below
The fires that blast and burn;
For all the tears of blood we sow
She waits the rich return.

She sees with clearer eye than ours
The good of suffering born—
The hearts that blossom like her flowers
And ripen like her corn.

Oh, give to us in times like these
The vision of her eyes,
And make her fields and fruited trees
Our golden prophecies!

Oh, give to us her finer ear!
Above this stormy din,
We too would hear the bells of cheer
Ring peace and freedom in.

WHITTIER.

O clear-eyed Faith, and Patience, thou
So calm and strong!
Send strength to weakness, teach us how
The sleepless eyes of God look through
This night of wrong!

WHITTIER.

WE beseech thee, O Lord, be gracious to our times; that both national quietness and Christian devotion may be duly maintained by thy bounty; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

O GOD our Father, good beyond all that is good, fair beyond all that is fair, in whom is calmness and peace; do thou make up the dissensions which divide men from each other, and bring us back into an unity of love, which may bear some likeness to thy divine nature. Grant that we may be spiritually one, through that peace of thine which maketh all things peaceful. Amen.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT.

OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY CONSIDERED.

BY DR. JAMES DRUMMOND.

"Ye are not under law, but under grace."—ROMANS vi. 14.

IN a recent number of the Hibbert Journal there is a deeply interesting article, entitled "Some Laymen's Needs," by Sir Francis Younghusband. It is a statement of religious difficulties, which are so gently and reverently expressed that the perusal of them attracts one's sympathy instead of exciting hostility. While fully admitting the reality and the validity of the religious consciousness, he is uncertain how it ought to be interpreted; and while acknowledging the high moral power of Christianity at the time of its inception he thinks that in many respects it seems to fall short of the nobler ideals which present themselves to the modern mind. These or similar difficulties probably affect many thoughtful men at the present day, and in the hope of affording some little help to those who seek for guidance, I propose to offer a few reflections on the nature of Christianity, and on some of its particular precepts. I may claim at least one qualification which Sir Francis Younghusband desires: I am pledged to nothing but truth. Christianity is, indeed, the one great spiritual power which has entered into my life; but I have been always free to study its records for myself, and to form my own conception of its essential meaning, of the truth of its teaching, and of its ethical ideals; and I may add that my conception of it has undergone profound modification in the course of my long life, without any sense of renouncing what I was professionally bound to defend. And now, while I think I understand, and regard with sympathy the difficulties which are felt, I find that they do not touch the innermost core of my Christian faith.

The general question to be considered is the following: Is it true that in Christianity, as presented in the New Testament, "is laid down the perfect ideal for all time, unsurpassed and unsurpassable"? Or, in words which are sometimes used, is Christianity absolute and final? To this question I frankly reply, I do not know. The absolute and final hover in the upper air to beguile the enthusiasm of philosophers, and have little practical bearing. What God may have in store for his human children twenty, or thirty, or a hundred thousand years hence lies entirely beyond the range of my calculation; but that Christianity presents a grand spiritual ideal, which it would be good for the world to reach (and, by all means, if possible, to surpass) is my firm conviction; and I will even add that we obtain in it revealing glimpses of the eternal Spirit, which we may, indeed, at some future time behold in more glorious vision, but which will never be detected as a deceitful mirage. Now this acceptance of Christianity as adequate, and, in relation to our immediate outlook, as final, depends on a distinctive quality by which the religion, as presented in the New Testament, is characterised. No religion can be final, even for a comparatively limited period, which is set in fixed moulds of thought, or offers salvation through a prescribed ritual, or the formal observance of definite rules of conduct; for these restrictions, being necessarily conditioned by time and place, and by the fleeting modes of thought and knowledge, are sooner or later outgrown. Christianity in its origin was not thus limited. Among the great religions of the world it stands alone, so far as I know, as a pure religion of the Spirit. The early disciples were "not under law, but under grace," or, in other words, they were not subject to an external rule of faith or practice, but to the impelling power of an inward Divine life, which had come into the world in Jesus Christ, "the first-born among many brethren." This "Spirit of Life" may abide when fancied knowledge has passed away, and men's beliefs and aims have been raised by advancing civilisation to higher levels. The first century affords a startling exemplification of this truth. It was firmly believed that Jesus would return in person from the sky during the existing generation, to establish the kingdom of God in the world, and sit in judgment upon the nations. This hope lay deep in the mind of Paul, and profoundly influenced his Gospel. But the generation passed, and the hard facts of history shattered the disciples' expectations. One might suppose that Christianity could not have survived the crash. But it was saved by its spiritual power, that inward life which raised men into communion with God, and filled their hearts with trust and love. So it has ever been. Tongues cease, prophecies fail, knowledge passes away; but faith, hope, and love abide. The moral and spiritual impulse imparted to the world by Christ's exalted and commanding personality works so powerfully in men's minds that it survives the dissolving dreams of their sleepy intelligence, and their imperfect interpretations of the world around them, and impels them, forgetting the things that are behind, to press forward to a nobler vision and a purer activity. Thus, to use Christ's own comparison, the Kingdom of God is like a little seed planted in the heart of society, growing by its own inherent power, and adapting itself to the ever-varying circumstances of human civilisation. The supreme work of Christianity is to touch and awaken the Divine ideal in us, and then permitting this ideal to find expression as it may amid the imperfect conditions of our life. We "are not under law, but under grace," folded in the love of God, and showing forth in dim and shadowy forms the beauty and power of his Holy Spirit.

It is admitted as "beyond dispute that in the first century of our era the spiritual forces of mankind were quickened to an unprecedented degree. . . and that mankind will derive lasting benefit from the impulses thus given." The limitations and the exclusive claims, to which Sir Francis Younghusband objects, I also set aside. "God has never left himself without a witness." "In every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of him." He that doeth the will of God is Christ's brother. What can be more universal than such statements? But need we, because Christianity is more universal and less exclusive than we thought, cease to place ourselves under its influence, and withdraw from all the sacred associations of its long and wonderful history? And even if it can be ultimately proved that Jesus himself held some views which were natural at the time, but in our completely altered knowledge of the universe could now appeal only to ignorance or fanaticism, need we love him less, or look unmoved at his cross, or regard with diminished reverence the grand elements of his teaching which have appealed to our heart and conscience? The admitted power of Christianity in the first age was due, as I have said, to a sublime and commanding character, one so governed by the Spirit of God that he became himself the Word, written no longer on tables of stone, but on fleshy tables of the heart. Through all its changing forms and aberrations Christendom has preserved that life, and through its corporate expression and communion the individual soul may still find increase of life, and be lifted above its ordinary level into that ideal scene where the Spirit speaks to our present wants, and reveals the duty of to-day.

This view, which lays stress on the total spiritual impression, and provides for expansion and the application of great principles in ways unthought of in the first age, seems to me to remove difficulties which certainly arise when the New Testament is regarded as a collection of little Divine sentences, each complete in itself, out of special relation to the circumstances of the hour, and so containing absolute truth and prescription for all time. Let us consider a few of these difficulties.

The objections which are urged in regard to the whole tenour of the Sermon on the mount, and to some of its particular precepts, appear to be founded, to a very large extent, on a misconception of its nature and purport. Historically it is a collection of sayings handed down by oral tradition, and translated from Aramaic into Greek. I believe that such sayings might be remembered, and probably were remembered, with great accuracy; but unless we fall back upon the old hypothesis of a protective miracle, it is obvious that we cannot depend upon the very words, as though they must be free from every possible flaw, but must accept the entire utterance "in the spirit, and not in the letter." This view seems to be sustained by the whole character of the teachings. Whether these chapters in our Gospels are the condensed record of an actual sermon or an editorial compilation of remembered sayings, it is clear that they are neither an external law, to be fulfilled with literal exactness, nor a philosophical treatise, laying down with careful precision an ethical theory, but a popular appeal to the men of that day to carry out and expand the finest moral precepts of their own acknowledged code. But as the words came from a pure and exalted soul, they enshrine beautiful sayings which the world will never let go, and are full of spiritual suggestion for all, even of the present day, who will surrender themselves to their searching power. In the light of these considerations let us look at some of the objections in detail.

Sir Francis Younghusband says of the Sermon on the Mount, "Through it all runs the idea of outside authority, with its rewards and punishments—a thoroughly Oriental conception. We are to be good because we are told to be good, and because we will be rewarded if we are, and punished if we are not." If he means that righteousness is not obligatory, that there is no such thing as duty, and that rewards and punishments do not enter at all into the Divine administration of the world, I am unable to follow him; for the sense of obligation which implies an "outside authority" seems quite fundamental in our moral nature. But if he means that the Sermon on the Mount so limits its appeal as to teach a purely selfish morality, I can only wonder at such an interpretation; for the whole tendency of the Sermon seems to me to lift us into the region of absolutely disinterested goodness. The teaching about rewards is in effect this: Do nothing for the sake of earth's rewards, or in order to gain the applause of men, but leave the question of reward altogether to God, Who knows the secrets of the heart. And what are the Divine rewards proposed? That men seeing your good works may glorify your Father in heaven; that ye may be sons of your Father in heaven. How is it possible to understand these lofty aims as an appeal to our selfishness? An answer to our secret prayers, a more complete abnegation of self, a communion of Divine love raising us towards the perfection of God—these are the rewards held before us, truly great, inconceivably blessed rewards. But is it not an abuse of words to represent them as rewards in the offensive sense which makes goodness subservient to pleasure? And as regards authority, we are told, indeed, that Jesus taught with authority, and not as the scribes. But the scribes had precisely the authority that is objected to; for they were the official expounders of a law, of which every word was believed to be infallible, whereas Jesus was an unauthorised teacher, who without the recognised sanctions obtruded himself on their province. But the authority of Jesus was that of a soul on fire with Divine ideals, and delivering with the profound conviction of immediate knowledge the word of God that spoke direct to his heart and conscience. It was an appeal from the outside authority to the inward authority of every man's calmest and holiest judgment.

We must now turn from the general character of the Sermon to notice briefly a few of its details.

The old objection is repeated, that the injunction to "take no thought for the morrow" is a piece of most unwise "Oriental fatalism"; for "men have to take thought what they shall eat, and what they shall drink, and wherewithal they shall be clothed." I think, however, that the passage is misunderstood. The Greek word translated "take thought" means "to be anxious," and indicates a divided state of mind, full of distracting cares. Paul, perhaps referring to this very precept, uses the same word, "be careful for nothing," where the word "careful" has not its modern sense, but means full of care and anxiety. Paul, however, did not expect food and clothing to come without effort. He laboured with his hands for his own support, and bluntly told lazy men that he who would not work ought not to eat. The whole of that beautiful passage in the Sermon on the Mount is a warning against a divided mind, full of worry about things which, though necessary, are transient. It says in effect, do your duty, and then accept trustfully what comes. Food and clothing are necessary; but do not make them your first object. Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. Trust, and be at peace. This is a rule which, so far from crippling our energies, makes them work in smooth and happy efficiency.

Complaint is also made of the "injunction to judge not that we be not judged," for "we cannot deny that it is good for us to be judged and criticised by others, and good for others that we should criticise them." But surely this interpretation is putting a severe strain on popular teaching. It seems obvious from the whole passage that the precept is directed against the harsh and reckless judgments which are still far too prevalent, and do not benefit, and are not intended to benefit their objects. And if we are ever censorious and bitter, is it not well to remember that, though we have not the faults for which we so hotly censure our neighbour, we may have others which are, perhaps, worse? And is it not really a torturing literalism which finds here a prohibition of judgments carefully formed, and given in humility and love?

Another imperfection, strange to say, is found in the commandment to love our neighbour as ourselves, for "there have been many men, and perhaps still more women, who have loved their neighbours not merely as themselves, but far more than themselves; who have given up their lives, not only in death, but better still in life, for their neighbours—for loved individuals, for their country, for humanity." I find it hard to understand how anyone can suppose that self-love was the measure of what Christ meant by love. Did not he love, and give himself in life and death for the world? The writer seems to have forgotten that the precept in question was borrowed from the ancient law, where it is assigned the second place; that Jesus himself gave an extension to the word neighbour which was very unwelcome to the Jew of that time; and that he expressly condemns this very commandment as insufficient. "It was said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy; but I say unto you, love your enemies," I am not sure that the Balkan "Christians," not to say some English journalists and politicians, have risen greatly above this precept. Before my own eyes it burns as a lurid star of condemnation for those on whose lips the name of Christ is a blasphemy, but shines as a star of glory for those who submit themselves to his yoke, and have quenched through the power of his spirit the fires of hatred and malice.

A further flaw is discovered in the injunction to pluck out the right eye and cut off the right hand if these offend. It is admitted that this is not to be taken literally, but it is said that it does enforce "the policy of suppression." "If the right hand offend, it should not be cut off, but turned to some useful work." This interpretation may, indeed, be suitable to the words, but it does not appear to be necessary. The language is strongly figurative, and is tantamount to this—submit to any sacrifice rather than give way to the indulgence of sinful thoughts or deeds. Christ's life and teaching as a whole certainly do not enforce the policy of suppression. He expressly contrasts himself in this respect with John the Baptist. The latter, owing to the severity of his moral character, was an ascetic, though there is no evidence that even he attached merit to asceticism. But Jesus deliberately shocked the religious prejudices of his time, and was denounced as a glutton and a winebibber. This surely means that he was full of joyful humanity, and freely accepted the innocent pleasures that life provides. It has always appeared to me that Christianity differed from much moral and religious teaching precisely in its not suppressing, but glorifying the whole of our complex nature; and Paul, though using his own metaphor, does not rise above the practice of his Master when he says that the body is a temple of the Holy Spirit.

Lastly it is said that "the excessive disparagement of the rich for no other reason than that they are rich, and exaltation of the poor for no other reason than that they are poor, is also adjudged a defect." There can be no doubt that Jesus formed a very different estimate of poverty and wealth from that which was then prevalent, and is indeed still to be found. The rich man, however callous and selfish, was treated with deference, and on account of his gold ring might be shown to a good seat in the synagogue. The poor man, however virtuous, met with bare civility, and might even be treated with rudeness and contempt. I suppose every moralist would agree with Christ's denunciation of this wrong estimate. But such disparagement falls far short of saying that the rich man as such is bad and the poor man as such is good; and I do not think that Jesus ever says so. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus is appealed to as decisive. On a superficial view it may seem to inculcate the doctrine which is objected to, but only on a superficial view. It is addressed to the avaricious, who justified themselves before men, while God knew their hearts, and is intended to warn them that the order of spiritual judgment is widely different from that which is recognised in the world, and that a man rich enough to live in regal splendour, who, in his selfish ease and luxury, cared nothing for the sorrow and pain lying at his doors, pain which attracted the sympathy even of the dogs, will find, when death comes, that their positions may be entirely reversed. Shakespeare's King Lear began to feel this when he exclaimed:

Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are,

That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,

How shall your houseless heads, and unfed sides,

Your loop'd and window'd raggedness, defend you

From seasons such as these? O, I have ta'en

Too little care of this! Take physic, pomp;

Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel;
That thou may'st shake the superflux to them,

And show the heavens more just.

The great gulf which separates those in Abraham's bosom from the rich man in his torment is not intended to bar the exercise of mercy, for Abraham, who himself was numbered among the rich, addresses the sufferer by the tender word "child"; but it represents the impassable distinction between goodness and selfishness. It cannot be meant that the good must never minister to the wants of the bad; for who like Christ has overleaped the gulf between virtue and sin, and poured balm upon the festering wounds of conscious guilt? No; but persistent selfishness must bear its doom, and can no longer command the services of supposed inferiors. Nor may it plead ignorance. God has not left himself without a witness, and those who have hardened their hearts against warnings which they knew and disregarded would not be persuaded by incidents that do not enter into the providence of God. Thus the parable, though not without its difficulties, seems to teach a clear and true lesson, and to lift us from our earthly judgments into the region of spiritual values.

To sum up, then, the Gospels are not to be interpreted as though they were a legal code, designed to set forth precise lines of duty for all time. They are to be read under the impression of their spirit as a whole. "The Spirit of Life in Christ"—that is the basis of Christianity; and that is a spirit which kindles the aspiring flame of great ideals, and teaches us to walk no longer as children under the fetters of a strict rule, but as full-grown men, exercising their own judgment under the guidance of justice, holiness, and love. For "we are not under law, but under grace."

OUR FIRST DUTY.

OUR first duty is to forgive from our hearts the callous wickedness that has caused the unparalleled disaster. We shall all suffer. There will be terrible recriminations. A time will come when there will be heard cries of vengeance. When it arrives, may we have the grace to forgive those who have so hurt us and those we love. If we can do this, and preserve love through all the agony and darkness that are coming upon civilisation, there will once more be seen the all-healing power of forgiving love. That is the one bright gleam in all the cloud. If we can read the signs of the times aright, we shall see how, even now, God has not left the world to itself. Already, it has been observed by preachers that the crisis has brought a strange, unwonted solemnity upon congregations. It is to many a startling revelation, this sudden dropping away of the solid-seeming foundations of order in civil life, and credit in business, and the safeguards of law. The whole fabric of our social amenity is seen, as by a momentary flash of lightning in a dark night, to rest upon spiritual realities—upon will, and trust, and the imagination of peoples. Now is the time for straight speaking, and the call for searching of hearts, and repentance, and the quest for God. Even the most obtuse can now be made to see that nations cannot for ever dodge the moral law, or build a fabric of good on a foundation of hate.

W. WHITAKER.

TWO VOICES ARE THERE.

ALONG the low cliffs marking the limit of the land toward a wide bay on the Yorkshire coast, the fields of wheat come up to the edge, save where the feet of passers-by have made a path. Sauntering along this path, a very diverse sound will fill your ears. On one side the long roar of the sea as it rolls over the broad, firm and flat sandy beach. On the other—the rustling of the corn.

The rise and fall of the curved waves, the charge and retreat of the white foaming horses of Neptune blend into that continuous choric which constitutes the fundamental note, the deep F of Nature's diapason. It is the pulse of the ocean's heart in answer to the caress of the moon, made vocal—systole and diastole so quickly following as to make one beat, one massive, multitudinous murmur.

But the sighing of the wandering wind as it sweeps through the waving wheat makes a note so many octaves higher as by comparison with the wild welter of the waters to be but a dream of sound. It is like a sleeper's moan, or the muttering of a seer at the advent of a vision. It is nature in reverie; and the events of her day-dreaming are æons old, things which the unresting sea has no leisure to remember.

Very different still is the effect of the wind on the swaying stalks and clashing together of myriad ears of grain. Here is a sound that has warmed the poet's heart for countless ages, Assyrian and Slav, Dravidian and Druid, Cossack and Canadian. Its music will only cease to charm when the mouth shall cease to desire food, and the eye cease to revel in motion and colour, and the weary hand cease to rejoice in the reward of honoured labour. As I stay to listen a limitless line of generations, past and to come, pause to listen by my side. I have listened so long that I forgot how long, whether a day or ten thousand years—for the spell had abolished the sense of time, had flung away the plummet into the Deep. As the wind rises and falls, there is a crescendo and diminuendo in the world-old melody; just as there is a brilliancy and dulness in the green sea with the shining and obscuring by opalescent clouds of the sun. As I came along in the train and saw the many signs of toil in the fields, I reproached myself for my holiday-making. I reflected how much better a form of holiday for men habitually immured in office, mill, workshop, or study, than a period of utter indolence and voluntary inactivity, were an exchange of occupation with the potato-digger, the harvester, or the fisherman. But since being on the cliffs Nature has stupefied my conscience and allured me to acquiescence with social sixes and sevens.

For I have scooped up the fluent sands with a mussel-shell, brilliant enough in colour to ladle wine from the chalice of Charity for the Lord of Love; I have traced with awed admiration the perfect spirals of the exquisite little sand-snail shells; and the red poppies have marched past flinging their flaming banners of revolt against my scruples; the rest-harrow creeping along the ground has laid snares of delicate pink to noose my fancy; and the harebells on the very edge of the cliffs swinging their carols over the holes where the martins breed have called for quietude and assent.

Great entertainment was provided by two humble-bees who chummed up to me, one bedecked in sable and orange, and the other in stripes of lemon and black. They were on holiday like myself, content to see God in the passing hours, and quite oblivious of the rainy days and sere to come. They let me smooth down their plush thorax, they let me lift them from one scabious head to another, they let me transfer them to a convolvulus, and they demonstrated to me their rather clumsy way of extracting nectar from differently shaped blossoms. While we were thus at play came on the scene a sober-suited honey-bee. At once one saw what knowledge meant, what efficiency meant, and purposive effort, and foresight. Here was science at last, with all the acumen, despatch, economy that it implies. The gilded popinjays might look best in the summer hour, but it is not to their store one would resort in the winter dearth.

Which reflection became a parable sooner than I had foreseen. Here I had thought myself safe from wars and rumours of wars. But no! A battalion of soldiers comes marching over the sands, leaving on the imagination a track of bloodshed and brutality, until I longed for the waves to rush in and erase all traces of their destructive mission. But they are the heroes of the hour—these men who produce nothing, who create nothing—who simply devastate in an hour the strenuous hind's labour, the thinker's thought, the artist's dream patiently exerted for a generation.

Upon them as they tramp along, the unhappy victims of the great illusion rather than responsible agents of intelligible ends, are the eyes of youth and maid, and sage dame and sire. There are none for those bent figures in the turnip fields on the hill-side—yet it is on those bent figures the nation's life depends, it is they who maintain the country's populous throng. It is their going forth early in the bitter wind, it is their drenching in the rain, it is their endless hours of labour, it is their spare board, it is their damp cottages and limbs racked with pain, that are the price of the pageant of flashing sabres and rattling drums.

Some days ago the Leeds Art Gallery showed me the picture of the Soldier's Dream. But no corn grew where the steelmen bivouacked, and it was not the clean clouds that filled the sky of the picture. Faint must be the eyes that cannot peer beneath that so-called "glory" into the cauldron of desolating horrors and savage barbarities.

Ah! is it this secret which the wind has been whispering all day long beneath the serene hours? Has it seen the things it is afraid even to whisper as it fled over battlefields and burning villages and sacked cities?

Is it the moans of men who knew not why they died that have mingled with its southing? Is it the cry of famine and rapine that has come from afar? Was that a child's stifled shriek and that a woman's vain call for help? Be still, O wind! or blow this madness of war away from the hearts of men!

Have the labourers in the field no glory, then? Aye, for them is the glory of the ripening wheat, and the melodiousness of its rustling. For them the benediction of the bounteous earth, and the silent beauty of the flowers, and the bird-song at eventide, and the genial sunshine, and all gentle and gracious influences of sky and earth. And for them, too, something of the Patience of the Eternal that endures the pathetic blundering of bloody-minded men. While they slay the corn ripens, which shall feed and make to live and gladden the hearts of men.

MARY'S COUNTRY.

The club leader, in conference with her helpers, decided Mary Rugg must go. The following night should be her last one in the club, there was no question of another chance, she would simply be kept back when the other girls went and her membership cancelled.

"I dislike to say anything of the kind," said the club leader, "but Mary is a low-class girl; she uses bad language I'm certain, but she's sly and I've only caught her once; she has a bad influence on the other girls, and she is disgustingly dirty."

So the fiat went forth—Mary Rugg must go.

The new helper sat beside Mary and talked to her, Mary, who was converting white crocheted cotton into black, by working a chain, remarked casually:

"I ain't never done nothing like this before."

"You must let me teach you a pattern," said the new helper; she was unaware Mary's doom was sealed, so was Mary, actually, but it is possible from the look in the club leader's eye that she had felt dismissal imminent. The helper regarded Mary and felt extraordinarily repelled. The girl was short and thick-set, her face was dirty white, her eyes dark brown and quite vividly evil, her mouth a weak slit. Her hat of aged black was crammed down on her head, provisionally, perhaps; a dirty big grey coat covered a presumably dirtier frock. Her hands, as has been hinted, were black.

"What do you work at, Mary?" she asked.

"Rag-sorting. 'Tain't much of a job, is it?"

"No, I should not think it was. Can't you get a better one?"

"Never tried, it's good enough for me, and besides, wouldn't do for me to get out of work. Mother helps a bit, but she can't do much, my money keeps us mostly. Not that it's much," Mary grimaced.

There was a sympathetic silence.

"I only gets seven and six, and works ten and a half hours every day."

"That's very hard work for very little money, Mary. How do you manage?"

"Well, mother gets a bit orange peeling this time of year for marmalade at Wolff's and puts by; and then in August and September I goes hopping."

"Do you like that?"

The evil eyes lifted, and through the veil the helper saw beyond. She quivered inwardly; was she touching the fringe of another's soul garment?

"Like it! Why I luv's it! I get that brown and scorched you wouldn't know me. It's right in the country we go, down by Westerham. Do you know it, miss? And we are out o' doors all day, and the sun and the wind—" the crocheted dropped, the dirty hands clasped and unclasped themselves, touching quickly now and again the listener's knee—"we slept in a tent last year, and I could go out in the night—ever been out o' night? It's all still and the stars looks fine—" Mary paused for want of breath.

"Yes, Mary!"

"And once I heard a bird, a lark, one of the fellers said, a-singing in the middle of the night, I did," almost defiantly.

"Yes, I have heard a midnight lark, too!"

"And then they have a coffee stall, and services, and we sing in the dinner hour—at our bin you can hear them singing ever so far away—it's fine, all up and down. And the sun ain't half hot on your neck..." the strange eyes which looked as if scales had dropped from them looked fixedly at the companion, her voice went lower:

"Have you ever seen the dawn, and the wind a-coming all cold?"

"Yes, Mary, and the first gold rim of the sun peeping over the hills, perhaps."

"It's fine," said Mary, "I love the country," she drew her chair nearer, "I gets mad for it, a-doing them old rags and I wants to get away; now I'll be wild to-morrow 'cos you made me talk of the country."

"What's old Mary saying about the country?" cried two big rough girls. "Mary don't know nothing about the country, she's never been there. She's only kidding you, miss, don't you believe her."

The red blood burnt in Mary's face, and she turned on the two, a foul word escaped her lips; for a moment the helper saw her eyes with the veil still lifted, and then down swept the shadow of evil again.

"Kidding her, of course I was—I knows nothing about the country and cares less. Give me the Old Kent-road of a Saturday night and I'm happy—" Hitchy-koo, hitchy-koo!" and Mary broke in loud song and laughter and struck a rakish attitude.

But the helper said:

"If that was kidding, I liked it, Mary."

"Oh, garn," said Mary.

The new helper pleaded for Mary.

"I'm sorry, dear, you do not know the girl like I do, she has a bad record, and, as the girls say, she was simply having you on."

The new helper wept.

"She may have been stuffing me, but she meant it—it was real."

But Mary Rugg was doomed, and she went.

On a wretched bed in a basement back room a girl lay sobbing, the black tears streaming down her face.

"It wasn't kidding, it wasn't kidding. I wants it, the sun and the birds and all, and I shan't never see it—"

And so Mary of the bad record sobbed herself to sleep to dream of the country she had never seen, but which was real to her, though the knowledge was only gathered from her friends' talk and scraps from Nature notes in newspapers.

SAINT OR SEER?

SIR,—Please ask Mr. Lloyd Thomas not to be angry with me if I remain unrepentant. I grant him all he demands for the honour of his saints. I had no wish to depose them from their high seats of holiness. I cannot think that any "anti-ecclesiastical device" was lurking within when I used the words "saint" and "seer" to mark a distinction which no other words seemed to mark so well. Mr. Thomas may suspect such motive, even as I might suspect the ecclesiastical motive in his arraignment, but it is better not to suspect.

I am not even concerned to claim that the seer is the higher type of human greatness, though to me it often seems the higher. It certainly is a different type, and one towards which the everyday man and woman will ascend, I think, as the race advances on the great highways of progress. There are great names of men who were, unquestionably, seers, but to whom we never apply the word saint; the Buddha, the Christ, Socrates, Plato, Dante, Giordano Bruno, Shakespeare, Goethe, Wordsworth, Emerson, Whitman, to mention only some of the best known. It seems natural to write "St. Paul," or "St. Thomas Aquinas," but "St. Jesus" or "St. Dante"! St. Augustine is all right, but who that loves Francis of Assisi does not prefer him without the "St."? And how strangely out of place those letters look when Mr. Thomas puts them before Joan of Arc!

But a controversy about the use of words is rarely profitable, and I refrained from writing last week, deeming it better to lie still under my critic's rebukes, yet grant this brief reply now, if it seems worth while, and take this further illustration of my theme: If in these days of grim and ghastly war, on which, from without, no light can fall but that of lurid horrors, crime and shame, we, like that unknown seer who wrote the "Bhagavad Gita," with its wondrous talk before the hour of battle—turn not away from the fierce strife, but look steadily into it and through it, and discern beyond it that holier human world which shall arise, when this mad folly of diplomatists and rulers has spent itself, and the people arise in their strength to demand that these armaments for slaughter shall be put away, and the fellowship of nations knit together in the rivalries of peace and emulations of reasonable love, established in their stead—this will be Seership, and will serve to hold us calm amid the strife, and, it may be, make us strong to aid that holier purpose of the world to fulfil itself, when the fury of human passion shall have spent itself and the spirit of brotherhood shall come to its own among the nations.—Yours, &c.,

"A NEW TYPE OF CHRISTIAN."

SIR,—One is not much inclined at this moment of crisis to enter into controversies of theology or philosophy. I should like to make clear, however, to the Rev. H. H. Johnson, that his statement in the article of July 18 that my "recent prophecy" as he calls it "could only have been made in ignorance" of contributions like those of Foerster and Mr. Whitaker is not true. Psychology, sociology, and education do not teach that "the Christian religion is the sole foundation for both individual and social life," though Dr. Foerster's experience of these sciences may have led him to that conclusion. Physics does not teach Theism, though many have been led to theistic faith through physical research. Profs. L. T. Hobhouse and Ed. Westermarck are two leading psychologists and sociologists (under whom it was my privilege to study), but they are far from finding that the facts of these sciences lead to Foerster's conclusion.

I cannot, in view of the present state of affairs, refrain from reference to the Rev. H. H. Johnson's analogy of nationality. If we had only realised a little more vividly the oneness of our common humanity, and relegated our national differences to their secondary position, the present European disaster would have been impossible. It is just the constant emphasising of differences, and claiming of superiorities, that foments misunderstanding and unbrotherliness, alike in politics and religion.—Yours, &c.,

THE DECLINE IN PUBLIC WORSHIP.

SIR,—Many pertinent suggestions have been made explanatory as to a lessening of interest in public worship, and in your issue of the 1st a year's business training is advised. No one appears to have urged the self-training in the art of preaching. Disguise this as we may, I doubt if any successful preacher has not given much attention to these arts which make for effectiveness in the pulpit. Very little attention is paid to the matter at colleges; more perhaps to the matter of reading and elocution than used to be; but as to the practical effectiveness of discourses I doubt if student critics or professorial think as much of that detail as of the exegesis and composition. I spent seven years at college, and certainly cannot remember I gained much useful experience in that period and from critical help. Whatever assistance I got was from personal effort. I made it a practice to listen to all the best preachers, and endeavoured to discover what made for their effectiveness. I came into contact with several—amongst others, Mr. Chas. Spurgeon, Dr. Parker, and Thomas Jones—they were all very kind to the inquiring young aspirant, and serviceable. Mr. Spurgeon, at the request of sundry young friends, agreed to give us an address on elocution. In the course of that he was generally autobiographical, and stated: "I have toiled and struggled with voice training, and if I have succeeded in that culture"—we had splendid proofs he had—"it has been from sheer hard work, and years of it." Dr. Parker stated that during the years he spent at Banbury he had kept future possibilities in mind, and done his utmost to fit himself for them. In a true and best sense he was a self-made preacher. He studied indefatigably the art of preaching, and so did Thomas Jones.

Henry Ward Beecher, in his "Lectures on Preaching," tells how he found out the secret of power in the pulpit. His small book should be read by every ministerial student; all young ones too. There is invaluable advice in these lectures. Of course, the preacher must have something to say hearers want said, and deepest interest in and sympathy with his work, but interest must be created or attention cannot be compelled. Hence, it should never be forgotten, though we have a sound acquaintance with logic and rhetoric, read admirably, and are capital elocutionists, permanent interest and craved for effectiveness and influence never can be gained. But how often is it not discovered where men have excellent things to say—interest they do not ensure, and attention soon tires. Then, are we not conscious their neglect of voice cultivation, poor elocution, indifferently rhetoric, and so forth, reveal lack of success. I have listened to sermons that, to me, were intellectual treats, but the paucity of the regular congregations told its own story. If the preacher had studied the art of preaching his church could have been full of eager hearers. During the last two years I have strayed into the churches where the ministers were most able men. In one, the three Sunday mornings I went there were 20 in all present, and those included the choir and organist. In the other, perhaps 40, and that on a special anniversary of the church. Frankly, neither of these men were preachers who appeared to me as if they had studied the preaching art. In the town where I live there is no Unitarian church, and at nearly all others a poor Sunday congregation. I strolled recently into the parish church, which holds about 800. It was nearly full. When I listened to the vicar's reading of the service and his sermon I required no explanation of his large congregation. He has cultivated all his natural gifts and the preaching art. I have been to every place of worship in the place. That vicar is the only man who has troubled to make himself efficient in the pulpit. Badly attended churches often are the result of indifferently filled pulpits. Ministers are not keen on success as are actors and barristers. Dr. Channing's brother once told him: "If those in the pulpit felt the burden of dealing with men's souls, they would show it in their preaching." Congregations soon discover a man worth hearing and respecting, and flock to hear him.—Yours, &c.,

IN THE CAUSE OF PEACE.

SIR,—I write to ask if some special effort cannot be made to influence public opinion at this time when every heart is so deeply moved over this question of war, and the ethics of war. In times of security and peace this question troubles many of us but lightly, but now, in the face of the great catastrophe, none can be indifferent. I make a few suggestions which, if not practicable, may at least invoke wiser ones from others with more knowledge and experience than myself.

(1) That throughout the country should be distributed pamphlets published by peace societies, or written in the cause of peace.

(2) That sermons should be preached in our places of worship, and addresses given in public places, especially with the view of influencing young men.

(3) That, for the sake of future outlook with a higher ethical foundation than is universal at present, pamphlets, and public addresses where possible, in very simple language should be given to young children. These would, of course, contain nothing revolting, but would show the little ones that war is not the wonderful thing they believe it to be, but that it is cruel and ugly in spite of its attractions.—Yours, &c.,

AN APPEAL FOR INWARDNESS.

SIR,—I cannot allow Miss E. P. Pechey's article on "The Practice of the Presence of God" to go by without a word of appreciation. Miss Pechey would seem to adhere to an exoteric and esoteric religious standard, and rightly so; too. I have contended with learned and otherwise, with lay and ministerial followers of Christ for the existence of an esoteric side; many are they who have denied it, perceiving not that their own negation did but go to establish its existence. Miss Pechey's article is apt and timely; it is good that Christians should be brought to a knowledge of their poverty in matters appertaining to the spiritual life, and if they are ever to enter into the blessedness of the esoteric they must commence by carrying out the injunctions at the close of Mr. H. H. Johnson's letter. "Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom," said the Master, "but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." When Christians conjure sufficient "Faith" to do the will of the Father, the esoteric will become exoteric, and the problem of empty churches will be no more.—Yours, &c.,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

COURAGE AND ENDURANCE.

"OSCAR, what is the difference between courage and endurance?"

"Same thing."

"No, they can't be," argued Frank, "or Mr. Harper would not have set Philip's form to write an essay on the difference between them."

"If Mr. Harper thinks there is a difference he will expect the form to puzzle it out, but we need not worry our brains. Splitting hairs is not in my line."

Frank Hill was a thoughtful boy, who liked to get to the bottom of anything that perplexed him.

He stood some time at the window, drumming lightly on the pane, with what his mother knew as his "thinking-it-out" mood on him.

When Mrs. Hill entered the room he appealed to her. "Mother, do you see any difference between courage and endurance?"

"Yes, a great deal; indeed, the only excuse for anyone supposing them to be the same thing lies in the fact that, although you may have courage without endurance, you cannot show endurance without having some courage. Shall we see what Chambers' Dictionary says on the subject?" The book being produced, Frank read aloud: "Courage, the quality that enables men to meet dangers without fear; bravery; spirit." He turned to Endurance, and read this definition: "A suffering patiently without sinking; patience."

"Oh, mother, what a difference! But courage sounds the grandest—to meet dangers without fear; that is being brave; you must have spirit to do that!" and as he spoke Frank's eyes kindled with enthusiasm. "That is what soldiers and hunters and explorers do, isn't it?" said Oscar.

"The truly brave ones certainly do. And not these only, but a great army of men and women, sailors, miners, firemen, doctors, and nurses," said Mrs. Hill.

"I don't see what danger doctors and nurses have to face," said Oscar, "unless you mean army ones."

"What about those who visit people with dreadful diseases that are highly infectious, such as smallpox, cholera, and diphtheria?" asked the mother.

"But that is part of their regular work, and they are paid for doing it," returned Oscar, speaking, as usual, without reflection.

"And are not army doctors and nurses doing what is part of their regular work, and what they are paid for, when they attend to the wounded on the field," said Mr. Hill, who had entered during the discussion. "We must remember," he continued, "that soldiers, even the rawest and youngest, not only receive pay, but board and lodging, Sundays and weekdays, during peace as well as in war time, and are attended, free of all cost to themselves, by skilled doctors and nurses, not only on a battlefield, but also if they are ill in barracks or a home camp. Young folks do not realise that only a few men enter the army either as a glorious sort of patriotic sport, or purely for the sake of defending the Empire, while most men enlist as one way of making a living."

"Oh," said Oscar, "it doesn't seem a bit nice to think of soldiers being paid. I always think of them as fighting just for king and country."

"And the honour of the flag," put in Frank, "or because they love their leader."

"Like the 'Two Grenadiers' in Heine's fine ballad," said his father. "I believe your mother will confess, as I must, that in our young days we felt much as you do, and—I won't say over-valued the courage of soldiers, that, at its best, is priceless—but under-valued the courage of the other people especially women, who walk with open eyes and fearless hearts into danger; and this without the glamour of scarlet and gold or shining steel, and without the encouragement of comrades on either side, or the inspiring call of drum or bugle. The other day I came across an old issue of THE INQUIRER, which told how several years ago typhus fever broke out in a small island four miles from the west coast of Ireland. Typhus is greatly dreaded, as it very often proves fatal, so no one would go from the mainland to help the stricken people except one man, Dr. Smyth. He rowed over to find them living in the most wretched cabins without windows or proper chimneys, so it was impossible to ventilate them. He found them overcrowded, and so dark that he often had to light a candle in order to see his patients. Sometimes he found three in one bed. He looked after them single-handed for some time. Then he saw that the only chance for the poor sick folk was to get them out of their polluted homes to the mainland. When at last a medical inspector came over, Dr. Smyth decided, with his help, to get the poor people across, but no one would allow a boat to be used for the purpose."

"Why not?" cried Oscar.

"Lest those who used it afterwards should take the disease. At last, however, the two doctors obtained a crazy old boat, and carried the sick into it. It could only be kept afloat by the strongest convalescents baling out continually. I suppose the two doctors rowed. Five minutes after the last person had been landed the boat sank. Dr. Smyth took the fever, and, weakened as he was by his heavy toil, the illness ended in death."

"How dreadful, after his helping to save so many," said Frank. "Before you came in, father, we were talking about the difference between courage and endurance. Don't you think Dr. Smyth showed both; courage to go to the island, and endurance to make him go on day after day when he was so tired?"

"Right, my boy. Endurance is very often called in to finish the task which courage has begun. As a rule the part played by endurance is the least showy, and meets with less recognition than that played by active courage."

"One can't," said Mrs. Hill, "draw a line between the two, and say where passive endurance begins; but at least it can be said that when endurance does begin, courage has not finished its task. Sometimes it is harder to endure than to do."

"I would rather be famous for doing than enduring," said Oscar.

"Let us hope," returned his mother, "that if the call comes, you will be noble enough either to do or to endure without any thought of fame."

There was a long pause, then Frank said softly, "Mother, what about going of your own free will to meet danger with open eyes when you are afraid, greatly afraid?"

"I doubt, Frank, whether the world in general either finds out, or, if it finds it out, gives very much credit to the courage needed for that; but I am convinced that in God's sight it is of the very highest value, and I like to think that no such instances of heroism are ever passed over by the Recording Angel."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONFERENCE AT CONSTANCE.

THERE was a strange irony in the situation, when on Friday and Saturday of last week a company of British delegates representing various churches in this country undertook to journey across France to the German city of Constance, for the purpose of joining in an international Conference for the promotion of peace and mutual understanding among the nations. There was already the fear that France as well as Russia must be involved in the dreadful conflagration of war which had already broken out, but the one thing held with firm conviction at that time was that our Government would not permit this country to be dragged into the turmoil of the conflict, and it was our steadfast hope that Great Britain would remain a neutral Power, the friend of combatants on both sides, ready to mediate for peace at the first possible moment. In any case we felt that we must go forward to our Conference, unless we were literally turned back, and the journey from Boulogne by Laon through Friday night towards Bâle passed without incident, except for signs by the way, especially as we neared the frontier, that the French mobilisation was in active progress. But at Petits Croix the train was stopped, and we were not permitted to enter Germany. Many rumours were about, and we did not know that we might not be sent straight back to Boulogne. But by wearisome stages on Saturday morning, we made our way in another crowded train by Belfort and Delle, through French and Swiss territory, finally reaching Bâle long after we should have been at Constance. Two of our party had already left us for Paris, and at Bâle, unfortunately, Mr. Bowie in looking after his registered trunk missed the train which took us on to Constance, and had a very trying experience, as we heard five days later from Paris.

Late on the Saturday evening we reached Constance, and did not know until the train was actually in the station whether we should be permitted to enter Germany, and such meeting as we were about to hold was in fact prohibited throughout the Empire, but the Grand Duchess Louise, of Baden, sister of the Emperor Frederick, is an ardent friend of peace, and has from the first been deeply interested in the efforts of the Associated Councils of Churches in the British and German Empires for fostering friendly relations between the two countries. She had warmly welcomed the meeting of the Conference in Constance, and through her intervention special permission was granted for our meetings, and the police authorities were instructed from the highest quarter to give us all facilities and any protection that might be needed. Pastor Siegmund-Schultze, of Berlin, Secretary of the German Council, was indefatigable in making all arrangements and smoothing the way for us. Other of the British delegates, who had come earlier by different ways, were already there, and also a large party of Americans, together with representatives from France, Germany, Holland, Denmark, Switzerland, Norway, and Sweden. Appointed delegates from Austria and Italy had not been able to come.

On Sunday morning the Conference met, and again in the afternoon, though according to the original programme the sessions were to have been held on Monday and Tuesday. But after our arrival the tension became more acute, and it was clear by Sunday evening that if we were to reach home in reasonable safety, it would be necessary to leave on the following morning. The four French delegates returned home on Sunday evening. To the rest of us, Switzerland and France were closed, and our only way was through Germany and Holland. It was only through the special protection we received (and strict police supervision through Germany) that we were able to reach home as we did by Tuesday evening.

But the Conference did meet on Sunday morning, in the Hotel Insel, first of all for a service of devotion, over which Mr. J. Allen Baker, M.P., presided. Among those who took part were the Dean of Worcester (who read as lessons from Daniel ix. and John xiii.), Pasteur Elie Gounelle, of Paris, Dr. Siegmund-Schultze, Dr. Lynch, of New York, Bishop Hendrix, of the Methodist Episcopal Church of America, Dr. Clifford, Mme. Dalencourt, of Paris, and others. That morning, Mr. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., hon. secretary of the British Council, read the following letter from the Archbishop of Canterbury:

DEAR MR. DICKINSON,—You will know how closely my thoughts and (let me add) my prayers will be with you and your fellow counsellors at Constance in these coming days. The situation has, of course, changed most ominously since the time when the Conference was planned. But obviously it is right—indeed perhaps it is all the more right—that emphasis should be given to the eager wish we entertain that the members of Christian churches as such may be enabled to make their voices effectively heard in such an hour as this on behalf of what is righteous and wise, what is loyal to the suzerainty of the Prince of Peace. The lowering storms of the hour will add additional solemnity to your meeting and additional significance to your prayers. May you all have the guidance of God as you set yourselves to the task of discovering the best way possible, of securing for the voice of Christian people, speaking as Christians, the hearing it deserves.—I am, yours very truly,

RANDALL CANTUAR.

There was opportunity in the course of the service for the free utterance of prayer, and it was deeply touching to hear successive voices in English, German, and French blended in a common supplication for guidance and strength in the darkness and under the heavy burden of the dreadful catastrophe that overshadowed all alike. Yet it was not despair that spoke. Dr. Clifford's word, in spite of the appalling shock to all high ideals, was, "They that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength"; and out of our darkness many of us in silent prayer lifted up our hearts to the Eternal Light, and asked to be shown what our prayer in utter surrender and submission under this awful trial must be, and how the strength of the Eternal and His Righteousness and Love, still over all, may yet hold us up. It was in the spirit of renewed consecration to the ideal of peace and brotherly love that the Conference met, and spoke its word, and sought the help of the Highest.

It was so again in the evening, when further devotions were conducted by the Bishop of Lichfield, Dr. Merrill, of New York, Dr. Benander, of Stockholm, and others, and the following resolution was unanimously adopted, to be sent to the crowned heads of all the chief countries of Europe and their Prime Ministers, and also to the President of the United States, and others:—

"The Conference of members of Christian Churches, representing twelve countries and thirty confessions, assembled at Constance to promote friendly relations between nations, solemnly appeals to Christian rulers to avert a war between millions of men amongst whom friendship and common interests have been steadily growing, and thereby to save from disaster Christian civilisation and assert the power of the Christian spirit in human affairs."

Under the circumstances no full discussion on the lines laid down in the programme was possible, but the necessary business was done, and the Conference, established as a working force, even under conditions the most depressing and discouraging, on the side of peace and human brotherhood.

A series of resolutions, unanimously adopted, laid down the lines on which it is intended to work. The first was as follows:—

"That, inasmuch as the work of conciliation and the promotion of amity is essentially a Christian task, it is expedient that the Churches in all lands should use their influence with the peoples, Parliaments, and Governments of the world to bring about good and friendly relationships between the nations, so that, along the path of peaceful civilisation, they may reach that universal goodwill which Christianity has taught mankind to aspire after."

And the subsequent resolutions urged that all sections of the Church of Christ should act in concert to that end and steps should be taken in every country to form councils (denominational or interdenominational, as the case might require) "to enlist the Churches in their corporate capacity, in a joint endeavour to achieve the promotion of international friendship and the avoidance of war," and that a central bureau should be established for facilitating correspondence between such councils, collecting and distributing information and generally co-ordinating the work connected with the movement. A committee, with power to add to their number to carry out the objects of the Conference, was appointed as follows:—Mr. J. Allen Baker, M.P., London; the Right Hon. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., London; M. Jacques Dumas, Paris; M. le Prof. Louis Emery, Lausanne; M. le Pasteur Elie Gounelle, Paris; the Rev. E. R. Hendrix, D.D., LL.D., New York; Herr Hofprediger Kessler, Dresden; Herr Konsistorialrat Lüttgert, Berlin; the Rev.

Frederick Lynch, D.D., New York; Edwin D. Read, Esq., M.A., Boston, Mass.; the Rev. W. P. Merrill, D.D., New York; M. le Pasteur Jacques Pannier, Paris; M. le Sénateur E. Réveillaud, Versailles; Herr Professor De Richter, Berlin; the Rev. J. H. Rushbrooke, M.A., London; Herr Pasteur Dr. Siegmund-Schultze, Berlin; the Very Rev. the Dean of Worcester.

When that committee will be able to meet who shall say! But the Conference acted in faith, and refused to be turned aside from its ideal aim. Mr. Allen Baker's address as President was not delivered, but it had been printed, and was distributed to members. One passage may be quoted here, as marking the tone which prevailed throughout:—"We believe with Lord Haldane that 'It is not brute force, but moral power that commands predominance in the world'; and we are here to see if it be not possible to unite these 'moral forces' as we know them to exist in our Christian lands, and to create such an atmosphere in our respective countries, and among the nations of the world, as will, in due time, render wars between them an impossible contingency. The essence of religion is Love, and the essence of war is hate, and if it be true that 'God is Love,' war violates the very shrine of the Eternal. Either that great central truth of the faith of Catholic and Protestant alike is never going to be thoroughly believed, or war must become impossible for Christian nations. And, notwithstanding the cloud of war that now covers the nations of Europe, we must go forward in the sure hope that the reign of peace and righteousness will come."

The names of the British delegates, who actually made their way to Constance and took part in the Conference, will be found attached to an "Appeal to the Nation," which was published in Wednesday's Daily News and Daily Chronicle and is appended to this record. The appeal was drafted on the way home, when we did not know what the news might be on our arrival, and we still clung to the hope that our own country might be kept out of the conflict; and in spite of the disappointment of that hope, it was deemed right that, in the form it now bears, the appeal should be made public.

The journey home was a strange and somewhat trying experience. If it had not been for our special passport, we certainly should not have got through from Constance to Flushing, as we did, in less than 24 hours; but even so it was in a semi-starved condition and under circumstances of great discomfort. Something of what we saw of the preparations for war, and what we felt, is expressed in the appeal. At Goch, where we were leaving German territory, a subordinate official, a simple-hearted, earnest man, asked the present writer to take him to one of the Members of Parliament in our party, that he might plead with him not to let England go to war with Germany, for they were always glad, he said, to welcome English people. There was no quarrel, and they ought to be friends! It was only one small instance of the feeling towards us in that country which makes the experience of this dark hour all the more bitter and hard to bear.

On Wednesday the British and American delegates who had reached London, held a further meeting at the Westminster Palace Hotel, when pledges of faithfulness to the ideal were again exchanged and counsel as to future activity was taken.

A resolution of warm gratitude was passed to the leaders of the party for their devoted labours both at Constance and throughout the trying circumstances of the journey home. A full record of the conference is to be published in due course.

V. D. D.

The Appeal to which Mr. Davis refers is as follows:—

We have just returned from Germany, where we have been attending the first International Conference of the Churches for the promotion of friendship among the nations. We have seen with our own eyes the amazing rapidity of the growth of the war fever, and the widespread misery caused by the mere preparation for warfare.

There is, however, clear evidence that the serious part of the German nation has entered upon the present war with the utmost reluctance, and deplores the possibility of a fresh outbreak of bitterness and misunderstanding with Great Britain. We have had, through our work for Anglo-German friendship and mutual understanding, unique opportunities for observing the steady, continuous growth of friendliness in Germany towards this country.

We are dismayed beyond measure at the thought that England may be involved in the cataclysm of the present conflict. In the original quarrel we, as a nation, have no lot or part. We have ties of warm friendship with the peoples both of Germany and France, and no hostility to any people in Europe. If we can, even now, maintain this position, we still have a wonderful opportunity of acting as peace-makers and the friends of all.

If this opportunity is not to be lost, the conscience of our land must speak more speedily than the spirit of hate and international ill-feeling, propagated by the voices which call for war.

For the sake of the land we love and our brethren of other lands, in the name of the God of our common worship, we appeal to our fellow-countrymen not to despair even at this hour of discovering a just and a peaceful solution, and that to this end we lift up our prayers as with one voice to Almighty God.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION. SUMMER SESSION AT OXFORD.

THE ninth Summer Session for Sunday School Teachers, organised by the Sunday School Association, is now in progress at Manchester College, Oxford. A change in the date this year, from the beginning of July to the beginning of August, has led to a welcome increase of membership, and over 100 teachers and other workers have enrolled themselves for the whole or for part of the Session—coming at least for the holiday week-end where no longer stay was possible. Our fellowship is probably also geographically wider than ever before; not only from all our own four countries, but also from New Zealand, the United States, Canada and Hungary we have representative workers among us this week.

It is hard to convey in any measure, by a bald account of proceedings, the real significance and effect of this Summer Session. The aim of the Sunday School Association, in these two-yearly gatherings, has been to quicken through individuals the life of our scattered Sunday schools and local organisations—to give, to those who come up to Oxford for these ten days, something which they may take home to help them in their work. Definite information from those who know, on matter or methods, is an important part of this gift, and it is being duly brought forward this year. At least equally valuable is the feeling of fellowship which these meetings produce, and the opportunity for exchange of experience and counsel, not only on set occasions, but also constantly amid the social intercourse and the expeditions which vary the time spent here. The river and college courts and the luncheon-table are scenes for many a heartening talk between new-made friends or old friends re-united.

The Session opened on Friday morning, July 31, with a service in the College Chapel, conducted by the Principal. Dr. Estlin Carpenter combined with gracious words of welcome a splendidly inspiring introductory address upon the aims of our meeting. He dwelt upon the august influences of Oxford on the world's life, and upon the supreme rule of thought which they symbolise. The work of the Sunday school teacher, he said, is to open the eyes of the scholar to this great kingdom of the Spirit, and to this end every possible field may be explored. In all our teaching personality is the most vital force; our own experience, our sympathy and the power of what we do rather than what we say, are the supreme assets at our command. Fellow-workers with God in His creative work, we have a task whose difficulties, real as they are, fade into nothing before its joy.

Dr. Carpenter's address sounded a keynote for the Session. Though never absent from these gatherings, the spirit of consecration has probably never been so strongly felt as on this occasion. The getting of instruction and the forming of friendships have been approached literally "in the Spirit," and we meet on holy ground. Again and again the higher note has been struck by preacher or lecturer, and has found its echo. It is specially fitting to record the two chapel services of Sunday last. In the morning Dr. J.

E. Odgers officiated, and spoke from the text (2 Kings viii. 16), "chariots of fire round about Elisha," upon the eternal might of spiritual power, and that yearning for something better and higher which is the greatest force in the world. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant conducted the evening service, and pictured the "kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world" (Matt. xxv. 24) for the blessed who are called to it. The spiritual kingdom is entered by the ways of truth, humility, self-reverence and love; it is eternal and transcendent; and we may dare to call it our inheritance, for we have all done, and are doing, some of the service of helpfulness to which the Master points.

Two lectures were given by the Rev. A. W. Fox on Biblical teaching, one on the use of the Old Testament, the other on the New. Mr. Fox dwelt with special insistence on the treasure of human experience which the Bible contains, and on the supreme importance of bringing out the religious consciousness of the writers, leading up to and developing into the perfect faith of Jesus. Many most useful illustrations and instances of comment were embodied in these lectures.

The Rev. Dr. Crooker, of U.S.A., delivered two lectures with a somewhat similar scope—the use of the Bible in Sunday-school instruction—dwelling in more general terms on the ethical outlook of the Hebrews (with special illustration from the Book of Jonah), and on the power of the spirit and personality of Jesus (far more important to grasp than any facts about him, or sayings of his) over the lives of his disciples and our own lives to-day. Difficulties of criticism are largely overcome, or rendered unimportant, if this central fact is recognised as embodied in all the symbolism of an Oriental style.

The Rev. Savell Hicks, in one breathless hour, conducted us through the whole story of "The Evolution of the Bible," illustrating by lantern slides, which were much appreciated. The Rev. Albert Thornhill dealt with "The Use of Biography in Sunday School Teaching," making an eloquent plea for wider recognition of the power of noble lives in shaping young ideals. Mr. Thornhill's own excellent book, "Heroes of Faith," makes fitting the Association's choice of him to expound this important subject.

A specially welcome guest was the Rev. Carey Bonner, Secretary of the Sunday School Union, who spoke beautifully and impressively upon "The Place of Music in the Training of the Child," illustrating by use of the piano and of our own voices. No one is better able to deal with this matter than Mr. Carey Bonner, and many lovers of "Child Songs" were glad to meet him face to face.

Dr. George Jessel gave an excellent address on "Health and the Sunday School," speaking as an expert upon practical details of hygiene and child management, and keeping in view throughout the truly spiritual end of all care for the body, which is "a temple of God." He urged in particular a wise guidance, and some needful instruction, at the critical time of adolescence.

Evening gatherings have included a reception by Dr. and Mrs. Carpenter, a social evening of an informal and very cheerful kind, and several more serious meetings. A "Story Hour," led off by our President, Mr. Ion Pritchard, proved again very popular; a conference on "Sunday School Institutions" was useful and well maintained. A short afternoon meeting must also be recorded, at which Miss Helen Brooke Herford, on behalf of the Women's League, brought forward the question of our Sunday Schools and the Colonies, the need of keeping in touch with young emigrants, and of linking up the schools of our Empire in bonds of friendship.

At the time of writing there is, of course, more to come; the session continues till Saturday, August 8. It is a truly good time for us all. The officers will have their best reward in the full success of the meetings themselves; but it is impossible not to record the labours on our behalf of Mr. Ion Pritchard, President of the Association; Mr. T. M. Chalmers, its Secretary; and Mr. Ralph Philipson, local Secretary for the session. Always working and always cheerful, they deserve and they have our gratitude. The cloud of the great crisis hangs over us; it solemnises our meetings, and it makes our daily chapel service doubly real to us all. Our work for the children is still before us, and we can "do the next thing" in the quietness and confidence which this rallying for service does not fail to win.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Bury.—The Rev. Richard Lee, B.A., late Congregational minister of Blyth, Northumberland, has received the certificate of the Northern Advisory Board, and has accepted a call to the church at Bury (Chesham), Lancashire.

Chester.—Sunday school anniversary services were held at Matthew Henry's Chapel on Sunday, July 26. The Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., of West Kirby, conducted the services.

Lewes.—In the course of his sermon at Westgate Chapel last Sunday evening, the Rev. J. M. Connell made the following reference to the European crisis:—"The widespread commercial disturbance caused by war ought to make it as intolerable as is a brawl in one of our streets. But it is one thing to convince the mind of the economic folly of war; it is quite another to quench in the heart the murderous passions of which war is the outcome. When hate and envy and revenge are roused in men they take little heed of what makes for the truest welfare of their country. If peace be not an inward desire and possession it is not likely to have much reality in the world outside. So when we pray, 'Give peace in our time, O Lord,' we ask above all that God may change the hearts of men, turning hatred into love, vengeance into forgiveness. Since Jesus went about preaching this change of heart it has slowly yet surely been taking place. But the present awful crisis in Europe shows how far, far off we still are from seeing that change completely realised. Let it be ours to further it in every way in our power.

'The doctrines of Christianity,' said Channing, 'have had many martyrs. Let us be willing, if God requires it, to be martyrs to its spirit, the neglected, insulted spirit of peace and love. In a better service we cannot live; in a nobler cause we cannot die.'

London: Islington.—Last Sunday's services were devoted at Unity Church, Islington, to a consideration of the awful catastrophe into which nearly the whole of Europe has been hurled without any warning. Dr. Tudor Jones, who had just returned from Germany, stated that never had he felt it so difficult to know what to say. But he could call them all to silent prayer—a factor which must have been entirely absent from the hearts of the rulers of the great European Powers who had landed their people at the mouth of hell. Where is European Christianity? Thank God, we believe that it exists in the hearts of millions of people belonging to the nations that are now at war. The intellect, the rectitude, and the moral judgment of the nations have not been at all consulted. The conflagration has been engendered for years by packs of men whom there is no epithet strong enough to depict. The pawnbrokers of Paris, the wastrels of Russia, the parasites of Austria, and the weaklings who flatter the German Emperor in order to get room for their spirit of revenge—these are the forces that have brought about this calamity. Serbia and its grievances were only a tool in the hands of Russia. We must not ask the question, which nation is to be blamed. No nation is to be blamed; the whole weight of the blame lies within the spirits of those who have neither had any moral and religious feelings, or who have entirely lost them. We believe Great Britain to be free from any such motives, but it too, like Serbia, has been caught long ago in a trap which had been laid for it in a marvellously clever way. We were on the eve of great things. A harvest of the kingdom of God was gradually and surely ripening—a harvest that would have brought so many other blessings in its train. The fight has been between wealth, power, and lack of manhood on the one hand, and the onward and upward social, moral, and religious march of democracy on the other. The latter has for the moment been beaten. It is really a time for tears and lamentation, for the very best qualities which bind the world together have once again gone to the bottom. The irony of the whole scene is that this curse is put forth in the name of the God of holiness and love, and that His name is called to bless the engines of human destruction. There is one hope which we may learn from history, and we can be assured that it will be repeated once again—a remnant of the people will rise, after having undergone much tribulation, with the very same ideals of peace, love, and goodwill in its heart. In the meantime, what are we to do to-day? Crave for forgiveness that we have not been religious enough and united enough to prevent the happening of such a calamity. If the Christian Church had been more united, if it had been less critical and quarrelsome and more spiritual and gentle, we have, I think, abundant reasons for saying that the calamity would have been averted. The merciless temper so often exhibited within and without the churches is something of the very same nature on a smaller scale as what we are witnessing to-day on an unprecedented scale. There cannot be much power and influence in the religion of democracy, or else it would have made such an event impossible. The call for us all is to be on our knees once again and crave for forgiveness for the wretched part each one of us has played in the extension of the religion of him who came to live and die in order that mankind might for ever walk on the paths of peace, justice, mercy, and love. We all need more of these divine qualities, for they alone will heal the mortal wounds wrought by the evil hearts of men.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

The editor of Church, School and Home wrote his notes for the August number before the war cloud burst upon us, and it was still possible to dream of quiet, pleasurable holidays. But his pleading for simplicity and deep communion with the primal realities of life only needs the change of a few words to make it suitable for our altered mood. "The best holidays," he says, "are the idle ones—the receptively idle ones." If there is to be reading let it be little and suitable. "If we must have books let them be few; one or two volumes of Nature poetry, Shelley or Wordsworth in selection; an old-world romance; some Franciscan legends; a thirteenth century mystical treatise; a New Testament and that ancient pre-Christian anthology of incomparable songs called the Book of Psalms." He adds "a short list that will not exhaust your purse or your trunk-space: (1) A penny book of the Psalms. (2) A twopenny New Testament. (3) One or both of the following Temple Classics (Dent's; 1s. 6d.): a. The Little Flowers of St. Francis; b. The Mirror of Perfection. (4) Light, Life and Love: Selections (in English) from the German Mystics of the Middle Ages by Dean Inge (Methuen & Co.'s 'Library of Devotion'; cloth, 1s. 8d. net). All of these are very small in size, and can easily be slipped into the pocket."

THE VALUE OF "RETIRES."

Church, School and Home has something to say as well about the value of homes of quietness, where tired and distracted men and women can seek sanctuary from the noises of the world. We commend the following suggestion to our readers:—"It would be an excellent thing if sensible 'Retreats' could be arranged for members of our Churches. We are seriously convinced that if our leaders would have the daring to organise them they would find them enthusiastically endorsed. We have long wished that some rich person would provide a kind of Community-House where the experiment could be fairly and earnestly tried. There are scores of people, ministerial and lay, among us—many are personally known to us—who desire in their holidays not mere distraction and excited gaiety, but holy-days of religious quiet and glad serenity; a time for deepening their own soul's life and their communion with God. They would eagerly allot a week or a fortnight of their vacation for the purpose of a Retreat. We have all so much to learn in the matter of religious exercises and self-discipline that even a week's experience at a Retreat might teach us habits of reading, meditation, and prayer that would last for ever to the enrichment and joy of our spirit. We all believe to-day in the healing effect of a peaceful and harmonious mind upon an agitated and nerve-racked body. It might be that business men and women would discover that days spent in the calm and silence of God's realised Presence would prove even physically more beneficial than the restless and boringly superficial holidays which some of them now suffer and pretend to enjoy."

PROFESSOR EUCKEN ON GERMANY'S NEED OF INWARDNESS.

At a time when Germany seems to be nothing but an armed camp, and her rulers are ready to sacrifice every other interest to military success, Professor Eucken's tribute to the more spiritual forces which are at work in German life has a special interest. "Notwithstanding the rapid growth of material prosperity," he writes, "the splendid progress in the mechanical and industrial departments, and the great success attending all our national enterprises, the German of to-day feels no inward satisfaction. On the contrary, he is always conscious that something is lacking. Strong pessimistic currents are discernible not only in our literature, but in our national life as well. Is not this a convincing proof that the German of to-day requires something more for his happiness than success and expansion in the outer world? A reaction against pure realism is already in the ascendant. We may confidently expect that our people will soon again devote more attention to the development of the other side of their nature, that they will once more cultivate art, philosophy and religion on a broad scale, and in this way contribute new treasures to the common fund of humanity. . . . The German people cannot discontinue their efforts on behalf of a deeper inward culture without denying their historical traditions and sacrificing one of the principal elements of their character." The essay from which this striking passage is taken, entitled, "Are the Germans still Thinkers?" will be found in the volume of Collected Essays translated by Dr. Meyrick Booth and recently published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

REMINISCENCES OF TOLSTOY.

Count Ilya Tolstoy is contributing some reminiscences of his father to the Fortnightly Review, which are, we believe, to be published in book form later in the year. The last instalment contains an interesting account of Tolstoy's method of learning, and teaching, languages. "When I was about thirteen, I think," says his son, "he began to give me Greek lessons. I remember him beginning to learn Greek himself, I remember the zeal and perseverance with which he set to work; he got on so well that after six weeks he could read Herodotus and Xenophon at sight. It was also on Xenophon that he started us. He explained the alphabet to me, and then set me on to the Anabasis at once. At first it was very hard. I sat with glassy eyes, and often was on the point of howling; but in the end I saw that I had got to go through with it, and I did. I was taught Latin in the same way. When I went up for the entrance examination at Polivanof's Classical Gymnase in 1881 I surprised all the masters because, though completely ignorant of grammar, I could read the classics at sight far better than was required of me. In this I see a proof that my father's original system of teaching was the right way. It was just in the same way that later on he learnt Hebrew, and got to know it so well that he could make out all the passages he wanted in the Old Testament, and often gave original interpretations of his own of several passages to his teacher, Rabbi Minor."

It is part of the duty of every newspaper to be economical in the use of paper at the present time. For a few weeks THE INQUIRER will be reduced to 12 pages instead of 16. We shall try to preserve the various features of the paper, and we are confident that our readers will do their best to promote its circulation and to be generous in their judgments during this period of necessary curtailment. At the same time we must ask our correspondents to remember the virtue of brevity. As soon as circumstances permit we shall return to our usual issue of 16 pages.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE White Book containing the Correspondence respecting the European Crisis which was issued last week is a document of first class importance, and everybody who wishes to understand the rapid events of the last three weeks, which have plunged us into war, ought to read it with care. It reveals Sir Edward Grey as the chief moral force in Europe working for peace. With inexhaustible patience and ingenuity he laboured to find a way out of the entanglements produced by the high-handed ultimatum of Austria to Servia. No sooner was one way barred by official punctilios or difficulties of temper than he tried another; but all in vain, because in certain quarters there was no real desire for peace, no restraining sense of the appalling crime of a European war.

THE unofficial mind reading these documents will be struck by the complete absence of the pressure of public opinion upon the Chancelleries of Europe. For the most part they seem to be entirely dominated by military cliques for whom the lives of the people are simply pawns in the game. In the letters from Berlin there is no sign of any kind of deference to public opinion. The military dictatorship has not to ask permission from anybody before it plunges the country into war, and is apparently quite content to rely upon the policy of stirring up popular passion after the event. There can be no high-minded patriotism on these terms. It is all of a piece with the political immorality, which has just been exposed in such a glaring light in the speech of the German Chancellor. On August 4 he acknowledged with cynical frankness to the Reichstag that they were acting contrary to international law. Necessity, he said, knows no law. "Anybody who is threatened as we are threatened, and is fighting for his highest possessions, can have only one thought—how he is to hack his way through." Were these German autocrats possessed by the demons of stupidity and fear, which betrayed them into nervous haste when they ought to have been cool, collected and far-seeing? Such is the divine nemesis which overtakes the political worship of the super-man with its ignorant contempt of the "slave-morality" of the Gospel.

THE Society of Friends has issued an impressive Message to Men and Women of Good Will in the British Empire. No words which have been written during the present crisis will carry greater weight. Everybody recognises that no body of religious people in the country has so good a right to speak or can do so with equal moral prestige. It is one of the crowning blessings of quiet and persistent faithfulness to an ideal that at supreme moments in national and personal life the true word can be spoken, without effort or rhetorical display, in the deep confidence of living faith, and that even careless people are persuaded to turn aside to listen and to pray.

"We recognise," the Message says, "that our Government has made most strenuous efforts to preserve peace, and has entered into the war under a grave sense of duty to a smaller State towards which we had moral and treaty obligations. While, as a Society, we stand firmly to the belief that the method of force is no solution of any question, we hold that the present moment is not one for criticism, but for devoted service to our nation."

"What is to be the attitude of Christian men and women and of all who believe in the brotherhood of humanity? In the distress and perplexity of this new situation, many are so stunned as scarcely to be able to discern the path of duty. In the sight of God we should seek to get back to first principles, and to determine on a course of action which shall prove us to be worthy citizens of His Kingdom. In making this effort let us remember those groups of men and women, in all the other nations concerned, who will be animated by a similar spirit, and who believe with us that the fundamental unity of men in the family of God is the one enduring reality, even when we are forced into an apparent denial of it."

"We believe in God," the Message concludes. "Human freewill gives us power to hinder the fulfilment of His loving purposes. It also means that we may actively co-operate with Him. If it is given to us to see something of a glorious possible future, after all the desolation and sorrow that lie before us, let us be sure that sight has been given us by Him. No day should close without our putting up our prayer to Him that He will lead His family into a new and better day. At a time when so severe a blow is being struck at the great causes of moral, social, and religious reform for which so many have struggled, we need to look with expectation and confidence to Him, whose cause they are, and find a fresh inspiration in the certainty of His victory."

WE desire to call special attention to the letter by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, which we publish to-day, reminding us of the duty of courtesy and goodwill to our German friends. Let us remember that our legal enemies are not our personal enemies. We fear that there have been some cases already of harsh treatment of German women and girls resident in England. Such behaviour is un-Christian and it is unpatriotic as well, for it stains our country's good name. Nothing whatever has occurred to infringe the ordinary claims of good manners and honourable treatment; and in cases where there have been personal ties of trust and affection, why should they be broken? If there is some inevitable tension of feeling we can recognise the difficulty of the position in which German people in England find themselves and avoid discussions which are likely to provoke irritation on both sides.

THE same remarks apply to the subjects of Austria-Hungary, with whom we are now formally at war. With many Hungarian people our ties of friendship have been of a most cordial kind. To many readers of THE INQUIRER who have visited Transylvania or received young Hungarians into their homes any rupture is unthinkable. To the aged Bishop Ferencz, and especially to the band of Unitarian ministers in Hungary, who are former students of Manchester College and our personal friends, we send affectionate and respectful greetings, assuring them that the bonds of Christian fellowship mean more to us than the political reasons which have placed our countries upon opposite sides in the European war.

WE are glad that the House of Commons has expressed itself so sternly and unanimously in condemnation of the manufacture of false and sensational rumours. Official news in time of war must necessarily be meagre, and the public makes a constant demand upon the newspapers for sensational items. We think that English journalism as a whole may be trusted to keep its head and to behave with dignity. But we should all be on our guard against credulous attention to mere rumours. This war, like all other wars, is likely to produce a plentiful crop of false stories about the other side. It is impossible to trace them to their source, but it will be quite safe to regard them with severe suspicion, especially when they are barbed with malice or intended to throw discredit upon the honour and chivalry of the German army. A great deal can be done to check their circulation by refusing to repeat them.

THE Government has behaved with the generosity which we expected in remitting the remainder of the sentences on all persons now undergoing terms of imprisonment for crimes connected with the suffrage agitation. The same clemency has been extended to persons convicted of assaults and other offences in connection with recent strikes. In making this announcement in the House of Commons on Monday, Mr. McKenna was careful to point out that this course had been taken without solicitation on their part and without requiring any undertaking from them. Acts of grace are not based upon bargains.

WE doubt whether such vigorous measures have been taken before in the history of civilised nations to ensure an equal distribution of food among all classes of the community, to cripple the power of unscrupulous wealth in the matter of supplies and to prevent "cornering." In regard to the last, unfortunately a very familiar form of crime against the State in the history of war, the Government obtained special powers on Saturday. A short Bill was passed through all its stages with the cordial support of the whole House. Its chief clause is as follows:—

If the Board of Trade are of opinion that any foodstuff is being unreasonably withheld from the market they may, if so authorised by His Majesty's Proclamation generally, or as respects any particular kind of foodstuffs, and in manner provided by the Proclamation, take possession of any supplies of foodstuffs to which the Proclamation relates, paying to the owners of such foodstuffs such prices as may in default of agreement be decided to be reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, by the arbitration of a Judge of the High Court selected by the Lord Chief Justice of England.

A CORRESPONDENT, whose letter we publish to-day, calls in question the wisdom of the advice about reduction in expenditure which we gave last week. We did not mean, of course, that people of means should behave harshly or withdraw suddenly from honourable obligations. To dismiss servants at short notice, or to cancel seaside lodgings without reimbursing the landlady for her loss, is to pay selfish regard to private security without any real thought of the public good.

But we are still of opinion that a simplification of life is necessary and desirable. Whatever we do we cannot prevent some dislocation of trade and a shortage of employment in certain directions. It is in the public interest that the trades to suffer first should be those which minister chiefly to luxury, and it will be comparatively easy to draft the labour which has been monopolised by rich people into forms of employment which are for the good of all. Moreover, there is the question of good taste, and the unfortunate effect which would be produced upon the public mind if just as much money were spent on luxuries as in times of prosperity and peace. A large expenditure upon an elaborate dinner-party or splendid clothes or rare curios would seem callous and unworthy at the present time, and we think rightly so. These no doubt are extreme instances, but they may be taken as symbols of many other things which will occur to us all. We are face to face with the old fallacious argument that luxury is good for trade, but the hard logic of facts is breaking it down. Moral forces have come into play which are settling these matters for us, in many cases perhaps without any deliberate choice of our own.

On this whole subject an article by Mr. Charles Roden Buxton, which appeared in the Daily News on Wednesday, appears to us so plain and sensible that we venture to transfer the following passage to our own columns:

"From the point of view of the nation as a whole, three things are wanted at this moment. (1) To prosecute the war. (2) To enable the nation to live both now and in certain possible emergencies; this means not only having enough food, but making it available to poor as well as rich on fair terms through the medium of the best possible wages. (3) To produce as much wealth as we can for the future to make up for the industrial ravages of the war. This way of looking at the problem will throw much light on the question of employment. We need every part of the nation's labour supply, including, of course, the work of women. At bottom, however it may appear on the surface, it is not work which is lacking, but hands to do the work. The needs of the nation as above described entail a great and sudden change in the nation's demand for goods and services; that is to say, a great transference of labour from one employment to another. To keep the labour market steady by continuing the same expenditure as before is good advice to individuals as far as it goes, but it is subject to the above needs. It cannot go far as a remedy, for there must anyhow be a vast transference of labour, and since we must husband the nation's resources we must abandon luxuries either in the form of goods or services."

DURING the past week our people have been magnificent. There has been no panic, no bluster, but a quiet orderliness and a determination to meet a great crisis bravely and unselfishly, which has revealed the foundations of national character. Perhaps even a few weeks ago some of us may have doubted whether it would be so. In politics party strife was hot and uncompromising. In society luxury and freakishness seemed to be destroying good feeling and good sense. But suddenly the underlying realities, duty, brotherhood, God, have reasserted themselves, and these other things have crumpled up and disappeared. For a few days idealists of every school, social reformers, friends of peace, the devoted servants of religion suffered in a tense silence, which is more terrible than words. They were face to face with the most crushing disappointment of their lives. Their hopes lay blighted in the dust. Had the blood and sweat of their souls, all the toil of the busy years, gone for nothing? Then they looked into their hearts and found themselves more sure of God than they had ever been before. They felt the deep pulsations of the world around them, and the ancient words flashed upon them with new meaning: "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him, who is the health of my countenance and my God."

Our reasons for confidence are manifold, but there are two which stand out with a clearness for which we cannot be too thankful. There has never been a time in the history of the world when so many people have felt such a stern hatred of war. The friends of peace have grown into a multitude which no man can number. If this had been a war of vainglory or aggrandisement we are convinced that public opinion would have been against it. Military glory in and for itself has almost lost its power of appeal in our national life. It is because we believe that we had in the end no alternative, when the German Government in a moment of supreme cynicism asked us to condone the breaking of treaties and to be partners in an infamous bargain, that we have consented to the thing which we hate, and having consented, mean to see it through with the temper and resolution which become a great people. This is not an excuse, invented after the event, either to salve our own conscience or to enable us to pose as moral heroes before the world. We are in no mood for feeble humbug of that kind. It is a plain statement of the situation as it appears to many of the best friends of peace after a careful study of all the available facts. And for this reason we believe that this war, so far from discrediting the moral forces which make for peace and reducing the peacemaker to silence, will give them a strength of appeal to the public mind and conscience unknown before in the history of the world.

And the same thing may be observed over the whole area of social work. Many of our favourite schemes may have withered in a night, for we shall find ourselves in a strange world when the nations emerge lean and exhausted from the horrors of war. But the spirit of brotherhood is not dead. In these dark days it has revealed itself with a glorious brightness and strength. At the present moment it is leading public opinion and shaping the future. Face to face with the grim realities of life and death and national existence unscrupulous greed has withdrawn into the holes and corners of the earth and dares not show its face. Suddenly the enemy of the public good, plotting for his own safety and gain, finds himself treated as a common criminal. On every hand we are mobilising the mighty reserves of kindness and good-will. We are realising as never before that the law for each is the good of all. Now these moral reserves could not be summoned at a moment's notice into beneficent activity if they did not exist. In the midst of apparent defeat the men and women who have toiled in the fields of social service, preaching the gospel of a common life and repairing the breaches of ancient wrong, see of the travail of their souls; and if they cannot be satisfied while the powers of darkness still hold men and nations in bondage, let them be confident in the good cause and rejoice in these victories of Love.

We know that the darkest days lie ahead. Hitherto we have heard of rumours of wars, but we have hardly come face to face with the grim reality. We shall do that when there is mourning in our homes, and the hospitals are full of wounded men, and the shadow of terrible anxieties rests upon our hearts. We shall know it only too well when the demoralisation of a great war lays hold of the more thoughtless of our people, lifting them up in vulgar exultation over their enemies, or scattering them like panic-driven sheep if news should come of danger or defeat. One of the things which we have to fear chiefly is moral disaster, the coarsening of fibre, the dulness of feeling, the deadness of soul which the daily spectacle of war and its colossal miseries inflicts even upon sensitive natures. Against that danger Christian people can set a vigilant guard. They should make it a chief part of their business to frustrate by every means in their power the steady aggression of lower standards of thought and feeling. But they can only do this with success if they keep their own hearts with all diligence. It will be wise for us to go on quietly and dutifully with our ordinary occupations, and to give as much room as we can to the varied interests of mind and heart. Absorption in one interest, though in its tragic significance it dwarfs all others, is fatal to mental balance and just judgment and genuine sympathy. At the same time we should never suffer ourselves to forget the horror of war. Lurid pictures or loud rhetoric about its evil are no use. The day for that kind of thing has gone. But let us remember it quietly on our knees after the excitements of the day, never losing hold of the conviction that this appalling wickedness must never happen again, and that God has laid upon us the responsibility of working for peace and goodwill, and all other things that are honourable and of good report, as we have never worked before. And through it all let us not be foolishly confident that we can do without the help of God and His grace in our hearts. All the common temptations of fear and selfishness and cowardice may assail us. But in His might we can be strong with a quiet courage; we can forget ourselves and cease to trouble about our own comfort and safety, and learn not to be anxious about the future. We are in God's keeping, not our own; and neither life nor death, nor any suffering or misfortune which it has entered into the heart of man to conceive, but only our own unworthiness in the day of trial, can separate us from His Love.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Arise, O Lord; let not man prevail,
Let the nations be judged in thy sight.
Put them in fear, O Lord;
Let the nations know themselves to be

THE VICTORY OF FAITH.

A GREAT epoch was exhausted and passing away to give place to another, the first utterances of which had already been heard in the north, and which awaited but the Initiator to be revealed. He came. The soul the most full of love, the most sacredly virtuous, the most deeply inspired by God and the future, that men have yet seen on earth; Jesus. He bent over the corpse of the dead world and whispered a word of faith. Over the clay that had lost all of man but the movement and the form, he uttered words until then unknown; love, sacrifice, a heavenly origin. And the dead arose. A new life circulated through the clay, which philosophy had tried in vain to reanimate. From that corpse arose the Christian world, the world of liberty and equality. From that clay arose the true man, the image of God, the precursor of humanity.

Christ expired. All he had asked of mankind wherewith to save them, says Lamennais, was a cross whereon to die. But ere he died he had announced the glad tidings to the people. To those who asked of him from whence he had received it, he answered, "From God, the Father." From the height of his Cross he had invoked him twice. Therefore upon the Cross did his victory begin and still does it endure.

Have faith then, O you who suffer for the noble cause; apostles of a truth which the world of to-day comprehends not; warriors in the sacred fight whom it yet stigmatises with the name of rebels. To-morrow, perhaps, this world, now incredulous or indifferent, will bow down before you in holy enthusiasm. To-morrow victory will bless the banner of your crusade. Walk in faith, and fear not. That which Christ has done, humanity may do. Believe, and you will conquer. Believe and the peoples at last will follow you. From your Cross of sorrow and persecution, proclaim the religion of the epoch. Soon shall it receive the consecration of faith. Let not the hateful cry of reaction be heard on your lips, nor the sombre formula of the conspirator, but the calm and solemn words of the days to come.

Upon a day in the sixteenth century, at Rome, some men bearing the title of Inquisitors, who assumed to derive wisdom and authority from God Himself, were assembled to decree the immobility of the earth. A prisoner stood before them. His brow was illumined by genius. He had outstripped time and mankind, and revealed the secret of a world. It was Galileo. The old man shook his venerable head. His soul revolted against the absurd violence of those who sought to force him to deny the truths revealed to him by God. But his pristine energy was worn down by long suffering and sorrow; the monkish menace crushed him. He strove to submit. He raised his hand, he too, to declare the immobility of the earth. But as he raised his hand, he raised his weary eyes to that heaven they had searched throughout long nights to read thereon one line of the universal law; they encountered a ray of that sun which he so well knew motionless amid the moving spheres. Remorse entered his heart: an involuntary cry burst from the believer's soul: E pur si muove! and yet it moves.

Three centuries have passed away. Inquisitors, inquisition, absurd theses imposed by force—all these have disappeared. Naught remains but the well-established movement of the earth, and the sublime cry of Galileo floating above the ages.

Child of humanity, raise thy brow to the sun of God, and read upon the heavens: "It moves." Faith and action! The future is ours.

MAZZINI.

THE CHARACTER OF THE HAPPY WARRIOR.

Who is the happy Warrior? Who is he That every man in arms should wish to be? It is the generous spirit, who, when brought

Among the tasks of real life, hath wrought

Upon the plan that pleased his boyish thought:

Whose high endeavours are an inward light

That makes the path before him always bright:

Who, with a natural instinct to discern What knowledge can perform, is diligent to learn;

Abides by this resolve, and stops not there, But makes his moral being his prime care; Who, doomed to go in company with Pain, And Fear, and Bloodshed, miserable train! Turns his necessity to glorious gain; In face of these doth exercise a power Which is our human nature's highest dower;

Controls them and subdues, transmutes, bereaves

Of their bad influence, and their good receives:

Whose powers shed round him in the common strife,

Or mild concerns of ordinary life, A constant influence, a peculiar grace; But who, if he be called upon to face Some awful moment to which Heaven has joined Great issues, good or bad for human kind, Is happy as a lover; and attired With sudden brightness, like a man inspired.

And through the heat of conflict, keeps the law

In calmness made, and sees what he foresaw;

Or if an unexpected call succeed, Come when it will, is equal to the need:

This is the happy Warrior; this is he That every man in arms should wish to be.

WORDSWORTH.

O GOD, who hast given thy law to the nations, and hast made them to live at peace with one another under thy just and righteous government: we lament before thee the great evil and loss which befall the world when nation rises against nation, and thy people are slain, and the fruits of peace are wasted and destroyed. Hear our cry of distress, and our prayer on behalf of all who are suffering the miseries of war, both those who are engaged in the strife, and those who with heavy hearts, and in darkened homes, mourn the loss of lives most dear and precious to them. Grant that, even in the heat of the battle, or in the flush of victory, the spirit of true valour, and the counsels of mercy and humanity may prevail, that passion and violence may be restrained and all needless suffering and loss prevented; and let thy blessing be with those who go to the battlefield on errands of mercy, to minister to the wounded and perishing, and to befriend the homeless and destitute. Let the dark cloud of war pass away and the light of peace return again: but may it only come with the triumph of the righteous cause, and with the gain of freedom and national good. Lord, hear our prayer: for thou canst bring good out of evil, and light out of darkness; thou art our rock and defence, our strength and our portion for ever. Amen.

O SPIRIT of Truth, make us truthful. O Spirit of Purity, make us pure. O Spirit of Love, empty our hearts of all vain desires and give us the love of thyself. Amen.

OUR DUTY TO THE STATE.

FROM one point of view this is the wickedest war in the history of the human race. From another point of view it is the most righteous. It is the wickedest on the side of those who have forced it on the world. It is the most righteous on the side of those upon whom it has been forced. So far as England is concerned it is a war against war. The task laid upon us is to break the curse which for more than a generation has been blighting civilisation—the curse of military oppression, which has arrested progress, poisoned morality, sucked the life out of religion, made a mock of every human ideal, and filled the heart of millions of men with the basest of passions. It has been said with obvious and unquestionable truth, that we are not fighting against the German people. Let it be added that we are fighting for the German people. When the Great Deliverance comes, and please God it will, there is no people who will gain more than the German, and no people who will rejoice more in their gain than ourselves.

Under the circumstances one thought alone should dominate us—the thought of our Duty to the State. All other duties, to God, to humanity and to ourselves are summed up in that. Let us concentrate our minds upon it and let no nightmare horrors weaken our service. To dwell upon the appalling significance of war, on the disgrace to humanity, on the suffering it involves, all this is wise and right so long as we are seeking to keep war at bay. But now that it has come, let us economise our emotion and indulge neither in speech nor in feeling, save so far as it strengthens us for suffering and action. All our moral forces are needed for our duty. Let our hatred of war be a strength and not a weakness—as it was with Cromwell. Perhaps when all is over a new lesson will have to be written on the page of history—that the nations which love war most are the weakest in war, those which love it least the strongest.

Would that Reason had prevailed! But the Powers which have engineered this thing have shown themselves deaf to Reason—to Humanity, to Religion. All peaceable proposals have only rendered them the more obdurate, the more contemptuous of Right. They have forced upon the conscience of the world the task of chastising the wicked with their own weapons. It is a hideous necessity; but shrinking from it will only increase its hideousness.

Meanwhile let us note the fine qualities of the nation which, dormant in times of peace, are roused into full activity under the stress of war. Let us note them and take counsel that we may retain them with us, in something of their present vigour, for the ampler uses of peace. I believe that peace and long-continued peace will be the sequel to this war. Think what it would mean to England, and to humanity, if we could retain for a hundred years of peace the sense of unity which now inspires us.

THE UNITY OF CHRISTENDOM.

IF this war does not spring out of the living emotions of the people, it is still the outcome of the minds and spirits of men in these countries at some past time, for these treaties and ententes symbolise the unchristian relations of the Christian nations. They are there fundamentally because we would rather decide our disputes by arms than by reason and righteousness; they are monuments to the fact that no Government can yet trust in the uprightness and equity of another Government—because each nation wants its own way, right or wrong. Their raison d'être is the lack of international morality in Christendom. It is failure to accord with God's law bringing its awful punishment upon peoples.

And so it is that this very war comes once more to demonstrate that Europe must come back to Christianity and humanity, and that the only way for Christendom to be saved from crippling its own prosperity and progress, crushing its own life and freedom, denying its own deepest faiths, is by its recognition of its fundamental unity and the embodiment of it in international institutions.

What we have to work for is something like a federation of Christendom; we have to promote the consciousness that each nation is part of a larger whole which embraces the others, that it is one individual in a society, and must recognise itself as a servant of the larger good. There is no other possibility for the maintenance of the integrity of our highest interests, the unimpeded progress of our loftiest concerns, and the prevention of these terrible lapses into the barbarism of war, except the building up throughout Christendom of such a consciousness of unity and goodwill as shall demand some more concrete embodiment of the feeling of internationalism. I know there are voices at the present moment—voices of reproach, if not of contempt—towards those of us whose faith was given to the realities of friendship between the peoples, and who have pleaded for a policy based on the growth of amicable relationships. It is suggested that this war proves the bankruptcy of our insight and the danger of our propaganda. But does it? That insight was never officially acted on, nor that propaganda regarded in the counsels of this country till it was too late. You can't build a Concert of Europe at a moment when the avalanche of war has begun to roar and fall. The situation in which we find ourselves only shows by the demonstration of wholesale calamity, that the peace movement in Europe must be pushed forward with greater boldness and energy, that in all these countries public opinion in the direction of unity and internationalism must be made so powerful and dominant that the respective Governments will have to be influenced by it. And I believe that out of the ashes of the present war the phoenix of peace will rise and sing its song again with sweeter, stronger note.

The idea of any kind of federation between the great European Powers may be scouted as an impossible one, but in the progress of history and the Providence of God the impossible has before now taken place, and we set no limits to the mind and power of man. There is a German proverb which says, "Man can what he will"—it is only the will we have to create, and the desire for the ideal, and it is bound sooner or later to come, if it rests with humanity at all.

In the midst, then, of our present conflict let us not forget this hidden unity which the future in its time will bring forth—a unity in which each nation of Christendom will realise that it does not live to itself alone, and that it can only attain to its fullest and best life in harmony and co-operation with its neighbours, a unity whose next concrete embodiment in international relations must be the setting up of an international tribunal for the settlement of causes of quarrel, backed by the united conscience and sentiment and force of the united Powers—a unity in which it will be impossible for the ambition and rashness of two comparatively unimportant Powers to involve Europe in war over matters which concern themselves alone. It is the cry for the law of right instead of the law of might, at any rate as the first, if not the last, court of appeal in modern Christendom; it is the same cry as Mazzini sent vibrating through his day, the cry for a real association of the nations who are made of one blood, inherit one culture, drink of one faith, honour one Christ, worship one God—"a Europe, associated in the completeness of all its faculties and all its forces, under the indispensable conditions of liberty and fraternity, for the realisation of a common aim, and the discovery and progressive application of its law of life."

This is the unseen and eternal to which we look, and by which we steady our minds and moderate our passions in the midst of the seen, which enables us to keep a hold of the true Christian spirit even under the stress of war. And when the present cloud has passed, and the lightnings died away and the thunders ceased, the sun will shine forth again and the sky become clear, and we shall see bolder and less unmistakable than ever the fabric of our dream, eternal, in the heavens.

Our efforts are frustrated, our hopes postponed, perhaps, but that is all; let us not faint or fail, but even while men fight and kill, and women weep, and children become fatherless, let us be as the saints who, trusting God, in every age—

Saw distant gates of Eden gleam
And did not dream it was a dream,
But heard, by secret transport led
Even in the charnels of the dead,
The murmur of the fountain head.

THE WAR.—DISTRESS FUND.

SIR,—Amid the anxiety and suffering that already abound and will rapidly increase, those of us who are living in safety and comfort at home must set to work to do what we can to alleviate the misery of others.

Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, warmly approves of making Essex Hall one small centre for such humane service as can be devised.

Here are a few things that may be done at once with the aid of money and helpers:

(1) Assist American and English Unitarians, who on their return from the Continent are stranded in London, to reach their homes.

(2) Look after Germans, Hungarians, and others in distress who are associated with the Liberal religious movement in Europe until aid from their own friends is forthcoming.

(3) Make Essex Hall a depôt for receiving and storing useful clothing, and distributing the same to the poor through the agency of our Churches and Missions whenever the need arises.

(4) Organise a staff for cutting out materials for ladies to work at their own homes and return to Essex Hall when completed.

(5) Keep Essex Hall open as an Information Office, where people may learn where to go and what to do in order if possible to surmount their difficulties.

All services rendered will be voluntary, so that every penny sent to the Essex Hall Distress Fund will be devoted to the alleviation of genuine suffering. We shall, of course, work in co-operation with National organisations so as to avoid overlapping; but some of the work suggested is ours alone, and cannot easily be done by anyone else.

Cheques, postal orders, &c., should be made payable to me, and addressed to Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.—Yours, &c.,

W. COPELAND BOWIE.

Essex Hall,

UNITARIANS RETURNING FROM ABROAD.

Members of our churches, living in different parts of the country, are arriving in London daily from the Continent.

Some of them may have difficulty in getting home after their trying experiences abroad. If relatives or friends will send names and addresses to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C., with particulars of the places they are coming from, and the probable route and time of their arrival in London (so far as known), an effort will be made to meet them, and in case they should need any assistance in reaching their homes, help will be provided.

RESIDENT GERMANS.

SIR,—Difficult as it is to refrain from violent feeling at this time, I trust your readers will not only exercise self-restraint but also try to keep in check the less thoughtful members of the community, subject as so many of them are to the influence of an inflammatory Press. Whatever our judgment as to the character and policy of the rulers of Germany, it would be foolish and wicked to hold all Germans equally responsible. Those of us who have so often fraternised with foreign delegates in connection with our great conferences know that there are as good lovers of peace and righteousness among them as among us. And as to many German friends long resident in this country, we know them to be as upright and law-abiding as any Englishmen abroad could be, and we trust are. If we can do nothing else to mitigate the present horror, let us at least not add to it by want of consideration to the neighbourly alien in our midst. To put it at the least, we cannot expect fairplay for our non-combatant countrymen in Germany if we behave harshly ourselves.—Yours, &c.,

W. G. TARRANT.

CHRISTIANITY ON TRIAL.

SIR,—A thought has oppressed me these last few days which will, I doubt not, have weighed with no less insistence on others—how puny are all our efforts towards social reform when confronted by so awful a tragedy as that which now overwhelms Europe. A daily paper finds the moment apt to expose to us on its pictorial page a photograph of the Palace of Peace at The Hague, and we almost scoff. The National Peace Council passes a pious resolution, and we smile. Home Rule, which but a few days back threatened civil war, and, in the imagination of some, the very disruption of the Empire, assumes its proper proportions. While the Land Question, the Housing Question, and the Social Evil in all its forms, have an almost historic interest. A vastly bigger Evil turns them pale: the one huge Reality amid all our petty activities!

Does not all this suggest that Peace and Social Reform are not for the civilised world the vital realities they would seem to be? If they were, should we hurl them thus into the waste-paper basket and shoulder our muskets? Should we toil and sweat year in and year out for the Social Welfare only to take one final plunge into black ruin? The heart of

Is it not probable, however, that we have very few social reformers who really understand the heart of the Social Problem? Have we not ridiculously miscalculated? Should we not otherwise have seen ahead of us all the time this grim peril that was to shatter all our hopes and performances like matchwood, and grin upon them with a mocking irony? "Why so busy all these years, good people? In what have you put your trust?"

Well, bluntly, we have put our trust in man, and man has failed us. We have turned our backs upon religion, and the secular has throttled us. We have taken a surface account of evils and have not probed into their depths. We have gripped the immediate, but have had no contact with the eternal. The Churches have woefully failed us, too. The very heart of Social Reform was crying out to them for help, but they had none to give. A sterner challenge is now hurled at them. Will they take it up? For it will be vain for us to look to mere secular remedies. Only those drawn from the very heart of life and from the eternal exigencies of the soul of man can save us now. We have got to find our solace and strength once more in religion; we have got to go back to Christianity. We have got to learn that no social reforms will ever prove effective that have not behind them the driving power of religion and the conquering power of Christ.

The lion hath roared, who will not fear?
The Lord God hath spoken, who can but prophecy?—Yours, &c.,

Secretary, National Conference Union

INTERNATIONAL PEACE.

SIR,—For the sake of the record, and in the hope of happier days to come, may I add a word to the account I gave last week of the International Peace Conference at Constance?

The Conference had its origin in the movement which followed the second Hague Conference in 1907, resulting in the establishment of the two associated Councils of Churches in the British and German Empires for fostering friendly relations between the two peoples. After an interchange of visits between representatives of the German and British Churches in 1908 and 1909, the British Council was definitely established in February, 1911, representing all branches of the Christian Church, Catholic and Protestant, orthodox and heretic alike, with the Archbishop of Canterbury as President, with the Peacemaker as its quarterly organ, edited by the Rev. J. H. Rushbrooke (of the Hampstead Garden Suburb Free Church). Of this Council the Rt. Hon. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., is the hon. secretary. The secretary of the German Council, and editor of its organ, Die Eiche, is Pastor Siegmund-Schultze, of Berlin.

Representatives of the British Council went to America in the summer of 1910 to attend the Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration (New York State), and in 1911 that Conference was attended by Mr. J. Allen Baker, M.P., the Dean of Worcester and Mr. Siegmund-Schultze, representing the British and German Councils. The American Churches, both of the States and of Canada, were then keenly interested in the project of an International Conference, and the establishment of the Church Peace Union, with an endorsement of two million dollars from Mr. Carnegie, to be devoted to systematic work for peace, smoothed the way financially for the calling of such a Conference. The response from other countries of Europe was also very cordial, and hence the preliminary Conference at Constance was held, as recorded last week, and the resolutions were passed, aiming at the establishment of a permanent international body, with that great end in view.

Now we must wait in faith and hope for the day when a further forward movement may be possible.

In the list of the Committee as printed last week the Berlin professor should have been Dr. Richter, and "Read" should have been our friend Edwin D. Mead. He, with his wife and the Rev. Paul Revere and Mrs. Frothingham and Mr. Frank F. Williams, of Buffalo, N.Y., were the Unitarian members of the American contingent at Constance.—Yours, &c.,

V. D. DAVIS.

REDUCING EXPENDITURE.

SIR,—In your article "To our Readers" in the last INQUIRER, I am sorry to see that your advice to well-to-do people in consequence of the war is "to reduce our expenditure to what is necessary and to be more than content to do so, because it will enable us to spare all the more for those who are worse off than ourselves." Now it seems to me that if a large majority of well-to-do people follow your advice, the tradespeople will immediately suffer, with the result that some will be ruined, and others will lessen their staff, and throw people out of employment, while hotels, boarding and lodging houses will also suffer if people give up their holidays; in fact, it would tell on all the working classes, and bring unnecessary hardship on those who can ill afford to lose anything.—Yours, &c.,

M. THOMAS.

NATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

SIR,—It will be generally admitted that there is truth in Dr. Martineau's doctrine of the "personality of nations," to which you refer in your paper of last week; but surely it may be well to ask how far this carries us. Is every individual member of a nation bound by the policy of its statesmen at any particular moment, right or wrong? Are we all to be held responsible for every treaty made, with or without our consent, even by men of past generations? Have we no rights of conscience higher than the claims of nationality? Is there never a time for obeying God rather than man? Is a nation so entirely one personality that the artisans of London can punish the Kaiser for his wickedness by shooting the artisans of Berlin?

This may be good Hebrew, but is it reason?—Yours, &c., BASIL MARTIN.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—May I through the medium of your columns call attention to the following circular which has been sent to all the Sunday schools connected with the Association:—

RELIEF SERVICE.

The war which is now inevitable must necessarily cause great hardship and suffering not only to those at the front, but also to those at home. Whatever may be thought of war, it should be our duty to alleviate such distress, no matter how it has been caused. Personal service is one ideal of our Sunday schools, and there was never greater need for it than now.

The Committee therefore make the following suggestions:—

(1) Will you please on the first possible Sunday impress on your teachers and scholars, especially the elder scholars, the duty of obeying any call for workers which may be made by local authorities or charitable organisations?

(2) A list of those able and willing to help should be drawn up, giving the time of day and other particulars when they are willing to render service, and what they can do. These lists would then be ready to be sent to any authority asking for help or likely to need such workers.

(3) Cases of distress in your own school will no doubt be sought out, and careful help given. Boys and girls can be of use by doing something for families whose men are at the front.

(4) You can give great help by encouraging in every possible way a sense of responsibility among your young people, so as to prevent panic and excitement.

(5) Perhaps you would also urge the necessity of self-denial and mutual helpfulness, so that those who can may give substantial help.

If your school is closed, will you kindly communicate with your teachers, and, if necessary, hold a meeting of the school?

I am sure that I can rely on your personal help in carrying out these suggestions.—Yours, &c.,

T. M. CHALMERS.

MANSFORD-STREET CHURCH AND MISSION.

SIR,—Many appeals for financial help to relieve the distress caused by the war are being issued at the present time, and I do not doubt that many of your readers will be anxious and ready to respond. May I suggest that they should give their contributions through the Poor's Purse, or similar funds, at our various missions? I am quite sure that there will be many families connected with our churches and missions who will need some assistance during the coming weeks, and I believe that such cases can be dealt with much better by the private funds placed at the disposal of the missionaries than through the public agencies organised by local Distress Committees.

I shall be very glad to receive any contributions for this purpose for the Poor's Purse at Mansford-street.—Yours, &c., GORDON COOPER.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

LETTING GOD SHINE THROUGH.

WHAT an odd phrase; what can it mean?

Once a very famous artist built a most beautiful church. There were strong pillars, magnificent carving, and wondrous windows. The windows really were so very fine that people came from long distances to see them, and all were loud in the artist's praise. But one of them puzzled them more than a little; it was the window right over the beautifully carved pulpit. It was stained to show David fighting Goliath, Samson fighting the Philistines, and in the centre Jephthah's daughter coming to meet her victorious father. And it was in this centre portion that the puzzling bit of glass came. It was right at the top of the window, and just between Jephthah and his daughter, and instead of staining the glass, the great artist had left a little star-like pane absolutely white, so that the bright sunlight from outside shone right into the church, across the feet of Jephthah's daughter. It was so small a fault, if it were a fault, that you could hardly notice it until people had told you of it, but once you had seen it you could never look at the window again and forget it.

"It spoils the window utterly," said some of the visitors.

"Yes, it makes you see that it is after all only a stained glass show, a painted picture" said others.

"It almost looks as if the ray of light actually stopped Jephthah's daughter for a moment as she ran towards her father. I wonder why the artist left it so unfinished?" said the leaders of the church. "Ask him," said a friend, and so they did.

The great artist was quite straightforward with them.

"I did it on purpose," he said, "and it does not spoil the window at all. The window can tell you nothing but a story, and you can only see what that story is when the sunlight, the light which God sends, is shining through it from behind."

The leaders of the church coughed; they already knew quite well that you can only understand anything, story or not, when the light which God gives, what we call the light of reason on the mind, shines through it.

"But when you let the real sunlight shine through a clear pane," said one of them, "you make all the rest of the window look stained and poor."

"And so you ought," said the artist. "If you did not, you would think the story was real, and forget that it is only put there as a story to help you to be good. You must leave room for God to shine through, or you will forget to be real yourselves."

But they found that too hard to understand, and coughed again.

"I will explain," said the artist kindly. "Suppose I had finished that window in the way you wished, putting a little piece of stained glass in place of the white pane. You would have looked at the window perhaps, and said, 'What a good window that is, how well it tells the old story, what a clever man the artist must be, now wouldn't you?'"

"Yes, yes," said the men.

"And perhaps I should have believed you," said the artist, "and thought that I really was a clever man as you said. I might even have said, 'All that you see before you was done by me.'"

"Of course, you would," said the men, "we would do the same."

"And you would be wrong," said the artist. "How did I do that window? I imagined it, I made it, I put it together; but who gave me the power, who gave me the head, and the mind, and the hands? Who really brought that window into being if not God?"

The leaders of the church coughed again; they had not thought of it in that way before.

"Come to that," began one of them, "Everything we do is done with the powers and gifts of God."

"Quite so," said the artist, "and so that you shall remember it and leave room for God to shine through in your lives I have left that little blank unstained pane over your pulpit, so that it may preach to you when I am gone."

The leaders looked down.

"But what has that to do with Jephthah's daughter?" said one.

"Why," said the artist, "you see it is difficult to know how to let God shine through. You want to do something every day to make the men and women and children whom you meet see God shining through your life. And we are all so busy building up our own fortunes, and thinking about our own reputations, that we don't remember to leave room day by day for God to shine through. David, exulting in his natural gifts, slays the giant and gained a kingdom; but I have made him all in stained glass, for when he was king he left no place in his life for God to shine through at all. Samson, again, exulting in his great strength, thought only of his own prowess and advantage; he did not remember whence his power came; so he, too, is in stained glass only, he left no place for God to shine through. With Jephthah's daughter it is different. You know the story, how her father had vowed to sacrifice to his God the first living creature that came to meet him as he returned home victorious. That vow was in its way a fine wild tribute to his God; he at least knew that if the victory came it only came because of the power of body and spirit that God allowed him. And he understood, too, that one cannot expect to win without sacrificing something one holds most dear. A very fine man was Jephthah for those rough days; at the moment when he fought and won the best that was in him was ruling over the worst. And so to welcome him home came his daughter, and at once he was tempted to be false to his vow, and to refuse to give up the thing that was dearest to him. It is not easy when you have fought and won to remember how you won, to say to yourself, 'I won this battle by saying I would have nothing to do for the future with this dearest habit of mine,' and then, having conquered, to cast the habit aside. But Jephthah's daughter understood. A ray of true light shot across her path just as I have left it in your window, and checked her with this thought, 'I must help him to be true to his finest self; in no other way can he win. It means that I must lose my life, and all for a vow I never made; but I care more that he should be true than that I should live, I love him too well to refuse.' And so, she seems to me to let God shine through her nobleness upon the world. Perhaps you had never thought of it in that way. It was so simple, so much an everyday thing to love another person so much that you gave yourself willingly to keep them true to their better selves, that you had not thought how easy it was, too, because the power came from God. You will say that I have ruined my reputation by leaving that little pane of glass plain; perhaps I have, but I am not unhappy because of it. I feel that my sacrifice may make some people think, and perhaps be more willing day by day to leave room in their crowded, bustling lives for God to shine through."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION. SUMMER SESSION AT OXFORD.

THE gathering of Sunday-school teachers begun at Manchester College on July 31 came to its end on Saturday last. Private anxieties did not destroy, and the solemnising sense of a great national trial seemed actually to deepen, the enthusiasm of members as the Session advanced; the wonderful stimulus of this universal call to duty has been felt by us also, in our seemingly incongruous retreat at Oxford, and having determined to continue our meetings to the end we found them nothing but a help and inspiration for all that now lies before us. Not only the spirit of the Session but the actual numbers too were well maintained to the close.

Our earlier report of the proceedings necessarily omitted the last three days. The lectures and meetings still to be recorded were (like the earlier part of the Session) divided between the study of subject-matter and some general aspects of our work and the practical discussion of method. To take the latter group first, Mr. Lewis Lloyd gave a valuable exposition of "The Graded Sunday School and its Lessons"; he set forth the need for grading (rising from the essential fact of different stages of development among the scholars); the details of method and organisation in the graded school, and the advantages which it possesses, especially in the incentive to work given to young teachers or "helpers." Some objections raised against the system were finally dealt with, and helpful books suggested for study. On the same evening a conference on "Lesson Preparation" was opened by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, who in a fine and inspiring address illustrated his methods by special reference to Psalm 104 as a lesson-subject. The discussion which followed was general, and very useful; it was agreed that the regular preparation class is excellent whenever possible, and that at the least every teacher should make some definite preparation (and not only in the quarter of an hour before school) a matter of conscience.

Professor T. Raymont, of Goldsmiths' College, received a hearty welcome to the Session and gave a particularly valuable lecture on "Lesson Illustration," treating first of concrete illustration of various types, and then of verbal illustration, which is most constantly used by the Sunday-school teacher. Professor Raymont spoke with all the authority of an expert in the subject, and made his lecture a delightful embodiment of his own principles.

Miss Pelton, of the West Hill Training Institute, Selly Oak, was also a very welcome visitor from the wider circle of workers. She gave a beautiful and inspiring talk on "Atmosphere in the Sunday School—the Power of the Indirect," pointing out the enormous influence of external conditions, and of all the forces of suggestion and personality, on the mind and spirit of the scholar. Suitable and beautiful premises for our work, and the right atmosphere throughout our school-session, are, she said, fully as important to the cause of religion as beautiful churches and stately forms of worship; for the Sunday school is the children's church. Gladness and reverence must be the prevailing notes in our work.

Miss D. Tarrant spoke on "The Ways of Children," treating the subject practically rather than theoretically, and giving many instances from the observation of individual children—a fruitful field of study for every teacher. The root-principle of the child's life is growth, and growth is of mind, character, and spirit concurrently. The Sunday-school teacher must, while allowing for the natural stages of progress, seek to keep all sides of the child's nature as strong and healthy as possible. The sense of God in all things must expand with the widening horizons of knowledge; and the child's simple faith is worth retaining all through life.

The "nature" lecture always included in the Session's programme was this year given by the Rev. H. M. Livens, who expounded by lantern slides and delightful comment "Adaptation in Nature, as illustrated by the Structure and Art of the Bee." Dwelling on some of the marvels of the bodily construction of the bee, and of its almost incredible instincts towards carrying out its life-work, he led his audience, through gravity and humour combined, to an irresistible sense of the great loving Purpose which works in all nature.

Finally, the arts were laid under contribution as inspiring forces for our work. The Rev. Lucking Tavenor made the long journey from Aberdeen to speak on "Some Pictures by G. F. Watts." It is a subject which Mr. Tavenor has made peculiarly his own, and he had the privilege of personal acquaintance with the great artist. He dwelt upon the deep spiritual purpose of all Watts' work (illustrating by detailed reference to a number of the pictures), and upon the universality of his religious message. Watts has been a true prophet for our age.

Mr. T. M. Chalmers, Secretary of the Association, delivered the last lecture of the Session, taking the title "Poetry is Power." Kindly supplying printed papers containing a set of short verse passages, he illustrated in detail from these the uses to which the Sunday-school teacher may turn the great utterances of the poets. Some passages may serve as clinching mottoes for our lessons, others (or whole poems) for detailed exposition, and others, again, chiefly for the teacher's own inspiration. The greatest poets have been good men; their life and their work say the best word that can be said on the world and its meaning. Mr. Chalmers' fine lecture lifted us to high levels, and was an appropriate close to this year's series.

It was arranged to close the Session on Friday night, leaving the next day free for travelling home. A "Teachers in Council" meeting gave opportunity for suggestions and also for some well-deserved votes of thanks. An hour of social intercourse and music followed, and finally a short service in the chapel, conducted by the President, Mr. Ion Pritchard. Thus the Session ended, as it had begun, on the note of worship.

It is impossible to estimate what the effect of such a gathering of workers may be on the life of our schools. It has heartened us all to go forward eagerly "for the children's sake," and both by our word and by our deed to take a worthy part during all the stress which lies before us. The Association's appeal for ready social service will surely meet with hearty response from our Sunday schools. The Oxford Session has been no academic retreat, but a time of reminder, never more needed than to-day, that the power of the Spirit still does and still shall prevail.

THE DUTY OF PACIFISTS IN THE PRESENT CRISIS.

THE following circular has been sent to us for publication:—

The present resort by the Powers of Europe to the fratricidal arbitrament of war is a lapse in civilisation against which the pacifists in all nations must protest with an utter detestation. But this is not the time to discuss and apportion responsibility for the inhuman folly into which Europe has been led.

At this time the pacifist has a duty to humanity and a duty to his country.

To humanity he owes it to watch unceasingly for the first reasonable chance that may come to press upon the statesmen and peoples of the belligerent nations the acceptance of the mediation offered by the one Great Power not engaged in the struggle, the American Republic.

To his country he owes, as a citizen, duties which must not be shirked. Every support must be given to all national and local efforts to make provision for the many hundreds and thousands of wounded, to provide immediate help for those who were dependent upon the dead, and to arrange for employment and aid for those brought to destitution by the rise in the cost of food and the spread of unemployment.

Every man and woman in the land is brought into the common trouble which war entails. It is the duty of all to give what help lies in their power to lessen the misery which inevitably must come.

War is a struggle of violence between States. We are not at war with individuals. We pacifists who have striven for years to promote Anglo-German Understanding and International Concord know how profoundly our efforts have been responded to by individual men and women of all lands. We appeal to all men and women of goodwill to show respect for, and sympathy with, the unfortunate subjects of Germany and Austria stranded in our midst. And this, not merely because our own compatriots are in similar plight throughout Europe, but from higher motives of self-respect and an intelligent and generous humanity.

Finally, pacifists have a most solemn duty to perform in promoting by every means in their power a spirit of national self-restraint, and those more generous and humane sentiments so easily swamped by the cruel facts of war. For unless this be faithfully realised we, in common with the democracies of all Europe, cannot escape the blighting influence which inevitably follows for the nations which give free rein to the spirit of ruthlessness and the lust for victory born of the barbarity of war.

CARL HEATH, Secretary of the National Peace Council.

W. EVANS DARBY, Secretary of the Peace Society.

F. MADDISON, Secretary of the International Arbitration League.

J. FREDK. GREEN, Secretary of the International Arbitration and Peace Association.

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

WE are informed that all arrangements for open air work in connection with the Unitarian Van Mission have been cancelled for the remainder of the present season. It is hoped, however, that the Vans may be used for preaching the Gospel in another form, and they will be held ready to serve the cause of humanity in any way which the need of the hour may suggest.

WE desire to call attention to a cheap edition of Canon Grane's work "The Passing of War," which has been issued recently (Macmillan & Co., 2s. 6d. net). This able work is in many ways a complement to the propaganda of Mr. Norman Angell. While agreeing with the economic thesis of "The Great Illusion," Canon Grane has devoted himself to marshalling the moral forces on the side of peace. "The chief hope for war's restraint and eventual passing," he writes, "lies in the gradual but growing prevalence of those Moral forces through which public opinion is increasingly informed and inspired as real civilisation spreads and primitive savagery recedes."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

London: The late Mr. Fleetwood Pritchard.—Mr. C. Fleetwood Pritchard died on Monday, August 10, at Craven Cottage, Southwold, after a long illness extending over nine months, aged 50. He was the eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. A. Goring Pritchard, of Hampstead. He was educated at King's College School, London, Académie de Lausanne (Faculté Technique), and Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he passed in the Mathematical Tripos. Mr. Pritchard was called to the Bar in the year 1888 (he was a pupil of the present Prime Minister), and practised at the Common Law and Parliamentary Bars, and was engaged in many important cases involving questions of municipal and local government law. He was the standing Counsel to the Association of Municipal Corporations. He was a Councillor and afterwards Alderman of the Metropolitan Borough of Hampstead, and about ten years ago was elected Mayor of the borough. He was also for several years a member of the Metropolitan Water Board. He served for many years as Lieutenant and Captain in the London Rifle Brigade. Mr. Pritchard was also a Justice of the Peace, and attended regularly at the Hampstead Police Court. He was married in 1893 to Lilian, daughter of the late Joseph Craven, of Steeton, Yorkshire, J.P., and leaves his widow and two sons and two daughters surviving. In his earlier years Mr. Pritchard was a member of the Newington Green Church, and a regular teacher in the Sunday school there. He will be remembered, too, as the one on whose work at one time depended the existence and carrying on of the Scholars' Provident Society. Later on in Hampstead he joined the Quex-road congregation and remained a member there for many years.

Monton.—It is announced in the Oxford Honours lists that Mr. Harold Broadbent, son of Mr. Hugh J. Broadbent, whose family has been connected for several generations with the Monton congregation, has obtained a first-class in "Greats." Beginning his education at Monton Day School, Mr. Broadbent took a foundation scholarship at the Manchester Grammar School in 1904. Leaving the Grammar School, with a Langworthy Scholarship and winning the Seaton Scholarship at the Victoria University of Manchester, and a Lancashire County Council Scholarship for proficiency in Secondary School subjects, he spent a year at the University of Manchester, obtaining from thence an open Classical Scholarship at Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1910. In 1912 he took a first in "Mods.," and has this year finished his course brilliantly as noted above. Mr. Broadbent, who intends to read for the Bar, is now serving as a lieutenant in the 7th Lancashire Fusiliers Territorials.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

WAR AND THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

Last Sunday afternoon a splendid demonstration was held in Ravenscourt Park, London, under the joint auspices of the Alliance Metropolitan Council and the Lawson Total Abstinence Society. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., gave an excellent and appropriate address on the connection between war and the temperance question. He pointed out how necessary it was at such a time for the people to exercise self-control. Let them avoid drink and persuade others to do the same. Mr. Chancellor also dealt in a very clear and able manner with the great destruction of food through the manufacture of intoxicants, and with the relation of the drink traffic to unemployment.

GENERAL PICQUART.

Mr. F. C. Conybeare has published a fine tribute to the memory of General Picquart in the Cornhill Magazine for August. It was General Picquart 'whose courage and fine sense of honour saved

France and the French army from the ignominy of the Dreyfus affair. He died on January 19 of this year as a result of a fall from his horse, a soldier whom France can ill spare at this hour of crisis. "All through the long years of persecution and calumny which he underwent," Mr. Conybeare writes, "no complaint ever passed his lips. No man was ever more dignified and self-contained. During this term of enforced leisure, not being able to use his talents in behalf of the army he loved, he busied himself with music, art, literature, and philosophy, in any of which pursuits, had he not given up his life to soldiering, he might have shone. If I were asked what most impressed me in his personality, I think I should say his modesty and simplicity. The one thing which he feared, as in death so in life, was to be applauded by the crowd and made a fuss about. He dreaded publicity; he only wanted to do his duty quietly and be let alone. In the public life of France, as of our own country, there is much cleverness, much self-advertisement, but too little character, and the contemplation of such a figure as Picquart is a useful tonic for our age."

* * *

"He was a patriot," Mr. Conybeare continues, "but he never went about shouting, and when all were raving around him and at him, he remained sane, serene, cheerful, but unflinching in his devotion to truth and justice, to humanity and patriotism. His was a knightly figure; he was well built, lithe and graceful in his movements. You felt yourself with him in the presence of a man of natural distinction, of an aristocrat in the best sense. In conversation he was quiet, ever to the point, using words to convince himself rather than his hearers, courteous and attentive; all the time a light in his eyes, often a quiet twinkle, which rendered his countenance extraordinarily friendly and sympathetic. In manner and mode of address he reminded me, more than anyone I ever met, of my friend the late Arthur Dendy, of University College, whose epitaph in our ante-chapel would serve equally well as his:

'A man of wise counsel, high honour and warm heart.'"

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE landing of the English expeditionary force upon French soil has been announced this week. The whole operation was carried out with a speed and quietness which must have astonished the world. The risks taken were of no ordinary kind with the German fleet still in being, but there was no surprise by the enemy, and there were no casualties among our men. This splendid achievement has occupied our thoughts so completely, that very little attention has been given to two other facts of great significance. This expeditionary force is the largest army which has ever left our shores, and for the first time our troops have gone to France as allies. It is not, we believe, merely self-interest, but something higher, which has turned the long feud between the two countries into cordial friendship. This dramatic sealing of the bond is one which appeals powerfully to the historical imagination.

* * *

THE King sent the following message to the troops on the eve of their departure :
You are leaving home to fight for the safety and honour of my Empire.
Belgium, whose country we are pledged to defend, has been attacked and France is about to be invaded by the same powerful foe.
I have implicit confidence in you my soldiers. Duty is your watchword, and I know your duty will be nobly done.

I shall follow your every movement with deepest interest and mark with eager satisfaction your daily progress ; indeed your welfare will never be absent from my thoughts.
I pray God to bless you and guard you and bring you back victorious.

* * *

THE temper in which our soldiers have crossed the sea, and which we pray they may retain unimpaired through all the perils and temptations of the campaign, has found noble expression in the instructions issued by Lord Kitchener, which every man will carry with him. They breathe a dutiful and chivalrous spirit, which is always one of the greatest moral assets in time of war :—
“ Remember,” Lord Kitchener says, “ that the honour of the British Army depends on your individual conduct.
“ It will be your duty not only to set an example of discipline and perfect steadiness under fire, but also to maintain the most friendly relations with those whom you are helping in this struggle. The operations in which you are engaged will, for the most part, take place in a friendly country, and you can do your own country no better service than in showing yourself in France and Belgium in the true character of a British soldier.
“ Be invariably courteous, considerate, and kind. Never do anything likely to injure or destroy property, and always look upon looting as a disgraceful act. You are sure to meet with a welcome and to be trusted ; your conduct must justify that welcome and that trust.”

MANY newspapers have shown some restiveness under the restrictions of the censorship. For ourselves, we are not inclined to question their wisdom. The public has behaved with admirable calmness under the strain of silence and anxiety. In the absence of definite news the usual crop of baseless stories, some of them of an alarmist description, began to circulate in the clubs and the streets, and the Official Press Bureau deemed it advisable to issue the following warning against false reports :—
“ The public are warned against placing the slightest reliance on the many rumours that are current daily regarding alleged victories or defeats and the arrival of wounded men or disabled ships in this country. These are without exception baseless.
“ The public may be confident that any news of successes or reverses to the British arms will be communicated officially without delay.”
The only comment which we have to make upon this statement is that it says exactly what we should expect. Fortunately, no other policy is possible in this country. Our strength depends upon honourable understandings which run through all classes of the community, and a calm preparedness of heart to know both the best and the worst.
* * *
THE Times has given currency to the following report :—
In diplomatic circles an interesting account is given of the final interview between Sir Edward Goschen and the German Imperial Chancellor, Herr von Bethmann Hollweg.
Speaking with considerable irritation, the Imperial Chancellor is said to have expressed inability to understand the attitude of England, and to have exclaimed, "Why should you make war upon us for a scrap of paper?"

Sir Edward Goschen is reported to have replied that he understood the German statesman's inability to comprehend British action, but that England attached importance to "the scrap of paper" (the Treaty guaranteeing Belgian neutrality) because it bore her signature, as well as that of Germany.

* * *

It is, of course, impossible to test the truth of a story of this kind, and we should not repeat it here if it were not so exactly in character. It puts into a nutshell the moral antagonisms which have been forced upon our attention in reading the White Book. The conflict between ourselves and the German Government has its source in an irreconcilable divergence of view upon questions of honour and international obligation. A dominant military caste finds treaties which guarantee the safety and neutrality of small countries inconvenient and out of date, and it sweeps them aside with barbarous rhetoric about national destiny and the mailed fist. Their opponent believes that apart from respect for the rights of others and loyalty to our pledged word there is no such thing as national greatness. The "scrap of paper," which bears our signature, is a symbol of the impalpable things, for the sake of which we are prepared to put everything else in jeopardy. We would rather see civilisation itself crushed under the heel of the conqueror than help it to survive on terms of dishonour.

* * *

SOME people are still obsessed by a fear of Russia, and feel that our own action at the present crisis may help to put Europe in worse chains than those of German militarism. Upon this point of view, which is causing genuine distress to some sensitive minds, we should like to make two remarks. The first is this, that it is surely wrong to allow the fears of more peaceful days to unnerve us for the commanding duty of the moment. The path of political speculation is strewn with disappointments. Not one man in ten thousand is capable of intelligent prevision where the clash of national forces and the emergence of dim populations into the light of civilisation are concerned. To refuse to withstand one enslaving form of militarism because it is possible that it will be replaced by another may be regarded in some quarters as the path of prudence, but it is surely quite inconsistent with the capacity for taking risks which all action on behalf of freedom and righteousness on a great scale must involve.

OUR second remark about this fear of Russia seems to us also worthy of consideration. We put it in the form of a question. Is it seriously contended that it is desirable to keep Russia permanently at bay by means of a frontier bristling with forts and strategic railways? Or is it our ideal that what we call European civilisation should retire behind the entrenchments which it has thrown up against barbarism? That can only mean militarism without end. There are in Russia vast resources of intellect and character and religious idealism which need liberation and development. Some of those who know the country best tell us that it is full of the stirrings of new life. The message of the Tsar to Poland, when we have made the fullest allowance for political motives, is full of promise. In any case it seems to us that the worthy attitude of Englishmen at the present time is to look forward hopefully to the influence which England and France together may exert in the direction of popular liberties and good government, instead of crippling themselves with fears and suspicions of Russian aggression. There is no reason in the nature of things why Russia should follow the disastrous example of Prussia, and capture the best brains of the country for the enslaving service of the military machine. Against that danger we can help to guard her alike in her own interest and that of Europe as a whole.

WE have no wish to deflect by a hairs-breadth the attitude of strict neutrality adopted by the United States in the present struggle. We regard it as a most important factor making for peace at the earliest possible moment. At the same time, we should be less than human if we did not welcome the personal sympathy of our American friends, and were not anxious on our side that they should understand our position. Important letters received at Essex Hall this week reflect a spirit of staunch friendship and a readiness to believe that we are fighting for what we believe to be true and right, which we have every reason to believe are widespread among the American people. "Our sympathies are with you," one writer says, "in the struggle which seems imminent at this moment, and we trust that if war cannot be avoided nothing will happen to cast a cloud upon the high ideals of civilisation which we cherish in common." The other letter speaks of the impossibility of Great Britain forsaking France, and of the need of curbing the military pride of

Germany, which has been the curse of the nation for the past forty years. "It is a dark hour in the history of mankind, and only shows what tremendous and malign power is entrenched in the armies and the military governments of modern nations."

* * *

ON Thursday morning the National Relief Fund stood at over £1,300,000. Collections were taken for it in the churches all over the country last Sunday, and met with a generous response. In many cases, however, the collection was postponed as it had not been announced beforehand. We hope that it will be taken without delay. Whatever may be done subsequently in the way of local or personal efforts it is of the utmost importance that we should act in this matter as a united people, without regard to private preferences. The humblest village chapel ought to feel the dignity, the largeness of aim, the unselfishness of purpose which are inseparable from a national movement. We want to help not merely our friends because they are our friends, but our countrymen because they are our countrymen, united to us by that strong and sacred bond.

* * *

WE have the fullest sympathy with the appeals which appear in our columns, pleading that the funds of those who are accustomed to work in the poor quarters of our great cities should be supported generously. At the same time, we hope that the warnings about the need of strict co-ordination of effort and the administration of relief on public lines will be observed. A great deal of church machinery must be placed freely at the disposal of the local relief committee; indeed the less the churches as such have to do with the actual distribution of relief the better. In the case of denominational efforts, which may arise later when the need becomes acute, we think that the same principles apply. The resources of a city or district ought as far as possible to be pooled, so that the distribution of help may be on equal lines. It would be lamentable if one mission were helped lavishly while another suffers from dire neglect, because personal feeling is allowed to outweigh the larger considerations of public interest.

It is becoming clear that the great rush to make shirts for the wounded has been more impulsive than wise. Apart from the need of providing work for women and girls thrown out of employment, many pleas have appeared in the press urging the need of continuing all forms of social service at the present time. This applies specially to the work connected with motherhood and infancy, where there is room for many more volunteers. To save the babies is to secure the future of our race. In an important letter on "Damage to the Nation," which appeared in the Manchester Guardian on Monday, Mr. Arthur Acland writes as follows:—

"It can be safely said that there are nearly half-a-million babies under twelve months in England and Wales, of whom many may be saved from death and many from permanent injury by disease if the mothers have proper advice and help. It is certain that not 10 per cent. of this number is getting adequate assistance in this way. There is an immense field of work which must be covered before the remaining 90 per cent. are reached. There are hundreds of towns and villages where there is no organisation for this purpose. Organisers and lecturers will have to be trained to understand thoroughly what has to be done. Pioneer work must be carried on all over the country. The Board of Education and the Local Government Board offer for different branches of the work grants in aid up to 50 per cent. of the expenses of an association doing its work in the proper way. Voluntary committees can receive grants, and this ought to be a great incentive to personal service. In only a few cases has the work been done by the municipalities." Information and advice can be had from the Secretary of the Association of Infant Consultation and Schools for Mothers, 4, Tavistock-square, London, W.C.

Just as we go to press we hear the announcement of the death of the Pope. This week we can only express our deep and respectful sympathy with the great Church throughout the world who looked up to him as the chief shepherd of souls. Pius X. had no extraordinary gifts. He will not rank with men of political genius like Gregory VII. or Innocent III., or even with his immediate predecessors. He was a man of deep and earnest piety, who was exalted by the exigencies of the moment to a great position which he was not specially marked out to fill. His policy towards the modernists, while it revealed a capacity for moral passion on behalf of the integrity of the faith, was the outcome of a mind cast on narrow and unimaginative lines. It is possible that the election of his successor may be the occasion for diplomatic intrigue on the part of Austria, but it will be of no avail, for the days of the political importance of the papacy are gone. The only method by which it can exercise a powerful influence in the present struggle is by asserting its spiritual hegemony over its warring children and so leading them back into the paths of peace.

No one can doubt the seriousness of purpose which animates the people of these islands. It has dissolved the spirit of faction, and hushed party quarrels, and made many controversies, over which we grew hot and eager in more tranquil days, seem remote and unreal. There has been the strong note of religion through it all. It has not been merely the sense of common danger and the kindling power of common ambitions which have united us. It is faith in God and the desire to bear ourselves worthily as the servants of His will, which have been at work in our hearts. The words, "Quit you like men, be strong," have come to us as a divine command. The soul of the nation has been revealed. Loyalty to it has become our greatest good, the support which it gives us in moments of weakness or personal anxiety our surest refuge. All that is lonely and limited, born of self and ending in self in thought and action, is lost in the larger flow of the common life. We are nearer to our fellows, and through fellowship nearer to God than we have ever been before.

The Soul of the Nation! It is no dim abstraction, but as real as ourselves, because it is a sacred and enduring part of our own life. What has created it? How in these days of trial and warfare can it be sustained? All our past has gone to the making of it, days of triumph and days of misfortune; sufferings patiently borne and joys unselfishly shared; the spirit of adventure, and the call of the sea; the discipline of common life in schools and trade unions and public affairs; the long struggle for freedom; the growing feeling of honour for all men; the life of parents and children in the home; our domestic pieties, often neglected, but never quite forgotten; the Church of CHRIST and its message; the fellowship of public worship, and the consecration of common ideals; the Bible, whose words of hope and trust blend with our most sacred affections for the living and the dead. And in and through all these things, using them for purposes which often run far beyond our human sight, the Spirit of the living God. This is the Soul of the Nation, built up through the long generations of things which we must hold and use together, if we are to possess them at all.

What have we done to foster and sustain it? Hitherto, perhaps, very little with conscious and deliberate aim, though every unselfish purpose of our lives, each moment of self-surrender to the highest, goes to enrich the common weal. But now all high and generous purposes have leapt to the front. We feel the joy of service in our blood. A fine recklessness about our private concerns has taken possession of our hearts. We want to do something, no matter how humble it may be, for our country. In a flash of conviction it has come home to us what England has done for us. "What can I do for England?"

England, my mother,
Wardress of waters,
Builder of peoples,
Maker of men.

In the midst of all this eager desire to be up and doing, to help somebody in some way, let us be careful not to lose our sense of proportion, and with it our perception of the deeper needs of men. Everything which is of real service to the higher life of the people is wanted at the present time. What shall it profit us if we gain brilliant victories, and restore the wounded to health, if we lose our soul? Whatever happens, we have to go through days of possible humiliation with a good courage, and to come out of the struggle at the end with our ideals untarnished and our spiritual energies braced for fresh conflicts. Here the churches have an urgent duty. No doubt they will at once place all the resources of their organised philanthropy and their intimate knowledge of the homes of the people at the service of poverty and suffering. But they have something else to do as well. The soul of the nation is looking to them for help. The fires of love must be replenished day by day. Behind the quiet demeanour of our people and their eagerness to help is the heart's confidence in God, and unless it is renewed continually all that depends upon it may wither and disappear. It is accordingly of the utmost importance that the churches should not be allowed to suffer in any way which will impair their efficiency for spiritual service. Probably they will suffer, many of them severely, in finance. They may also find themselves compelled, by a sense of the urgency of deeper needs around them, to simplify or abandon some of their usual activities. But whatever happens let them give themselves with the joy of complete self-abandonment to their supreme work, the worship of God, the discipline of conscience, and the prophetic word of righteousness, which are themselves action, for they are the source from which all noble action flows.

To the pastors of CHRIST's flock in particular a unique opportunity has come. If they are to be worthy of it, all weakness of will and wavering of purpose must be cast aside. Many men have sighed for a ministry harder in its dedication, more apostolic in its simplicity, with a stronger sense of urgent spiritual claims, than has seemed possible to them amid the conventional standards of the modern world. Suddenly all these things have come to them without their going forth to seek them. Does the moment of testing and decision find them ready, every man at his post, diligent and alert as an officer on active service? We doubt not that many men who have been slack will be slack no more; that others who have thought too much of their own comfort or ambition will crush these things beneath their feet. As preachers, let them forsake the arts of self-conscious cleverness and the taste for smart novelties which have been the ruin of much modern preaching, and appeal in simple language to the hearts of men out of the unsearchable riches of Christian experience. As pastors, let them visit diligently the homes of their people, chosen messengers of sympathy, wise counsel and consolation, speaking good tidings of good things while all the world rings with the discords of war.

A short time ago many able men were inclined to regard the Christian ministry as a calling which had exhausted its power for good. Does anyone with deep insight into the issues of our time feel that now? Is it possible in this mood of sober feeling and stern resolution to speak lightly of what religion has done for our people in the past, or to despise the still greater things which it is capable of doing for them in the future, if through this fiery trial they remain loyal to the claims of brotherhood and just judgment and generous feeling, and the love and worship of Almighty God?

Here, at any rate, are some very practical ways in which our influence, our teaching, and our prayers can help the soul of the nation.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

I WILL make mention of the loving kindnesses of the Lord, and the praises of the Lord, according to all that the Lord hath bestowed on us, and the great goodness toward the house of Israel, which he hath bestowed on them according to his mercies, and according to the multitude of his loving kindnesses.

For he said, Surely they are my people, children that will not deal falsely: so he was their Saviour.

In all their affliction he was afflicted, and the angel of his presence saved them: in his love and in his pity he redeemed them; and he bare them, and carried them all the days of old.—Isaiah lxi. 7-9.

BE inspired with the belief that life is a great and noble calling, not a mean and grovelling thing that we are to shuffle through as we can, but an elevated and lofty destiny.—GLADSTONE.

O LORD, my God! the amazing horrors of darkness were gathered round me, and covered me all over, and I saw no way to go forth; I felt the depth and extent of the misery of my fellow-creatures separated from the Divine harmony, and it was heavier than I could bear, and I was crushed down under it; I lifted up my hand, I stretched out my arm, but there was none to help me; I looked round about, and was amazed. In the depths of misery, O Lord, I remembered that Thou art omnipotent; that I had called Thee Father; and I felt that I loved Thee, and I was made quiet in my will, and I waited for deliverance from Thee. Thou hadst pity upon me, when no man could help me; I saw that meekness under suffering was showed to us in the most affecting example of Thy Son, and Thou taughtest me to follow Him, and I said, "Thy will, O Father, be done."

JOHN WOOLMAN.

GENTLENESS, Virtue, Wisdom, and Endurance—

These are the seals of that most firm assurance

Which bars the pit over Destruction's strength;

And, if with infirm hand, Eternity, Mother of many acts and hours, should free

The serpent that would clasp her with his length;

These are the spells by which to reassume
An empire o'er the disentangled doom.

To suffer woes which hope thinks infinite;
To forgive wrongs darker than death or night;

To defy Power which seems omnipotent;
To love, and bear; to hope till Hope creates

From its own wreck the thing it contemplates;

Neither to change, nor falter, nor repent;
This, like thy glory, Titan, is to be Good, great, and joyous, beautiful and free;
This is alone Life, Joy, Empire, and Victory!

SHELLEY.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

WHENE'ER a noble deed is wrought,
Whene'er is spoken a noble thought,
Our hearts in glad surprise,
To higher levels rise.

The tidal wave of deeper souls
Into our inmost being rolls,
And lifts us unawares
Out of all meaner cares.

Honour to those whose words or deeds
Thus help us in our daily needs,
And by their overflow
Raise us from what is low.

Thus thought I, as by night I read
Of the great army of the dead,
The trenches cold and damp,
The starved and frozen camp.

The wounded from the battle-plain,
In dreary hospitals of pain,
The cheerless corridors,
The cold and stony floors.

Lo! in that house of misery
A Lady with a Lamp I see
Pass through the glimmering gloom,
And flit from room to room.

And slow, as in a dream of bliss,
The speechless sufferer turns to kiss
Her shadow, as it falls
Upon the darkening walls.

As if a door in heaven should be Opened, and then closed suddenly,
The vision came and went,
The light shone and was spent.

On England's annals, through the long
Hereafter of her speech and song,
That light its rays shall cast
From portals of the past.

A Lady with a Lamp shall stand
In the great history of the land,
A noble type of good,
Heroic womanhood.

LONGFELLOW.

LET us pray for the help and guidance of God in this time of trouble.

Let us pray for those to whom is committed the government of the nation, that they may act with wisdom and courage.

Let us pray for the sailors and soldiers of the King.

Let us pray for the sick and wounded, whether our own or of the enemy; and let us commend to the mercy of God those who fall in the service of their country.

Let us pray that peace may be restored, and that the issues of the war may be over-ruled for the glory of God and the enlargement of his kingdom.

O ALMIGHTY God, who alone canst order the unruly wills and affections of sinful men: Grant unto thy people, that they may love the thing which thou commandest, and desire that which thou dost promise; that so, among the sundry and manifold changes of the world, our hearts may surely there be fixed, where true joys are to be found; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

ALMIGHTY and merciful God, who art the strength of the weak, the refreshment of the weary, the comfort of the sad, the help of the tempted, the life of the dying, the God of patience and all consolation; thou knowest the inner weakness of our nature, how we tremble and quiver before pain, and cannot bear the cross without thy divine help and support. Help us, then, O eternal and pitying God, to possess our souls in patience, to maintain unshaken hope in thee, to keep the childlike trust which feels a Father's heart beneath the cross. So shall we be strengthened with power according to thy glorious might, in all patience and long-suffering; we shall be enabled to endure pain and temptation, and, in the very depth of our suffering, to praise thee with a joyful heart. Amen.

THE EUROPEAN CRISIS.

A MESSAGE TO OUR PEOPLE.

IN this hour of terrible trial for the nations of Europe we shall do well to encourage and strengthen one another in cleaving to that which is good. Two great temptations beset us: one, to lose the higher spirit in anger, not altogether unrighteous anger, against those who have dragged the nations into this fearful calamity, and in bitter feelings towards those who are now our enemies; the other to lose faith in the eternal supremacy of Justice and Love, when we think of millions of men who have no grudge against one another being driven to mutual carnage by small groups of statesmen.

In regard to the first, let us remember that anger cannot judge justly, and the time for judgment is not yet. The Christian law of love extends to enemies—a height which it is very hard to reach; but we can slay the enemy in our own hearts through prayer, and preserve a holy calm, which may shed its healing influence when the time comes.

The temptation to despair may be diminished if we remember the signs of degeneracy which have made many of us anxious during recent years, and reflect that some great shock may have been needed to teach us that life is more than ease and pleasure, and consists not in the abundance of the things that we possess. We have often asked ourselves how much Christianity was left in so-called Christendom, and when the politicians of the world would have any faith in the Christ whom they professed to worship. As in the evil days when the light of Christianity first rose upon the world, may we not hope that, when these horrors are past, there will be a new coming of the Son of Man, seen in the advent of a true Kingdom of Humanity, when the nations will recognise that all are children of God, and those who are appointed to rule will feel the solemnity of their high calling as servants of the Prince of Peace?

It is for us to watch and pray and labour for the coming of that time, and to cherish in ourselves that Holy Spirit without which all is war and confusion. When Europe has been deluged with blood, some sort of settlement must come, and the voice of reason and justice be listened to if only owing to the exhaustion of evil passion. Then let us be ready to help in reconstituting society on a more Christian basis, and providing some more powerful and united expression of the sense of brotherhood, so that the masses of the people may be able to assert the higher will and never again be the helpless slaves of violence and greed. Let the Lord's Prayer, so often uttered, become the real burden of our hearts, and with a depth of meaning unfelt before let us pray that God's Kingdom may come, and his Will be done on earth, and that we may have grace to forgive as we have been forgiven.

No words are needed to urge each and all to do what in them lies to serve their country in the present crisis; for charity and duty are living and active among us, and will not fail us in the day of need. May God send us a more exalted faith, and a love which is constant, even unto death.

OUR FIRST DUTY.

THE outbreak of the appalling war in which Europe is now engaged came upon many people with a shock so sudden and violent that their faith reeled and their trust was well-nigh gone. The magnitude of the horror bewilders us and begets needless doubts and illusions. For those who believe in the Divine Immanence, it is a hideous thought that the energies of the Eternal are employed for mutual slaughter, and that the shot and shell which mow down the ranks of advancing combatants move by the same force as that which ripened the corn in the fields round Liège, now devastated and desolate. But, though the scale of this war transcends all the conflicts of history, it is not morally worse because of its size. Evil is not a greater violation of God's Rule because there is more of it. Our quantitative estimates mislead us; and we think that because of the exceptional agony involved some act of the Father should have arrested the doers of the wrong ere it was too late. But the problem is just as serious in the case of a street brawl, or any one of the multitudinous forms of daily sinfulness from heart to heart. Wherever Self and God come into collision, the whole question of the Moral Order of the world at once confronts us; and those who have learned the meaning of fall and forgiveness, of recovery and restoration, know that even this dire struggle may not be too great a price to pay for the regeneration of nations.

For that is the real goal. We ourselves have hushed our party strife, and none is for a faction, but all are for the state. It is the same everywhere. In each country that is engaged what provision is made for the relief of suffering, for injured combatants, and poverty-stricken homes! That is everywhere recognised as the first duty of those who do not fight, and the thousand beneficent activities called forth in this land have innumerable counterparts abroad. There is a foundation of sympathy on which the wounded sense of national brotherhood may rest and regain its strength. As we take up our share in these ministrations, let us also prepare ourselves for the labours and burdens of the future. This war, if the masses engaged in it will but have it so, should be the last which will be allowed to drench Europe with blood. No peace will be worth having which does not bring with it that security. But such a peace will require the concentration of all the moral forces now scattered among the contending nations. To organise them into effective action will need untiring energy; and to prepare for the future modes of preserving international order will demand the continuous thought and goodwill of men of all ranks and conditions. The one thing that Christians cannot do is to abandon the attempt. To pronounce it impossible is to reject all moral authority, to deny God, and let Might rule Right. By the clash of battle unscrupulous military ambitions may be checked, and the voices of the peoples who have no grievances against each other will then make themselves heard. Let us be ready to seize the first opportunity to bring the Powers to listen to the cry "Lay down your arms."

IN WAR TIME.

SIR,—May I express my gratitude for the brave stand taken by THE INQUIRER in the cause of peace, and especially for the profoundly Christian spirit which inspires the message to your readers in the issue of August 8? In such an hour we need the strength of conscious communion with fellow-workers and fellow-seekers; you must have helped many to feel that they did not struggle alone, but are members of a great company following the same Master, and seeking the same goal.

Even now the darkness is broken by rays of light. People seem to realise, as never before at the outset of a great war, how terrible and hateful a thing war is. The whole nation has been solemnised by the thought. Even our public prayers in war-time have become more Christian, remembering before God those against whom our arms are raised, less selfish and exclusive in our claims; in private, and sometimes in public too, many a prayer has gone up in which the contending nationalities have been already brought near and reconciled in the light of the enduring love of God.

The national need has evoked a noble outpouring of unselfish sacrifice, in which rich and poor alike have joined, social differences have sunk into oblivion, and a real sense of comradeship has sprung into being, which shows that beneath the surface of our national life there was latent a deep sense of brotherhood and high capacity for unselfish service.

Upon such a foundation may not a more Christian civilisation be built than that which made this world-war possible? Let the lovers of peace link themselves up with this great band of workers for the common good, so that we may not only help to heal the wounds of war, but prepare ourselves as nations for a better way of life.—Yours, &c.,

T. EDMUND HARVEY.

HOSPITALITY FOR FOREIGNERS.

SIR,—Mr. Tarrant's generous and timely plea for toleration to Germans in our midst leads me to ask your readers for assistance—in the way of offers of hospitality—for Germans and Austrians, especially for educated women and girls who, owing to this ghastly war, are obliged to remain in this country, but are without means and without protection. The Society of Friends has initiated an emergency committee for looking after such women, and Lady Courtney of Penwith and other well-known people are lending valuable assistance, whilst the Archbishop of Canterbury, among others, and the Home Office have assured us of their sympathy and goodwill.

Officers of help should be sent to Mrs. Thomas, at 169, St. Stephen's House, Westminster.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES WEISS.

EVENING SCHOOLS AND THE WAR.

SIR,—In time of peace Education Authorities at this period of the year arrange finally the winter session of evening schools and classes. I am desired to urge that in time of war this work should have a larger extension, with curriculum, fees, and conditions relaxed where necessary. Young people will take life more seriously this winter. Evening amusements will disappear. Home will be less attractive in many cases. Many will be unemployed. If half work on half-pay takes the place of dismissals, many more will be only partially employed. This is the opportunity for the school to do good educational work, and to serve the wider need of national distress. Unless required urgently for the army, why should not every school building be open every night, to all who will come, for some educational purpose? The Education Authority has a right to impose that educational test and not to allow the buildings to be appropriated for merely social purposes. The youth of the nation needs them educationally; never more than now. But, at this crisis, the conditions might well be modified, and the curriculum be made comprehensive enough to admit all possible students.—Yours, &c.,

A. J. MUNDELLA.

NATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

SIR,—The Rev. Basil Martin has clearly overlooked what is surely obvious in Dr. Martineau's arguments which you quoted. That is, the doctrine of the Divine Sovereignty. Not that arbitrary theory which many heard set forth in the long past, but that the Supreme Will must enforce justice impartially and sustain inviolably fealty to truth in every soul of man. His government eternally insists upon and supports righteousness, and cannot but thwart and punish all wrongdoing of men or nations. Whether that idea is merely Hebrew, or can be traced to Greek and Roman sources as well and easily, is quite unimportant, the fact is the thing, and that in a few short days Britain at home and abroad has been unified as one heart and soul, and with one grand purpose. No hate, no revenge is cherished against Germans as a people, but there has arisen a stern resolve to uphold England's fair fame and name, to show her detestation of infamous proposals, her unswerving attachment to freedom and determination at any cost to redeem her pledges of honour.

This is no war of aggressors, but of self-defence against aggression.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE WESTBURY.

Littlehampton, Aug. 17, 1914.

REDUCING EXPENDITURE.

SIR,—A correspondent in your issue of to-day expresses the fear that by reducing expenditure well-to-do people will bring hardship to tradespeople and workmen. But is it not obvious that those who spend less on themselves and their own household and give what they thus save either in money or in food and clothing to others who are in greater need, cause quite as much employment as they would if they spent the whole upon themselves? This point is, I think, clear without discussing deeper economic problems of the harmful effects of luxury. The question is likely to be whether some shall have the bare necessities of life or others shall have luxuries.—Yours, &c.,

WAR DISTRESS AND OUR MISSIONS.

SIR,—Permit me to support the appeal made by the Rev. Gordon Cooper in your columns last week. Through the voluntary and definite visiting of the collectors of our Blackfriars Provident Bank, we reach about 1,550 families every week, and I can assure you that the present distress, even amongst the unemployed, the under-employed, and the dependent wives and children and aged parents of soldiers, sailors, and Territorials, now on active service, is very great indeed. One-third of the members of my minister's class have been called up, and of the remainder, scarcely any but are on half-time employment, and the consequent anxiety and distress, especially with expectant mothers, is keen. Hence I quite agree with Mr. Cooper's statement that our missions are peculiarly able to help, and help effectively, and, above all, swiftly wherever our special funds are augmented for this purpose. Let me assure the charitable-minded that my connection with the Local Distress Committee and with the C.O.S. are definite safeguards against the dangers of over-lapping or abuse. I shall not only be pleased to receive and duly acknowledge gifts of money and clothing and maternity necessities (these last for my wife's distribution), but especially to hear of offers of temporary and supplementary employment for the workless and the worker on short time.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM J. PIGGOTT.

SAINT OR SEER?

SIR,—Mr. Jupp asserts that we never apply the word saint to Jesus. Has he forgotten the closing strain of The Seat of Authority in Religion, wherein Dr. Martineau claims that amongst the conspicuously righteous, who are for us the real angels, Jesus of Nazareth holds the place of Prince of Saints, perfects the pure life and reveals the highest possibilities of the soul? In his Home Prayers there is also a reference to Jesus as the "Chief of Saints." Mr. Jupp makes the same assertion with regard to Wordsworth. Has he forgotten the glowing chapter in Natural Religion, where Prof. Seeley claims Wordsworth with great fervour as the Saint of the religion of Nature? There are many instances in which Emerson is hailed as the Saint of New England. Being away from my books, I cannot give the exact quotations in the above cases, but anyone can verify the references.

Into the question of "Saint or Seer?" I do not here enter.—Yours, &c.,

FRANK K. FREESTON.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

WHAT CAN CHILDREN DO?

I HAVE been thinking about those bright little gardens that you come across here and there on the District Railway—tunnel-gardens you might call them, only they are found, of course, between the tunnels not in the tunnels. They are cultivated by the railway-men, who are allowed to plant and sow seeds wherever there is any available space—and sufficient light and air, and although they have many difficulties to contend with—especially when the express trains dash past, causing such a strong wind that the taller flowers are in danger of being mown down like grass—most of them contrive to make their flower-beds a perfect blaze of colour.

Just think what it means to come out into the daylight for a few minutes after rushing along in the dark underground, as you have probably done many a time, and catch sight of stately hollyhocks, orange-coloured marigolds, scarlet geraniums, or trailing nasturtiums with their lovely tints and wonderful leaves, all bathed in the sunshine that streams down between the tall buildings rising like cliffs around them. It is like looking into a kind, smiling face when you are feeling cross and tired—like quenching your thirst at a bubbling spring after a long country walk—like the first day of the holidays when there is nothing to do but play and be merry—like anything delightful, in fact, which comes to you, often unexpectedly, when you are beginning to think that nothing nice will ever happen again. These gardens remind me of a journey I once took along the southern coast of France as far as Genoa. The railway passes through more tunnels than I should care to count at that point, some very long, others quite short—mere gateways in the rock, in fact—and between the tunnels you get exquisite glimpses of the blue sea, blue sky, and distant blue mountains, quaint French or Italian villages nestling under the wooded hills, and roof-gardens gay with vines and all manner of flowers. But that is another story!

Now, if love and care and the desire to brighten the dingiest surroundings can make flowers grow between the two yawning mouths of two black tunnels, surely we might all do a little more to brighten the homes we live in and spread the sunshine of happiness all around us. Very happy homes they are for the most part—and that, you know, is because somebody has been anxious to make them so, somebody has troubled to think for others, somebody has been acting unselfishly day after day, and month after month, and year after year, to keep us properly clothed and fed, and free from any pain that can be prevented. But just now, in spite of all these efforts, none of us are quite as light-hearted and happy as we should like to be. There is a shadow over all the land, and some of us are learning for the first time what it is. It is the shadow of war. Great nations that are called Christian have forgotten the teaching of Jesus, and are fighting each other for their possessions, and the people of England, though they have tried so hard to keep out of the hateful struggle, have felt compelled to take part in it to protect their friends and allies. Nothing that anyone can say can really make us forget this dreadful thing that has happened, or lift the cloud that hangs over the country we love so dearly, as well as over the other countries of Europe. But, however sad we may feel, we who believe in the teaching of Jesus must do our best to keep the flag of peace flying wherever we may be; we must love more and complain less; we must learn to curb our temper, and cease to grumble whenever things go wrong; we must do a hundred things that we have perhaps never done before to show that we still love and serve our Master, who gave his whole life for others.

At a time like this, when everybody should be longing to help the Motherland, it would be unutterably selfish to go about with long faces and useless hands, and there is very much that children can do, as you will soon find out if you really wish to be busy and helpful. But one thing we must do—we must make up our minds to sow seeds of joy and happiness and goodness wherever we have a chance, instead of adding to the gloom which war always brings with it. That is the only way to make sure that the ugly weeds of unkindness and greediness which really cause war shall not have room to spring up in the world again. Think of those flowers that grow so straight and tall, and array themselves in such lovely colours, on the dingy underground railway, making no complaint, I am sure, because they were not planted in green meadows or fragrant gardens far away in leafy Kent or Sussex. And think of the patient labour of the men who sowed, and planted, and dug, and weeded, and watered—sometimes, too, they have to carry their cans long distances if their plot of ground is far from a station—and all to make a little patch of beauty at the tunnel's mouth! Surely we can do something like that to make England a brighter place to live in during these sad and sorrowful days.

It is not very difficult; it is really the most delightful occupation in the world. But you must give your mind to it, and remember that whatever misery there is in the world, and however cruelly men may misunderstand and hurt each other, God is above all just as the sun still shines in heaven, and God is love. One day, when everybody is less selfish, and the nations grow wiser, we shall be able to realise this better, and then that Kingdom will come which we pray for daily when we repeat the Lord's Prayer—the Kingdom of which Jesus dreamed when he taught us to be gentle, and merciful, and forgiving, and kind, and to behave to each other like brothers and sisters who have the same heavenly Father. But this cannot be unless we do something to help. You might just as well expect the choicest roses to grow on some wild common which is left uncared for and untended from one year's end to another. The world will never be full of love until we make it so, and that is why, like the railway-men, we must think about things that are beautiful in the midst of things that are ugly. And as soon as we begin to think about them we shall long to bring them into existence, just as the artist longs to set down on canvas the lovely visions he has seen with the inward eye, or the musician longs to put down on paper in curious signs that may yet be read perfectly by others, the melodies that his spirit hears when nobody else catches a sound. Let us give honour to those who are willing to die for their country, but let us also show that others can achieve quite as much who live for their country, doing the work that has been given them to do, and helping everybody with bright smiles and loving deeds that shall spring up like flowers, and make our land once more a happy place when the dark shadows pass away.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

DR. CLIFFORD ON THE WAR.

To all who heard Dr. Clifford preach last Sunday morning at Westbourne Park Chapel the occasion will ever be a memorable one. The congregation—as in most of the churches—was unusually large for August, but over it hung the shadow of a great dread which is still numbing the heart of Europe. For all we knew, the great armies which had been drawing nearer and nearer to each other for days on the frontiers of Belgium and France were at their deadly work of mutual destruction even as we assembled together for worship, and we were scarcely in the mood to rejoice and give thanks. Yet the service opened with a triumphant outburst of praise as all rose to their feet and sang the Doxology, led by Dr. Clifford. It was an inspiring experience, a direct challenge to the faith that grows nerveless and weak so quickly in times of great affliction, and some, at least, who shared in it realised as they had never done before that though nation should rise against nation till all the world is whelmed in ruin, the Lord omnipotent reigneth, the Eternal abideth for ever.

Trust in God and absolute fearlessness in the face of doubts that assail our inward peace was the dominant note throughout the service, and it was characteristic of Dr. Clifford, who has led his followers for so many years on a great crusade against the forces of evil, and confronts them dauntlessly like a happy warrior still, that he should utter a rallying call when we needed more than anything else to be strengthened and uplifted in spirit. Few of those present will ever forget the touching directness and poignancy of the long and beautiful prayer, broken by heavy pauses when the emotional tension became almost unbearable, or his restrained references to the momentous events which in two short weeks have shattered the hopes of pacifists and reformers all over the world. But it was not, said Dr. Clifford, a time for utter despondency, in spite of the anguish and horror which we should inevitably be called upon to face, and which almost made the heart stand still with fear. Rather it was a time for making anew those tremendous affirmations which the Hebrew prophets, as well as Jesus, our Master, had always made when the shadows were darkest and the nations in peril. He reminded us, by quotations from Isaiah, Habakkuk, Hosea and the Psalms, which seemed strangely appropriate at the present crisis, of the heroic temper with which these men faced every disaster that could menace a sorely tried people, even the consciousness of their own folly, sustained as they were by a sense of the glory and power of God which nothing could shake. He was their fortress and defence. The deeper their sorrow, the more terrible their foes, the more steadfast was their faith in Him who had guided their fathers in unknown ways, and would, they were confident, bring them out of all their troubles. They expressed this central reality of their lives in many ways; they dwelt lovingly upon it, and were manifestly strengthened and supported by it. "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear?" said the Psalmist. "The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?"

These triumphant words, and, indeed, the whole of the 27th Psalm, were the theme of the discourse, and Dr. Clifford returned again and again to the supreme fact of the power and might of God, which, he said, he was convinced people were rediscovering in these dark and terrible days. He felt that one of the greatest results of the calamity that had befallen the nations, and well-nigh broken the hearts of all who were striving to uphold the cause of peace, would be that the people would turn again to God. There were signs of it already—signs, too, that the work of those who had been labouring to educate public opinion on the ideal side had not laboured in vain. The sense of national responsibility had deepened considerably since the time of the South African war; our poets were not so flamboyant in these days as they had been then; the Jingoistic element no longer predominated in the country, and the hatred of war had grown so intense that nothing but the obligations of honour could have forced England into it. Yes, though we were plunged into a terrible struggle, the outcome of which no man could foretell, war was passing; and when the nations emerged from this conflict it would be with a clearer conception of the rights of mankind and the principles which should govern international relationships. They must reaffirm their faith; and though they could not always remain on the heights of exaltation, even through their supplications they would find strength. "Hide not thy face from me. Put not thy servant away in anger. . . Cut me not off, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation," was the cry of a man sinking under the oppression of a great despair; but out of that abyss he could rise with new courage, and proclaim, "I had fainted unless I had believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living." With such faith in God, though our way was as yet dark before us, we, too, must believe that we should once again see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living.

WORK AND WORSHIP IN WAR TIME.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

Sunday, August 9, will live in the memory of many as a day which revealed the religious fervour dormant in the heart of the nation—a day when mere conventionality no longer held sway, and men and women went to church and chapel, not to criticise or to conform, but to pray. It was not my lot to attend any of the great cathedrals or churches, no stately ritual or glorious music helped my devotions; indeed, I entered no "place of worship" in the ordinary sense of the word. Yet the brief half-hour's service in which I was privileged to take part is one which I shall never forget, for it was wholly unique, and gripped the living forces of this, England's supreme hour, as few others had the opportunity of doing.

We have all been interested lately in the appearance of the new £1 notes which the Government have issued to relieve the pressure on the gold supply of this country in war time. We were glad enough to have them when they came, though some have been graceless enough to criticise them as inartistic productions, bearing a strong resemblance to lottery tickets! Few of the general public probably realise what a vast amount of work they have entailed, or how lengthy and complicated is the process by which they are produced. The preparation of the design, the arrangements for printing and distribution, have meant a great deal of time and labour to many high officials, who have worked night and day in order that the public might have them in their hands at the earliest possible moment, and on the Sunday humbler toilers had, in addition, to forego their weekly rest. All day on the premises of Messrs. Waterlow Bros. & Layton the presses were busy as usual, and men and women were working cheerfully and uncomplainingly, serving their country just as truly as their friends and relatives who had gone to the front on active service.

And that is how I come to have before me a paper bearing the address, "Broken Wharf, Upper Thames-street, London, E.C." We had come through a strange London to be present at this service, so thoughtfully arranged by the firm responsible for printing the new notes—a London where the War Office, the Admiralty, and H.M. Stationery Office were full of busy workers. At the last-named all was stir and commotion outside, the yard full of wagons being loaded, and inside piles and piles of stationery, typewriters, duplicators, &c., packed ready for despatching to our soldiers.

About 12.30 we arrived at Messrs. Waterlow's factory. Here, again, there was no Sabbath stillness. But, thanks to the kind thought of the employers, in the midst of work there was to be worship—a thought which was appreciated to the full by those concerned. We mounted in the big, bare lift to the folding room, a large, airy place filled with sunlight and looking on to the river. Seated on benches as at their work were nearly 300 employees, men and women. The girls had obviously donned their Sunday best. I was struck by their neat and well-cared-for appearance, but one of the staff, who evidently took an enormous pride in them, apologised for their smartness. "They look ever so much nicer in their everyday clothes!" he said. A small table draped with the Union Jack served as reading desk for Canon Newbolt, who was to take the service. As he came in all rose, and we sang "O God, our help in ages past." Everyone joined in very heartily, and quite a large volume of sound was produced, the earnestness and reverence of the whole congregation being most noticeable. Then we had a shortened Litany, the Lord's Prayer, one or two Collects, "Through all the changing scenes of life," a short and earnest sermon, and finished with the National Anthem, followed by the Blessing.

It was all very simple, and very quickly over. But it seemed to me, as I mingled with the little group of officials and their families after we had dispersed, and left the workers to their toil, as if a sanctifying touch had been laid upon this bit of self-sacrificing work for King and country. For it had been consecrated, not only with the influences of organised religion, but was permeated through and through with something more precious still—with that spirit of trust and affection between employer and employed, which, if it were only more widespread, would do more to solve our industrial problems than the most elaborate schemes of social and economic reform.

INTERNATIONAL GOOD TEMPLAR CONGRESS.

THE MEETING AT CHRISTIANIA.

THE outbreak of war had a curious effect on the International Good Templar Conference which was held for several days in the Parliament House at Christiania, when representatives attended from all divisions of the globe. The Parliament had voted 10,000 crowns towards the expenses of the receptions—the main reception being at the University Hall, where the President of the Storthing occupied the chair, supported by King Haakon, and gave an address of welcome.

A few days later, while they were deliberating in fraternal fellowship, telegrams from Germany, France, &c., to various delegates demanded their return to take part under the rival flags of the countries on the verge of conflict, whereupon the German delegates moved the lodge be closed. An American Senator protested against the Conference being stampeded owing to differences between two countries only, seeing that 46 countries were represented. The body declined to adjourn. It was expected that the Germans would resent this refusal, but their leader, Herr Herman Blume—a veteran Customs official recently decorated by the Kaiser—so genially conceded the right of the body to continue, and so feelingly bade them farewell, that the assembly spontaneously rose, and, led by Anglo-Saxons from four continents, sang "God be with you till we meet again"—and a special prayer by the Chaplain concluded an emotional sitting.

When a few more days had passed, and the spread of the war demanded that Danish and Dutch, and Swedish and Swiss should also depart, the situation forced a prompt closure of the Session, which referred unfinished business to the International Executive Committee—to which the Congress elected Ald. Malins, of Birmingham, a life member, in recognition of his fifty years' International work. The other executive officers are:—Ed. Wavinsky, M.P., Stockholm; Hon. G. Cotterell, Seattle, U.S.A.; Prof. L. O. Jensen, Bergen; J. W. Hopkins, Gloucester; Guy Hayler, London; T. Honeyman, Glasgow; and Herman Blume, Hamburg.

The body adjourned, to hold its next Triennial Session in Minneapolis, U.S.A., but soon after closing the British delegates learned that their Government was also at war and their return from Christiania to Hull was blocked. For a week the Wilson liner had steam up, but had to abandon the voyage for fear of encountering German war ships or floating mines. The British and Norwegian Governments therefore arranged to send them across the snow-clad mountain railway through Finse (where Shackleton recently tested his Antarctic equipment) to Bergen, where the Norwegian s.s. Haakon took them aboard and safely landed them at Newcastle. Those American delegates who had arranged to tour the British Isles before returning had to forego the tour and embark on a Scandinavian vessel for New York direct.

On the Norwegian Army mobilising, King Haakon, on August 4, issued a proclamation closing all breweries and distilleries by prohibiting the conversion of any grain or potatoes into spirits or beer during the war. It also forbade all wholesale or retail sale of spirits, but allowed the existing stock of beer to be sold. One result is that the Christiania Liquor Samlag has closed many of its drink shops and released 150 of its public-house managers, &c., from work. The Norwegian newspapers report that the brewers and distillers are to hand over their stocks of grain at cost price to the Government as food for the people.

HUNGARIANS IN ENGLAND.

THE Rev. F. Hankinson has been most assiduous in his efforts to look after the few Hungarian Unitarians who are known to be stranded in England. He visited the Embassy and Consulate again and again in order to discover what to do and how to proceed. Through the courtesy of the Austrian Ambassador, now on his way home, letters have been forwarded to Bishop Ferencz, Professor Boros, and others, telling them that Hungarian Unitarians compelled to remain in England will be looked after if in need, and employment found for them through Essex Hall until the war is over, or they are able to return to Hungary. The hope was expressed in the letter to Bishop Ferencz that the ties of a common religious faith and long-established friendship will hold both peoples together in the bonds of sympathy in this time of terrible conflict. The declaration of war against Austria prevented quite a number of Hungarians from returning home after arrangements had been made. Mr. Weress, son of a leading Unitarian family, was stopped at Folkestone, and detained at a concentration camp as a prisoner of war. On giving the necessary undertakings, he was, however, set free, and allowed to accompany Mr. Hankinson back to London. Miss Boros is the welcome guest of two or three Unitarian families. Mr. Alexis Kish, the Hungarian student, will remain at Manchester College, Oxford.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Auckland, New Zealand.—News comes this week of the safe arrival of the Rev. W. E. Williams, with his wife and baby, early in June. The voyage was a pleasant one on the whole, though some wintry weather was met toward the end. At the opening services, June 7, the attendance was "good" in the morning and "splendid" in the evening, when the chapel was quite filled. The evening congregations are always the larger, and have averaged from 240 to 250 since Mr. Williams arrived. There appears to be every prospect of happy and fruitful work before him.

Dundee.—On Sunday, August 9, the following resolution was passed unanimously by the congregation meeting in the Foresters' Hall, Dundee:—"The Free Religious Movement of Dundee, in meeting assembled, records the fervent prayer that the war struggle in Europe may be the death throes of military imperialism and feudal ascendancy, and extends sympathy to the peoples whose homes and countries are being desolated."

Stockton-on-Tees.—By the death of Mrs. W. J. Watson, on July 28, the Stockton-on-Tees Unitarian Church has lost a splendid worker and the members a true friend. She had won their love and esteem by her noble and generous character and the kindly courtesy she extended to all. Mrs. Watson was a member of the Clephan family, which has been associated with the work of the church for three generations.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A SLUMP IN BOOKSELLING.

One of the signs of the financial anxiety which broods over life in our great cities is the deserted appearance of the booksellers' shops in London. Everywhere there is the same story that no one is buying books at present. A brisk trade is being done in war maps, but the percentage of profit cannot be large, and there are also inquiries for books dealing with military, social, and economic problems in France, Russia, Austria, and Germany. The Times Literary Supplement has done its best to create a boom in literature of this kind by giving an admirably arranged list of books suitable for the present crisis, but meanwhile the booksellers' shelves remain loaded with publications which will be as good as dead stock in a few weeks' time, and the prospects of the autumn publishing season depend entirely upon the fortunes of war.

THE CALL OF THE HOMELAND.

There are a few books which belong to the ideal side of literature and yet have a special quality about them which makes them suitable for our present mood. Last week we called attention to Canon Grane's "The Passing of War," which is calculated to keep attention fixed upon many of the moral factors which are obscured in the heat of the present trouble. To-day we should like to mention an anthology of English verse which has recently come into our hands. "The Call of the Homeland" has been selected and arranged by Dr. R. P. Scott and Miss Katharine T. Wallas. It contains a most delightful collection of patriotic verse, using the word patriotic not in the martial sense, but as an inclusive term for everything that wins our affection in English scenes, English home life, and English character and ideals. We are glad, however, to notice that Ireland and Scotland are by no means ignored. In addition to many familiar pieces it contains a large number of poems by modern writers. We can commend the book heartily to any of our readers who want to refresh themselves with beautiful literature, and to find rest of thought and imagination in Wordsworth, Shelley, and many another singer after the glaring headlines of the newspapers. The book is published by Messrs. Blackie & Son and costs 4s. 6d. net, or it may be had in a school edition in two volumes.

THE LATE BARONESS VON SUTTNER.

The death of the Baroness Von Suttner, whose anguish of mind would have been very great had she lived to see the beginning of the present European war, is still fresh in our memory, and the following passage from an article by Mr. Edwin D. Mead in the memorial number of Friedenswaite, the German peace journal with which she was associated, will be read with mingled feelings by many who shared her ideals. The Baroness Von Suttner, says Mr. Mead, "was seldom deceived, she never lacked courage, she was in high degree magnanimous, most generous toward her fellow-workers, and her confidence in the triumph of our great cause, was complete and inspiring. History will pronounce it the greatest cause of the age, and will pronounce her one of its most impressive and memorable figures. In the midst of a life and social circumstances filled with every temptation to admire the military system and compromise with war, she penetrated their masks and threw her whole strong life and brilliant powers against the evil, in the prophetic service of a better era for mankind. That vision and that service made her great; and we in America rejoice that her noble service was rendered not only in her own Europe but also in our great republic, and that we still hear ringing in our ears her high call to the United States for strong leadership in the holy war for a united world."

LOYAL INDIANS.

A committee of Indians resident in London, with Mr. Gandhi at their head, has sent a communication with 50 names appended to the Under-Secretary of State for India, offering the services of the signatories in the present crisis to the authorities. "We would respectfully emphasise," the communication states, "the fact that the one dominant idea guiding us is that of rendering such humble assistance as we may be considered capable of performing, as an earnest of our desire to share the responsibilities of membership of this great Empire, if we would share its privileges." Some of the signatories are already doing work in connection with organisations that are rendering assistance, and it is believed that as the news of their activity permeates the Indian community, if their offer is accepted, more volunteers will come forward.

HORSES IN WARFARE.

It will be a little comfort to those who grieve for the sufferings of the horses, which add to the horrors of the battlefield, to know that each Army veterinary surgeon is supplied with a pocket instrument for immediately putting an end to the agony of those which are badly wounded. It is difficult to arouse interest in the question of the treatment of horses in warfare when war has actually started, as Mr. Ernest Bell reminds us in a leaflet published by the Animals' Friend Society, for then it is too late to take the practical steps necessary to bring about any reforms, however desirable they may be. Until the Powers widen the terms of the Geneva Convention so as to protect the veterinary surgeon, the horse ambulance, and such voluntary aid societies as may be duly recognised and authorised by the Governments, the most we can hope is that the pocket instrument above mentioned will be frequently used, and that as many horses will be put out of their misery as possible.

EARLIER CLOSING OF PUBLIC-HOUSES.

Speaking in the House of Commons during the debate on the adjournment, Sir Alfred Mond urged upon the Government the question of the earlier closing of public-houses during the present war crisis. There was, he said, a unanimous opinion in a large number of districts that the public-houses might with advantage be closed at 7 o'clock. One reason was for purposes of economy, and, secondly, it would be an advisable step having regard to the large body of people there was bound to be in the country out of employment, and who might become unmanageable under the influence of liquor. If the Government, by means of a short Bill, could curtail the hours during which public-houses remained open it would, he said, be generally welcomed by all classes during the great crisis. Mr. Dickinson asked whether the Home Secretary would use what powers he had to refuse facilities for the sale of intoxicating liquors during the war by limiting the number of hours and the places where it could be sold. Mr. McKenna, in replying, said he had no such power. This was a matter for the local justices, who had power to reduce the hours if they were satisfied that there was any disturbance or prospect of disturbance. He had no doubt they would use their power if the occasion should arise.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE think that it is the duty of every newspaper at the present time to encourage its readers to take long views and to possess their souls in patience. War is a very difficult thing to follow while it is actually in progress. In reading the history of a past campaign we see the long procession of events in their true perspective. Changes of fortune, which at the moment may have seemed like acts of doom, become to the historian little more than subordinate incidents. But it can never be quite the same for people who have to live through a crisis. Our appetite for news, which has been stimulated by our modern worship of speed, and our habit of jumping to swift conclusions, have rather weakened our power of bearing a long strain with equanimity. We doubt whether military opinion expected that the campaign in Belgium would roll up the German army and bring the war to a speedy close. No doubt some arm-chair strategists cherished that hope, and all people of humanitarian feeling must have desired it ardently. The past week has brought its mood of disappointment and the discipline of a deepening anxiety.

THE hideous facts of war have come appreciably nearer to us during the past few days. To many people it is still a rather anxious spectacle in the newspapers—such is the security of our island home—but it will not be so much longer. We shall soon have the list of the 2,000 killed and wounded in the British force, and there will be mourning in our homes. The flight of a Zeppelin airship over Antwerp scattering death and torture among innocent people on a dark night is no longer one of the lurid fancies of Mr. Wells. The smiling villages of Belgium, last month the home of peaceful industry and happy mothers and children, now desolate with fire and reeking with the blood of slaughtered men—we know that a few hours' journey would bring us into the midst of this wicked desolation and we should see it with our own eyes. It is beginning to dawn upon us that the same horrors may overwhelm us and those whom we love. It may be unlikely, but it is certainly not impossible. Let there be no foolish boasting, no false security, and above all no weakening fear. "In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength."

WE want to plead with all the power at our command for help for the Belgian people. They have borne the first savage onslaught of the war, which they did nothing to provoke, in defence of their elementary rights as a nation. They have also by their valiant resistance done much for Europe in its conflict with German militarism. But they have suffered horribly, in ways which beggar description. They may be discouraged, as has been hinted in more than one quarter, because it seems that they have been left to fight alone. We ought to help them without stint, not only when the war is over, but now. The Belgian Embassy has opened a fund for the purpose, and contributions to the Belgian Relief Fund may be sent to 15, West Halkin-street, Belgrave-square, S.W.

WE are glad to see that a representative English committee has taken in hand the very important work of providing adequately for Belgian refugees. It has the support of the Belgian Minister, and aims at removing helpless Belgian women and children from the theatre of war into safe keeping in England. It asks for offers of private hospitality, accommodation either as furnished or unfurnished rooms or houses, provisions and help of all kinds, and particularly contributions in cash. Communications should be addressed to the offices of the War Refugees' Committee, General Buildings, Aldwych, W.C. We hope that our readers will feel it a privilege to send help to one of these two funds, and will do it promptly. While we are making careful provision for the wants of our own people in various ways we must not forget the far more tragic needs of those who are suffering from horrors of misery and desolation, which we hope and pray may never touch ourselves.

* * *

WE are sorry to see several newspapers devoting so much attention to what is called the war on German trade. It may easily lead to an ugly form of commercial jingoism. Besides is it not rather premature, while all the issues of war still hang in the balance? We did not go into this war with any thought of material gain for ourselves, and the best minds of the nation are not thinking what they may get out of it either in trade or treasure. While the business of the country is kept running as quietly and steadily as possible the supreme need of the moment is to realise the sacrifices which the war demands from all of us. We may cultivate a commercial mood and repeat "Business as usual" until we almost forget that we are at war at all, and that our whole national existence is still dependent upon the vigilance of our fleet. It is not pleasant dreams of prosperity and captured trade that we must encourage in our young men, but the stern resolve if need be to die for their country.

ALL the Government departments have been working lately under high pressure, but it is time that some of our political leaders were detached for another and not less needful form of service. It is not the time for debating all the complicated questions which lie behind the war, but it is the time for plain and heartening statement of the issues which are involved in it for ourselves and the civilisation of Europe. Inflammatory speeches by small men would be worse than useless, but speeches such as Pitt or Gladstone might have made in similar circumstances are greatly needed in order to guide public opinion, to stimulate national enthusiasm and to keep it fixed on high and noble ends. We hope that there will be a vigorous autumn campaign, carried out on the great lines which will do us credit.

WE must repeat our warning against giving ready credence to many-tongued rumour, especially when it is to the discredit of the enemy. This does not mean, however, that we are to dismiss with a smile of incredulity every atrocious story, because such things cannot happen in modern warfare between civilised nations. Unfortunately, that is not the case. The German campaign seems to have been carried on so far with ruthless severity, and we may expect it to maintain that temper to the end. Apparently anything which can strike terror into the inhabitants of an invaded country is held to be justified by the Prussian military code. A nation which goes to war with a public disavowal of the claims of morality on the lips of its Chancellor and holds the towns of the country it has invaded to ransom, like any mediæval freebooter, is itself chiefly responsible if infamous stories are circulated and believed. Already some dark suspicions have gathered, and we have been forced to remember that the brutal maxim "necessity knows no law" is inconsistent even with the rough chivalry of war.

It is just here that the seasoned war correspondent may render a signal service to civilisation. After the Balkan War a correspondent of wide experience said to the present writer, "There will be no more war correspondents." Military restrictions have made his work impossible. He deplored it just for this reason: that war was likely to grow more inhuman, more lustful and revolting, when the check of unofficial public opinion was withdrawn. We fear that he was right. The adventurous journalist has taken the place of the accredited correspondent. The former may be admirable for depicting the scene outside the actual theatre of operations, but he is not with the army, and the imperious demand of the modern newspaper for copy gives his work the quality of hasty impressionism instead of the deliberate strength of careful observation and calm judgment.

ON Wednesday evening the Prime Minister announced, with his usual emphatic brevity, that it is not intended to introduce compulsory military service in this country. Various sinister rumours have been flying about, and many men have believed what they wanted to be true. Not that we should shrink even from the terrible burden of conscription if national safety depended upon it. But we do not believe that it does. Our voluntary army has qualities of toughness and disciplined strength which compare favourably with the conscript masses of the Continent. Moreover, our system enables us to maintain the industrial life of the country at a time when it is shattered all over Europe, and this is a great benefit not merely to ourselves but also to the rest of the world. We want to emerge from this war less military than we were. Conscription would go far to cripple our freedom and to put us, like Germany, under the hateful domination of War Lords. But if we are to be saved from this danger there must be voluntary service in the present emergency up to the full limit of what is required.

It is good news that the Government is taking steps to give fuller powers to the licensing authorities to control public-houses and restrict the hours of sale during the war. We hope that these powers will be used firmly and stringently all over the country. It is not a moment too soon. Already there are signs that public-houses are becoming centres of public excitement and excessive drinking, and the evil will become far worse as unemployment and the anxieties of the war increase. The unworthy device has also been adopted—we hope not extensively—of placarding the public-house with the announcement: "All war telegrams may be seen inside." This kind of bait ought not to be allowed under severe penalties. It is a public misdemeanour of a most glaring kind, which might well be punished after warning with forfeiture of the licence. The man who debauches the people with drink at the present time is an enemy within the gate, quite as menacing as foreign spies.

MR. WILLIAM ARCHER contributed a sensible article on the contemplated "War on Wagner" to the Daily News last week. "For my part," he writes, "I am heart and soul with this war against the incubus of militarism under which Europe has been tossing and gasping for the past half-century. But is a war against militarism a war against German culture? Heaven forbid! And even if it were, what has music—that mysterious transcript of the rhythmic universe and intimation of our kinship to the stars—what has music to do with earthly boundaries and petty tribal rancours? It is true that some music has, by association, a Chauvinistic tinge. I do not know how far Wagner in his later years may have been caught up in the vortex of German Imperialism. But all his best work, if I am not greatly mistaken, was done before 1870; and it is not to be imagined that the revolutionary of '48 would have any real sympathy with the military tyranny of to-day."

* * *

MR. ARCHER bids us remember that "one day—unless this war be indeed the end of civilisation—we shall be the friends of a purified, ennobled Germany." "Shall we forget," he asks, "because of the misdeeds of a caste of soldier-politicians, all that Germany has given us of great and beautiful in science and scholarship, in poetry and music?" We need hardly add how warmly we sympathise with this plea. At the same time it is a rather saddening reflection that we have to remember so often that Germany gave her best gifts to the world before 1870. Since that time the steady aggression of Chauvinism has crippled the free life of the people, and she has little to show in the higher reaches of literature, in æsthetic creation or spiritual imagination, which has abiding value for mankind.

PERHAPS the English mind has been a little too much obsessed in recent years by the ideal of German culture. It has almost capitulated to the gospel of pan-Germanism in the sphere of the intellect. For some time, however, there have been signs of a quiet change in our point of view. Many people who nourished their youth on Goethe and Heine have found themselves, they hardly know why, reading German less and French more. German scholarship with its immense labour seemed to have run itself up a cul-de-sac. German history had lost its independence and gone into slavery in the house of Cæsar. Just across the Channel was a cultivated nation, which still retained its freedom of mind, its nimbleness for speculation, its intellectual gaiety, its lightness of touch, its humour, its esprit. In thinking of the culture of France and trying to measure its value for ourselves we have never to say "before 1870." No, Germany is in no sense the custodian of the world's culture, but only of some of its highly specialised departments. If we had to choose between Germany and France on the ground of general cultivation of mind and intellectual alertness we should vote for France without any hesitation. But we do not for a moment contemplate such a terrible alternative. In the things of the mind we are international, and only a commonwealth of free peoples can be equal to the task of guarding the spiritual treasures of the world.

LONG periods of peace and prosperity tend to exaggerate the strictly individual traits of human character. We cease to be acutely conscious of the links strong as steel which unite us to our fellows. The voices of the past call to us only faintly. Common enterprises seem to us dull and disappointing compared with the freedom and daring of the personal will. We hedge ourselves round with private property. We assert our freedom to think and act as we choose. With a proud sense of independence we renounce every shred of responsibility for the sins and mistakes of other people. We are of course dimly aware all the time that this feeling of isolation is a mirage in the brain. We know, as a matter of theory, that our personal freedom is limited in a thousand ways by the wills of other people. We recognise, as soon as we are challenged on the subject, that the group or nation to which we belong has much to do even with the duties and affections which we label as strictly private. But it is in some moment of national awakening, when safety depends upon common action, that we see this quite clearly, and feel as a matter of experience what BURKE called the mysterious incorporation of the human race.

During the past few weeks many of us have had to submit the creed of individualism to searching tests. We are no longer so confident as we were that its gospel of personal freedom and independence is satisfying and final. Day by day fresh facts have confronted us, with which we never came to such close quarters before. Phrases like national responsibility or the conscience of the community have stared us in the face and assumed a new reality for us. We have felt the common life pulsing in our own life in quiet confidence, in stern resolve, in swift moods of happiness or dejection, in the feeling of dim apprehension which is not concern for our own comfort or safety but for something much greater than ourselves. The position of detached spectators or critics has thus become impossible to us. Let anyone suggest that we may withhold our money or our help, because some one has blundered, and we should spurn the insult from us with indignation. If at the end there is an honourable peace, with ampler security for freedom and happiness, we shall all be sharers in its privilege and joy. If at any moment there is moral failure, betraying us into acts of national cowardice or dishonour, we shall take the shame of it into our own hearts and feel that we too have sinned. We cannot put these things at a distance from us, even to approve or to condemn them. They are part of ourselves.

What we have just written will indicate the nature of the reply which we should be inclined to make to people who call in question the doctrine of national responsibility at the present moment. The situation, in which a community suddenly finds itself confronted with a decisive issue of right or wrong, is the product of its history. Every force which has played upon it in the past for good or evil has gone to the making of it. It is seldom, if ever, that we can select a small group of politicians or a military clique and plead with justice that they alone are responsible; or that we can disentangle one baneful influence or personality and say, but for that everything would have been different. Let the good man and the lover of peace look into his own heart and confess how often he has failed in faithfulness, how different the world around him might have been, if he and those who are associated with him in the Christian warfare for love and peace had resisted every inclination to take their ease and let things drift. It is a natural instinct which tries to find a scapegoat for the terrible alternative in which we found ourselves, either war or peace with dishonour; but if we want to blame anybody, let us blame ourselves, for we are all part of the national life, and we have helped to make it what it is. Let us also recognise that while the obscure history of a moral situation is a matter of absorbing interest, the supreme thing for a nation as for a man is to decide rightly at the critical moment and, having decided, to go forward resolutely without looking back.

Perhaps some people will condemn this whole line of thought as moral fatalism. But it is nothing of the kind. It is moral experience, just as the words of the prophet, "Our fathers have sinned and are not; and we have borne their iniquities," are moral experience. We do not mean that nations drift into critical positions through the momentum of a past over which they have no control. It is exactly the opposite which we hold to be deeply true. The critical position is created by all of us. It is so to say the crystallisation of all the spiritual and intellectual forces, which have been brought to play upon national problems and ideals. If these forces had been stronger in one direction or weaker in another then the resulting situation might have been very different. But given a situation for which all of us by the very fact that we are Englishmen are in some degree responsible, the dread decision at all hazards to do what is right does not lie solely with our executive officers or with one party in the state. It is a matter for which in the fullest sense we must all assume national responsibility.

Accordingly the one duty of the moment is to prosecute our decision and everything which is involved in it with the utmost vigour. We deprecate any dissipation of our energies, either in mutual recriminations, or in the rather vain attempt to apportion blame for what some of us may consider to be the mistakes of the past. As one nation we stand, and if need be as one nation we fall. No man liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself; for we are members one of another. But the time will come, and we must all pray that it may come soon, when we shall have to take in hand the mighty work of social reconstruction. Then with the insight which comes through suffering we shall be able to see how we betrayed the cause of goodness in the past, or lacked the wisdom to withstand the evil things which have crippled the free life of the people. Many things will go down in the great war and will be no more seen; and many better things will emerge if we have faith and energy to will it so. Here the doctrine of national responsibility may be as a staff of strength in the hand of the weakest man. What can he do? He is not a statesman; he is not a thinker; he is not a man of action. He is only an unnoticed unit in the crowd. Few people ask his opinion, fewer still seek his advice. How vain it seems for him to attempt to mould public opinion. It is the world with its menacing bulk which moves him; he has never even dreamed that he can move the world. Let him remember that the blood of the nation flows in his veins, that the soul of the nation is part of his soul. He can be loyal to the best that he knows. He can fight for the highest that he sees. He can feel his dignity as part of England's life, rejoicing in her history, helping her present need and shaping her future destiny. We shall find salvation in the multitude of righteous men who give themselves in this way for the country's good. They will reject no common burden. They will shirk no ordinary duty. They will refuse the barren tasks of mere criticism and negation. And in all circumstances they will bear themselves with the quiet dignity, which springs from a deep sense of the fulfilment of personal life in the larger life of the nation.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

IN quietness and in confidence shall be your strength.—Isaiah xxx. 15.

BLESSED be the name of God, for ever and ever; for wisdom and might are his. He changeth the times and the seasons. He giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that have understanding. He revealeth the deep and secret things. He knoweth what is in the darkness; and the light dwelleth with him.—Daniel ii. 20-22.

TRUST IN GOD.

It is too easy for all of us to understand how men come to disobey God through sloth and passion; but it is not easy to understand how we come to want consolation through distrust of His goodness, through doubt of His purpose to fulfil the promises of His Spirit in us. We can understand sin better than we can understand distrust, except so far as sin obliterates confidence in God. Temptation may kindle evil passion, and a great sorrow may for a time overflow the soul; but on what grounds shall we explain a lasting want of faith in God's love, or in His great designs for us? And the times are fast passing away in which any of us may yet have the filial privilege of showing our earthly confidence in God: when we enter within the veil we may see face to face. When Thomas laid his hands on the print of the nails he had lost the blessedness of faith, of recognising the Christ by his spiritual signs. And when God to our newborn eyes shall disclose all his ways of love, our first feeling may be the deep shame that we ever could have doubted, as it may add a surpassing joy to heaven itself that whilst clouds and thick darkness were around Him we had never distrusted the purpose of His love.

Surely it is the end of all discipline, of all mysteries, to give us this tried trust in God, to make us children of our Father with the love that casts out fear, so that here on earth we may come to dwell as in the temple of the Almighty's presence, listening for the whispers of the Comforter. Has God not given earnest enough to trust Him for what remains to be fulfilled? In every moment of fresh insight, of shamed thankfulness for newly-discovered mercies, of mystery revealing holy purpose, of love raised from earth to heaven by sorrow and by death—surely, we must put the question to ourselves, "How can we ever be fearful again, or suffer faith to fail?" As often as unexpected peace comes out of darkness, out of the agony of our souls in the times when the light of our life goes out, and we grope alone for God, and the heart becomes more prophetic, memory more quickening than possession, and we know a quiet that passeth understanding, surely, our souls should be looking forwards, gathering strength to meet all terrible experiences that have been to others, and may be to us, necessary parts of our Father's providence. How is it that we do not learn the open lesson of Christ's life—amid what unlikely circumstances of trial, loneliness, anguish, and desertion, the best beloved of God may appear? It is not ours to have full insight into our Father's ways; but how can we deny that we have pledges of His goodness which a child's heart ought to accept, pledges which, in our most suffering or desolate moments, entitle God to ask, "Why are ye so fearful? How is it that ye have no faith?"

JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

DREAMS.

SAY that we dream! Our dreams have woven

Truths that out-face the burning sun:
The lightnings, that we dreamed, have cloven

Time, space, and linked all lands in one!
Dreams! But their swift celestial fingers
Have knit the world with threads of steel,
Til no remotest island lingers
Outside the world's great Commonweal.

Dreams, are they? But ye cannot stay them,

Or thrust the dawn back for one hour!
Truth, Love, and Justice, if ye slay them,
Return with more than earthly power:
Strive, if ye will, to seal the fountains
That send the Spring thro' leaf and spray;

Drive back the sun from the Eastern mountains,

Then—bid this mightier movement stay.

It is the Dawn! The Dawn! The nations
From East to West have heard a cry—
Through all earth's blood-red generations
By hate and slaughter climbed thus high,
Here—on this height—still to aspire,

One only path remains untrod,
One path of love and peace climbs higher,
Make straight that highway for our God.

ALFRED NOYES.

THE DAY OF THE LORD.

THE Day of the Lord is at hand, at hand;
Its storms roll up the sky;
The nations sleep starving on heaps of gold;
All dreamers toss and sigh;
The night is darkest before the morn;
When the pain is sorest the child is born,
And the Day of the Lord at hand.

Gather you, gather you, angels of God—
Freedom, and Mercy, and Truth;
Come! for the Earth is grown coward and old,

Come down, and renew us her youth.
Wisdom, Self-Sacrifice, Daring, and Love,
Haste to the battlefield, stoop from above,
To the Day of the Lord at hand.

Gather you, gather you, hounds of hell—
Famine, and Plague, and War;
Idleness, Bigotry, Cant, and Misrule,
Gather, and fall in the snare!

Hireling and Mammonite, Bigot and Knave,
Crawl to the battlefield, sneak to your grave,
In the Day of the Lord at hand.

Who would sit down and sigh for a lost age of gold,
While the Lord of all ages is here?
True hearts will leap up at the trumpet of God,

And those who can suffer, can dare.
Each old age of gold was an iron age too,
And the meekest of saints may find stern work to do,

In the Day of the Lord at hand.

CHARLES KINGSLEY.

O LORD, merciful Father, that despisest not the sighing of a contrite heart, nor the desire of such as be sorrowful; mercifully assist our prayers that we make before thee in all our troubles and adversities, whensoever they oppress us; and grant that we may put our whole trust and confidence in thy mercy, and evermore serve thee in holiness and pureness of living, to thy honour and glory. Amen.

O LORD, give us more charity, more self-denial, more likeness to thee. Teach us to sacrifice our comforts to others, and our likings for the sake of doing good. Make us kindly in thought, gentle in word, generous in deed. Teach us that it is better to give than to receive; better to forget ourselves than to put ourselves forward; better to minister than to be ministered unto. And unto thee, the God of love, be glory and praise for ever. Amen.

WAR AGAINST WAR.

WE find ourselves suddenly, in the midst of summer peace and holiday rest, involved in a war of overwhelming magnitude, of which none of us can foresee the issue, and of which we can only say that it must mean the loss of hundreds of thousands of lives, and sorrow and suffering for millions of men, women, and children. What is our position as religious men and women during this period of mutual slaughter and of stern conflict? Must Christians feel an impotent despair, and look on at a world gone mad, and regard the whole hateful business as outside the Providence of God? Or, with the German Emperor, shall we boldly claim God as wholly with us, and invoke His loving help to overthrow our enemies? As a Christian minister I can do neither of these things. We must not believe that the world is for the moment given over entirely into the hands of scientific brutality and violence, and that religion can only stand amazed and horror-stricken and helpless in the presence of such a world-wide calamity. But, on the other hand, we cannot say that our belief in God and in the righteousness of our cause makes us quite certain that we shall be victorious. I believe that we are right as a nation in risking everything, and in sacrificing so much on behalf of our plighted word to Belgium, and in opposing the defiant militarism of Prussia, but I should not disbelieve in God or in the rightness of our decision if we were not victorious.

The appeal to arms and violence does not always result in victory for those whose cause is just. That is the greatest evil of war: not wounds, not death, not infinite suffering and loss and sorrow. The worst evil of war is that it is a means of settling quarrels in which there is no real certainty that right will triumph. There is no trustworthy solution of human differences to be attained through mutual slaughter. That is the first thing which we, as religious men and women, need to feel. War is not only a hideous, horrible thing: it is essentially unnatural and wrong. We must never allow ourselves to think of war as the right method of settling differences between the nations. It is a sign of international disease, and the breakdown of fundamental Christian principles. We may be forced into it, we may be compelled to defend the weak and to oppose the proud and domineering, as we believe to be our case to-day, but we must never yield to the belief that war is a natural and right method of settling differences.

We are engaged in war to-day in order to destroy war, in order to break down an organised militarism which has been a menace and a curse to Europe for many years. The leaders of the great nation to whom we are opposed regard war as a fine thing. They live, and move, and have their being in a military atmosphere. The idea of war is for them not merely natural and right, but splendid and glorious. A nation's grandeur depends upon its armaments.

There are, of course, people in England who think the same, as there are in all the countries of Europe, but nowhere has it dominated the national life so completely as in Germany. The army and its officers are sacrosanct. They are superior beings to civilians, and their function of fighting is the noblest purpose of man's life. The best thought of that great nation has been given for many years to preparation for war. It is this barbaric ideal, the Bismarck idea of blood and iron, which at last by the claims of honour and of national safety we find ourselves, with infinite sorrow, compelled to fight. By this awful war into which we have been forced, we hope and pray that we may destroy war.

A nation whose leaders believe wholeheartedly in the divine character of war, who rejoice in war, who are always ready to draw the sword against others when they think the opportunity for victory has come, is a standing menace to civilisation. We recognise gladly the great work which German thinkers have done, we recognise gladly how much high character and noble manhood and fine resolution exists in that great nation with which we have so many ties, and to which in many ways we owe so much. We cry, as we think of this fratricidal strife, "O the pity of it, the pity of it." But we feel profoundly that it is a base, false, dangerous ideal of national life, a national life based on and imbued with militarism, against which we are fighting. Not merely from the point of view of safety and the economic freedom of the masses, but from the point of view of religion and morality we say this ideal must be destroyed, this overweening ambition enforcing its will by guns must be overthrown if we have the strength to do it.

We are fighting on behalf of peace: let us beware of allowing the military spirit to take hold of us. We have not entered on this war for selfish gain; it is a hateful, horrible necessity, but we believe we are fighting in order to destroy an intolerable thing. It is a creeping cancer in our civilisation which we are trying to eradicate. We are engaged in a great surgical operation, the eradication of a disease which has infected all Europe, but the roots of which are in the countries with which we are at war. Let us never forget that we are fighting a disease, that we desire peace and goodwill among the nations, and that we believe in the possibility of this ideal.

We must all suffer in many ways, and we all ought to suffer. I do not envy the man who finds any pleasurable excitement in the time, still less the man who makes money out of war. We hardly realise as yet how desperate, how deadly will be the conflict. We shall have much to bear, much to forgive; we shall have endless calls upon our courage, our forbearance, our patience, and our love. God help us to play the man under affliction, and to be strong in our sense that we are striving for the right.

Even in this dark hour there are gleams of light. We rejoice to feel our national unity as none of us in our lifetime have ever felt it before. In the presence of this crisis all divisions of party and of creed have disappeared. We stand together, all the men and women of the Empire, eager to give help, sympathising with one another, believing in one another, loyal to one another. The cynicism and sentimental vapourings of easier times are stilled. We feel the sternness and nobility of life. We feel our fundamental unity. Our selfishness, our love of luxury, our frivolities have disappeared. We stand together with one heart and one mind longing to give ourselves to the uttermost for the good of all. Without hate and without rest, without fear and without boasting, let us go on supporting each other, trusting each other, giving ourselves for one another until we can establish a lasting peace upon the earth.

H. G.

THE WAR AND THE CHURCH'S OPPORTUNITY.

No idling now, no wasteful sleep,
From Christian toil our limbs to keep,
No shrinking from the desperate fight,
No thought of yielding or of flight:

No love of present gain or ease,
No seeking man or self to please;
With the brave heart and steady eye,
We onward march to victory.

From Horatius Bonar's Hymn—
"Silent, like men in solemn haste."

THOSE of us who have been ministering in churches the past three Sundays could not but have been profoundly impressed by the unwonted atmosphere in which we found ourselves. There was an awe, a solemnity, a sense of disaster and responsibility, a communion of souls, a longing for prayer that few of us can ever before have experienced. Deep was calling to deep, and he who could not respond was poor indeed. It was as if all the ordinary stays had been swept from under our feet, and we were casting ourselves upon the sure mercies of God. The war had gripped us so suddenly, and all our regular activities were paralysed. They had seemed to us of more or less significance, but how petty now were their proportions assailed by this one grim Reality! All the labours of years, we felt, might be swiftly precipitated into chaos. But a few days ago, how secure we seemed! Yet, what a hair's-breadth, after all, between us and destruction, though in everything we may have been among the most prudent of the citizens!

Christianity came to birth under not dissimilar circumstances. Will it be reborn under these? It was the early Christians' conviction of the insubstantiality of this world and of its speedy passing away that compelled them to find their security in another. It is so with us at this moment. This world, as we have known it, is for some months at least to be a very different one from that which we have known, and what the end may be is in God's hands. It may prove the end of all our hopes for social reform, the end of England's glory, the end of all the struggles and the blood and tears of centuries. For we are under no delusion, as, in a sense, the early Christians were. Dreadnoughts are very tangible realities, and mines that sow the seas are subtle forces which are all the more dreadful for their subtlety, and make the end so much the more incalculable. It is this very incalculableness of modern warfare which tends to make a declaration of war overwhelm us at first like the clap of doom. We are like the prosperous citizen who a few days ago felt quite safe with his paper securities, for, however careful we may have been, however wisely we may have placed our investments or laid our plans, we can never be quite sure that the unexpected may not happen and upset all our shrewd calculations. We feel helpless as in the hands of forces altogether beyond our control.

This is the first step in religion both for nations and men, but it is long since it was brought home to us so unmistakably. Here we have no abiding place. How often we had heard it, and how flat and unprofitable it sounded! But to-day, like the lightning of the thunder, it rives to the very heart and reins. We prostrate ourselves before the only Security in which we can have a sure abiding. We learn to pray, we set our affections on things above, we seek that peace which the world cannot give and cannot take away.

We do not, and we shall not stay there. We respond to the first deep impulse of our nature. We look there where alone we can look with hope and confidence. We sing, "O God, our help in ages past" as we never sang it before. "The flowers beneath the mower's hand lie withering ere 'tis night." It stirs us to the very marrow of our bones. We bow the knee before the Most High. We did not know before how awful is His Majesty. We are at the fountains of life. We commune with the Prince of Peace. And, "silent, like men in solemn haste," we rise with a new resolve. The Lord is on our side, we will not fear what man can do unto us.

We open our eyes and discover that all is not so black as it seemed. We find a nation knit together as one man. We find that party politics, after all, do not really cleave us asunder. We find a sober, serious, determined nation prepared for the utmost sacrifices. We find statesmen with promptitude taking sure and certain measures for the public safety and well-being. We find every man at his post. We were not aware how deep is love of country, how hearth and home tug at the very roots of being. We discover that man is nobler than was thought.

And what is it that at this moment knits us together as one man? What is it that calls forth our highest manhood and womanhood? War! But could nothing else produce such a result! Religion! We could not under any circumstances, even those of war, be united as a nation, and stand forth as men, were there not that within us capable of uniting us, capable of proving us men. Men have souls to move not only at crises like the present, depths that are there though they be not touched, a manhood and a womanhood to be appealed to, capacities for heroic self-sacrifice awaiting only the right summons to call them forth. In the name of God, let the churches issue the summons and enter no more into an unholy alliance with war! Let them point to the deeper realities, to the only Security, to that peace below all discords, to that eternal life that is indifferent of time. They will be amazed at the heroisms which such a Security and such a Peace and such a Life will call forth.

And yet, at bottom the situation is really not so different from what it always is. We know not at any time what a day or an hour may bring forth. We are as flimsy as the gossamer and as frail as the wild rose of the wayside. The wind passes over us, and we are gone, and our place knows us no more. It has always been so, and it will always be so, but we forget until death and war bring us to remembrance. We ought not to need these startling happenings to remind us, yet we need them still.

Now, therefore, is the Church's opportunity. What the ordinary situations of life cannot teach us as to its awful aspects, the extraordinary may. Never was the world more ready to hear if the Church has anything to tell. Are not thousands listening in the din for the still small voice of Christ, hungering and thirsting for His spirit, asking the sternest questions, losing all faith in God because they cannot answer them, groping for hope where no hope is and for love in a world given up to hate? "Where is your God," they say. Will the churches not answer the piteous appeals of these starving multitudes? Will they not bring us back to Christ? Is he not still the Prince of Peace and still the Prince of Life? Would not His spirit make all wars to cease, and gather together His elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of the earth? And who could stay their hand? Even War would have no dominion over them. For they, like their Master, have overcome the world.

We pay this stern price of war because of the feebleness of the churches. They have not been doing their work. They have not been inculcating the Christ spirit. They have been betraying and denying their Master like Judas and Peter. They must learn to follow Him and live like Him. And then the multitudes will follow them. For His way is the only way unto Life and unto Peace.

The greatest of the Psalms issued from the Exile in Babylon. The greatest religious poem of the nineteenth century issued from one who had been stripped bare of everything. May the consolation which came to the Hebrews in Exile and to our modern Psalmist, Francis Thompson, come to us too, and may we realise the meaning of his immortal poem, "The Hound of Heaven," where he writes:—

All which I took from thee I did but take
Not for thy harms,
But just, that thou might'st seek it in My arms.
All which thy child's mistake Fancies as lost, I have stored for thee at home:
Rise, clasp My hand, and come!

MANY important books will undoubtedly be postponed owing to the war, but Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton announce that they will publish this autumn Mr. Balfour's Gifford Lectures under the title "Theism and Humanism."

FRIENDSHIP FOR ALIENS.

SIR,—A recent letter in your columns by Mr. Tarrant drew attention to the unfortunate position of the subjects of nations with which we are at war, who are compelled to live in our midst. He suggested that this brought to us an opportunity of showing the reality of the Christian spirit and teaching. We shall all have sympathised with the object of that letter. My object in writing is to suggest one way in which we can definitely do something to carry it into effect. There are Germans, Austrians, and Hungarians, not belonging to any church whatever, residing in the vicinity of our churches and homes, of whom we know or may get to know. Would it not be possible to make advances in neighbourliness such as in ordinary circumstances we should not dream of? Could not minister and members of our congregations call on them in a friendly way, and so help to make an often distressing condition more tolerable, and at the same time foster a spirit which may be of real value in the relations of the peoples when peace is declared and the readjustments take place? I write as one reluctantly convinced that this war must be prosecuted with the whole national strength to the bitter end, and that he would be an enemy to his country who even suggested any weakening of purpose. That involves that we should have to be carefully on our guard against such friendliness being abused. But admitting and facing that and any other risk which there may be, I suggest that there is something more than an opportunity of showing that the supreme idealism which bids us love our enemies is not a rhetorical flourish to our religion but of its very essence.—Yours, &c.,

RELIEF BY EMPLOYMENT.

SIR,—Many suggestions appear in the press for helping by "work for wages" the vast number of women who are thrown out of work by the war. Yet another suggestion may I mention? for it may be acceptable to some of the ladies who are unable to leave their homes for work outside, and perhaps see no means of personally helping, except that of doing the sewing which they recognise should provide work for wage-earning women. The suggestion is that ladies who can spare a room in their own homes should apply to their local Labour Exchange for one or more girls or women to come to that room by day to make articles of clothing, such as are needed for our soldiers and sailors and people impoverished by the war. Materials will have to be supplied, and it is suggested that each worker should receive 10s. a week and her tea. Patterns can be obtained. Where skilled supervision can be given girls little skilled in needlework can be taken, and may receive a training that cannot fail to be valuable to them afterwards.

There are ladies who may be glad to give the help suggested here, even if they can only make sure of doing so for a fortnight. It is to be hoped that ere long Relief Committees may have received permission to give material and to pay for wages, and that these Committees will avail themselves of the suggestion in their scheme for methods of relief. The suggestion is due to Miss Mary Beeton, M.A., Borough Councillor (Paddington), a member of the Committee of the Women's Local Government Society.—Yours, &c.,

WOUNDED HORSES IN WAR.

SIR,—Owing to the large number of inquiries we have had with reference to the care of wounded horses in the war, and the impossibility of replying to them individually, may I ask you to do me the favour of inserting the following brief statement? We have definitely ascertained that no private or volunteer Veterinary Corps for the destruction of wounded horses will be permitted within the sphere of warfare. The Army Veterinary Department of the War Office is in sole charge of this work, and has provided special instruments for the destruction of the wounded animals by veterinary officers belonging to its largely increased staff, and by all soldiers of and above the rank of sergeant. The Army Veterinary Corps has also provided a number of hospitals for the treatment of curable animals. We would, however, point out that there are a large number of horses unfit for military service which have been left behind in this country to do the exceptionally heavy work which will necessarily fall to their share, and we would ask all friends of animals to do all in their power to help these poor creatures.—Yours, &c.,

NATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

SIR,—This scarcely seems the time for controversy, and it is with some reluctance that I venture to send a few words in reply to Mr. Westbury in order to explain my position. The popular idea of National Responsibility seems to imply that a nation is so entirely one personality that every individual citizen is bound by the action of statesmen or rulers, so that if the Kaiser declares war, however unjustly, every German must fight for the Fatherland.

In the present crisis there is much in the spirit of the British nation which must call forth unbounded admiration, and I should be the last to disparage it, and I am only too glad to share the burden laid upon us; but I cannot take the optimistic view of the situation which has been expressed by some of our best men. I quite believe that the time will come when the peoples of Europe will resolve to be no longer pawns in a game of statesmen, and will feel that the claims of our common humanity are greater than those of nationality, but I think it not improbable that the immediate result of this war will be an increase of military despotism all over the world, and perhaps conscription in England. Moreover, I feel bound to add that in my judgment the moral deterioration of character produced by war and its legacy of hatred and revenge is more to be feared than any material loss which may come to a nation for refusing to take part in it.—Yours, &c.,

BASIL MARTIN.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

PRAY FOR THEM THAT PERSECUTE YOU.

A KOREAN missionary named Han, so a writer tells us in a book which I read not very long ago, was once trying to sell Bibles in Po-san, where at that time there were no Christians. A man of gigantic stature who was in the crowd, probably thinking that he was really doing harm in attracting the people and trying to teach them religious ideas quite different from those they had been trained to believe, pushed his way through and proceeded to give him a good beating. Mr. Han, who was so badly bruised that he had to keep his bed for ten days, made no attempt to strike back, but prayed for his enemy as Christ has taught us to do. As soon as he was well again he bravely went back to his work, for he was determined to go on doing what he felt to be right.

The big man was ready for him, and again the poor missionary was cruelly beaten, this time with a club. Nobody, apparently, attempted to protect him. They were all afraid of the cowardly bully who had no hesitation in attacking a defenceless man. Mr. Han was laid up for a month, and at last a local magistrate suggested that he should have his enemy arrested and punished. But the missionary would not hear of it. "I am praying for him that God will touch his heart and make him a workman for the Kingdom," he said. A third time—and not without some natural fear—he went to his accustomed corner. There stood his foe, but his mad rage was checked at last. Silently he waited at the edge of the crowd while Mr. Han talked to the people, and when the address was over he beckoned him aside and earnestly asked his forgiveness. The bully in him had been entirely conquered by something against which he could not fight without a feeling of shame.

That is a good illustration of what is meant by overcoming evil with good, and praying for those who persecute us; and if you think there are very few people in the world who are brave enough to act like that, you are quite right. Men of every nation have a great deal to learn and a great deal to endure before they will give up their faith in the right to strike back when they are attacked by others. But Jesus never made things easy for those who loved him by telling them that the time had not yet come when his teaching might be followed. "Be ye perfect," he said, "even as your Father in heaven is perfect"; thus showing that he knew we were capable of doing all things if we only wanted hard enough to do them, because we come from God, and belong to Him, and can have His help whenever we ask for it.

But about praying for our enemies—how does it work out in everyday life? I hope none of us have any enemies really, at least amongst those with whom we live, or go to school, or come in contact in other ways. If we have we must begin this very moment to pray that they may be made more kind and unselfish and good, and that we may be made all these things too, so that we shall not misjudge them or magnify their faults. People who hate others and want to do them harm are as dangerously ill as those who suffer from some dreadful disease which the most skilful doctor finds some difficulty in curing, only it is their minds that are all wrong, not their bodies. They have got some poison working in the brain which makes them blind and stupid and bitter, and what we have to do is to help them to get rid of that poison by slipping in some clean, sweet, forgiving thought that takes all the deadliness out of it, and makes it quite harmless.

It sounds like magic, doesn't it? But it isn't really magic any more than letting the bright sunshine and fresh air into a room that has been choked up with dust and closed for months. Only we must always remember that there are two great forces in the world, a "pair of opposites," which cannot work together, and one is continually driving out the other. You may give them all sorts of names, such as light and darkness, good and evil, health and disease, life and death, love and hate, the power that kills and the power that creates. If you think this out, you will see that the only way in which influences that are harmful and bad can be put an end to is by the victory of influences that are helpful and good. To try and stop them by making use of their weapons is simply no good at all. "Hatred," said the Lord Buddha, whose name is loved by many millions of people in the East, just as the name of Christ is amongst us, "Hatred ceases not at any time by hatred; hatred ceases only by love"; and Jesus said, "Love your enemies . . . do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you." In that way, as he well knew, we shall drive out the cruel thoughts that cause so much misery, instead of making them stronger and more passionate with angry words; we shall make those who are full of wrong ideas—if not at first, then after some time—begin to see things in a very different light; we shall blunt their unkind intentions as the soldiers of bygone days used to blunt the spears of their foes with their shields so that they glanced off them, and fell harmlessly to the ground; and perhaps—it has often happened!—we shall end by making those who are against us, not only ashamed of their former attitude, but actually anxious to make up for it by being friendly instead of hostile.

Don't you know how to pray for those you feel it is very hard to love? Can't you say the words "forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us"? Well, but you want to, don't you?—and that is a good beginning, for all prayer is just wanting and asking for something, very often quite silently in your heart without actually saying anything at all. When I was quite small, I wanted a paint-box so badly that I couldn't sleep for thinking of it. I used to dream about it all day, and in the night I would wake up in the darkness and begin to pray that someone would give me this delightful thing. I was, in fact, just mad to have a paint-box, and when I was not asking for it in so many words, I was breathing out my longing, just as messages are breathed on the air from the Marconi stations, to go wandering along the mysterious currents that no eye can see till they reach the instrument that is able to catch and respond to them. In the same way, if we were only wishful enough to do good to others, even when they seem bent on making us angry—if in every country, too, people cared half as much about putting an end to the hateful feelings that make wars happen as they care about having a lot of money and fine houses to live in—there would be no people left to devote themselves to fighting in all the world. "Pray without ceasing"—that is, wish with all your heart, whatever you may be doing, that everybody, yourself included, may be more happy, and good to others, and gentle, and unselfish; ask your Father which is in heaven that you may be brave enough to forgive when you are injured as Mr. Han forgave the big bully of Po-san; and you will be doing more for your country and your brothers and sisters all over the world than you can ever dream. You will be showing them the way to the City of God where the noise of war shall be heard no more.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER ON THE CRISIS.

THE Bishop of Winchester has sent the following letter to his diocese:—

Farnham Castle, August 5, 1914.

BROTHERS and Sisters in Christ,—An unspeakably solemn and momentous time is upon us. We who have lived so long in peace and quietness find ourselves faced with a crisis which shakes every stone in our national house.

It has come upon us as in a moment. "In one hour has the judgment come." It staggers us, and we know not what to say.

But I owe it to you to speak. The first thought of each of us now must be to do our best for each other and for England: and so in Christ's Name I, as your Bishop, speak to you as best I may.

(1) First then let us face the thing in all its tremendous reality. It is sober truth that in its scale, in the numbers whom it will touch, in the amount of suffering which it may cause, there has been nothing like it in the history of Europe. There is not one of us who can tell what it may mean to himself or herself, not one to whom it may not be personally ruinous, for whom it may not change the whole outlook of life. We have got to face the fact that we are living into a time such as made men of old days use words which we have often heard and thought strange and unintelligible. "The Sun and the Moon shall be darkened"; "the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken." There is new meaning in such words for us whose sky is suddenly dark, and all the bearings of whose lives are thrown out of gear.

(2) Secondly, remember that this awful thing comes to us in the Providence of God. It may come, indeed, by our own fault, or "by the craft and subtlety of the devil or man." But human sin and fault, our own or that of others, are in God's Hand. If they bring us chastisement or discipline, let us humble ourselves as a people and as individuals before Him. Many have felt that our life, with all its luxury, pleasure-worship and money-worship, all its forgetfulness or contempt of God, all its unequal pressure on the poor, could not go on long unchanged. The change has come. The discipline is upon us; but it is the discipline of our Father. Therefore we have hope. There is good to come out of agony and suffering if we have the penitence and faith to find it.

But (3) there will be a temptation to doubt God. Force in unequalled strength and mass will seem to be everything. Ships, and troops, and guns, and explosives, these will seem to be the things that count. Go back then to the Bible, to the Psalms and the Prophets; see how just this very trial has come upon God's people in all the world's dark times. The iron bondage of Pharaoh in Egypt, the overwhelming hosts of the Assyrian, the universal power of the Roman Empire in the days of persecution, the inrush of the barbarians blotting out religion and civilization together, are instances in the Bible and in history. But the faith which held on to Him through all turned out right; it won the victory, and has been the light of the world. It was that faith of God's true servant which was made perfect in the darkness of Calvary. We learn that there behind all the storm, and behind all the power of force and material things, of gold and iron, there is God, and spiritual victory, and love. The Cross of Christ is the spring of faith and hope. Let us pray that in this our hour of darkness our faith and hope may not fail, but may be strengthened.

And then lastly, let us gather up against this trial all the strength of Love that we can command. Let us draw as close as ever we can among ourselves, forgetting differences, jealousies, and the like. Let us "look not every one on his own things, but every one also on the things of others." The poor and the weak will suffer horribly. Let us not think of private provision and laying-up so much as of making things go as far as ever they can for all, by economy, and unselfishness, and frugality. There are terrible things to be gone through by the brave men of our Services, and by those who belong to them. Let us try to find the chance, on our part, of serving them.

And let us remember love even to our enemies. Things look differently to them and to us. What seems wrong to us may seem right to them. They will suffer horribly too. If their Governments have done wrong, the peoples bear but a little of the responsibility and all the misery and trouble. Out of the darkness may there come a truer brotherhood of the nations!

Pray then, brothers and sisters in Christ, pray as you have never prayed before, for never before has the need been so great. Gather together and help each other to pray. Ask God to teach us to pray with larger, stronger, deeper prayer. And then with quiet courage, the courage of a humble, penitent, believing nation, that has sought for peace, and desires to defend the right, let us look our trial in the face, and trust God for the rest, and for the issue, whatever it may be.

I desire to be your faithful friend, servant and Bishop,

EDW. WINTON.

DISTRESS CAUSED BY THE WAR.

MEETING OF LONDON UNITARIAN MINISTERS.

THERE is no doubt in the minds of experienced persons that the wisest policy with regard to distress arising out of the war is that prompt and generous contributions should be sent from all sides to the National Relief Fund, started by the Prince of Wales, and that the great bulk of cases of need should be relieved by that Fund, and the other public agencies already existing. At a largely attended meeting of our London ministers and missionaries, held at Essex Hall on Monday, August 24, this view was strongly supported, and is urged upon members of the congregations. The majority of our London ministers have been invited to join the local distress committees; and it is important that, in the serious task of organisation, our people should render all available help by giving freely of their knowledge and experience.

It was recognised, however, that beside the ordinary cases of need, there will only too surely be special cases—they are known already among our own people—where exceptional circumstances render an application to public funds peculiarly painful, if not absolutely impossible. Ministers not seldom meet with such cases, and their numbers are likely to be sadly increased, where secret privation is endured, and rendered all the keener by a brave struggle to avoid dependence upon charity. With a view of making some special provision for needs of this kind, the London ministers appointed a small committee to deal with such exceptional cases. The issue of a multitude of individual appeals by ministers and congregations was deprecated. The Committee hope to be in a position to obtain privately from Unitarians in London sufficient money to meet really urgent, exceptional cases arising within the metropolitan area.

At the meeting warm sympathy was expressed with the objects of the "Emergency Committee" organised by the Society of Friends for assisting distressed Germans, Austrians, and Hungarians, in our midst. The Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is keeping himself in touch with this Committee, and there will be all possible co-operation.

NOTES FROM ESSEX HALL.

SEVERAL of the poorer congregations in and near London have this week been supplied from Essex Hall with parcels of material for making-up by their sewing circles. In a few instances out-of-work seamstresses connected with our churches and missions will be employed and paid the ordinary rates for this work. The garments when completed will be returned, and used later when and where the needs are most urgent. All communications in respect to material and garments should be addressed to Mrs. Copeland Bowie at Essex Hall.

THE organisation of the "American Citizens' Committee" for assisting stranded Americans, brought to the forefront some of our Unitarian ministers. One of the first of the active workers was the Rev. C. Seymour Bullock, of Ottawa, who shaped the organisation of the Transportation Committee and was later transferred to the Department of Lost Luggage, where he had the hearty co-operation of the Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham. Later, Mr. Bullock was made chairman of the Committee for locating Americans stranded on the Continent, where he had the assistance of the Rev. F. H. Ives. At the very outset of the Committee work, it was announced that through Essex Hall any American Unitarians who were stranded in London would be looked after; and, if necessary, the return passage home would be guaranteed or advanced.

FOR American visitors in London a special religious service has been arranged at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, on Sunday morning, August 30, at 11 a.m., when the Rev. Paul Frothingham, minister of Arlington-street Church, Boston, U.S.A., will preach.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Northampton.—We learn that the Kettering-road Church is open every day at 8 p.m. for a service of prayer and intercession. The service is conducted by the minister, the Rev. W. C. Hall.

Women's League.—The Women's League held a special committee meeting at Essex Hall to consider the best methods of alleviating the distress caused by the war. A committee was appointed to work with the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, to be called the League's Essex Hall Committee. No time has been lost in setting to work, the committee having already organised a staff for cutting out materials for ladies to make up at their own homes, or at League Branch meetings, the same to be returned to Essex Hall when completed.

[News of the Churches, like other news, has shrunk to very small proportions before the absorbing interest of the war. The Editor will be glad to receive short paragraphs of intelligence, especially if they are likely to be useful to others, in regard to special work which has been undertaken at this time.]

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

LORD KITCHENER'S COUNSEL TO SOLDIERS.

During his campaign in the Soudan Lord Kitchener allowed his men no spirits, and his allusions in his now famous message to the use of drink by the soldiers of the Expeditionary Force would be no surprise to those who know anything of the attitude of great generals to intoxicating beverages. The precise words of the message were: "Your duty cannot be done unless your health is sound. So keep constantly on your guard against any excesses. In this new experience you may find temptations both in wine and women. You must entirely resist both temptations, and while treating all women with perfect courtesy you should avoid any intimacy.

Do your duty bravely. Fear God. Honour the King."

ABSTINENCE AND THE ARMY.

The great appeal to all men serving the Empire, put out by five well-known physicians and published more or less briefly in a very few dailies, has been issued as a poster in red and blue ink on white paper. It will be remembered that the substance of the appeal was that all engaged on naval and military work should become total abstainers, at least so long as the war lasts. The grounds for the suggestion are that alcohol hastens fatigue, confuses the judgment, slows the power to observe signals, spoils accurate shooting, lessens resistance to disease and exposure, and increases the danger of shocks and wounds. The names of the physicians associating themselves with this truly patriotic appeal are Sir Thomas Barlow (the King's physician and head of the medical profession), Sir Frederick Treves, Surgeon-Gen. G. J. H. Evatt, Sir Victor Horsley, and Professor Sims Woodhead. The Church of England Temperance Society are selling these fine posters at 1d. each, or 6s. per 100. (Depôt, 50, Marsham-street, Westminster, S.W.) The earnest desire is that enterprising individuals, as well as temperance societies, should buy copies and put them up in suitable public places like waiting rooms, railway stations, wherever soldiers pass or are gathered together. Especially should they be placed in the vicinity of recruiting depôts and barracks. It is believed that every commanding officer would gladly have them posted in the barracks and quarters.

AGITATION FOR EARLIER CLOSING.

The wisdom of closing public-houses earlier becomes more and more obvious as unemployment spreads and the distress committees are resorted to. Already wages are reduced in numerous instances, which means a strict husbanding of resources to get necessities. To those who drink habitually the temptation of the ever-open public bar to spend money on drink that is wanted for bread must be very great. Perhaps some voluntary action on the part of the trade itself might be made to shorten their hours. Following Newcastle, the Gateshead magistrates have made an order that public-houses in their district during the war have not only to be closed at 9 o'clock at night, but must not open before 8 o'clock in the morning. The order covers a large portion of North Durham county. Bootle Licensing Justices also last week expressed the opinion that it was very desirable at the present juncture that licensed houses in the borough should not open before 8 a.m. and should close at 8 p.m. They made no order, but hoped licensees would exercise every care and the greatest diligence in carrying out their responsible duties. At the request of Colonel Sykes, military commandant, all licensed houses within Southampton borough were ordered on Wednesday last week to close at 10 o'clock p.m. until further notice. At Portsmouth and in the Isle of Wight the closing time is 9 p.m. The London United Temperance Council has issued a circular to all the chairmen of the London Licensing Divisions asking them to take steps to secure the earlier closing of public-houses during the war.

SIMPLICITY OF LIFE.

One of the results of the present necessity for curtailing expenses will probably be that we shall all discover how many things we can do without, and yet be the gainers. In a very interesting book published not long ago, entitled "Social Renewal," by Mr. George Sandeman, many cogent reasons are given why, in order to enrich themselves spiritually, people of the present day who have thoughtlessly drifted into a luxurious way of living will have to simplify their lives. The "abandonment of multiplicity" which he advocates, far from robbing them of either pleasure or comfort, would really liberate them, and others at the same time, from the bondage of things to which many have sacrificed life itself without gaining any real happiness. They have been slaves to "the houses, the furniture, the decorations, the meals, the queer social intercourse, the thin intellectuality and æstheticism which make up their so-called culture, the servants and their ritual, the tiny importances and pompousities, the pretences and shutting of eyes to facts, the heartless exclusions and meannesses, the faded, stuffy atmosphere of the family standards and judgments, the dreary complacency and absurd make-believe, the final blend of individualism and materialism, that is to say, of respectability and comfort." Merely to read this passage in a book which is a direct call to newness of life at the present moment is to realise how the events of the past fortnight have altered our whole outlook on life, so remote do all those trivialities seem on which millions of people expended their energies a short time ago.

AIDS TO ECONOMY.

Housewives who are anxious to economise as much as possible during the present crisis will welcome, we think, two little books entitled "Hints towards Diet Reform" and "Economical Dishes for Workers," which are published by the National Food Reform Association, 178, St. Stephen's House, Westminster. No less than 30,000 copies have already been circulated. "Economical Dishes for Workers" will be found indispensable to distress committees and individual workers, and "Aids to Fitness," another publication issued by this Society, should be mentioned in the same category. Copies of these books, with rates for quantities, and list of publications, may be obtained by sending five penny stamps to the secretary of the Association.

THE MOTHERS' REST HOME AT HAMPSTEAD GARDEN SUBURB.

At a moment when the care of nursing mothers undertaken by the Mothers' Rest Home would be welcomed as a godsend in the homes of reservists and others, we are glad to draw attention to an appeal made by the chairman, Mr. C. E. H. Carrington, for funds to keep this admirable institution going. In view of the present crisis, with the larger expenditure it involves on account of the higher cost of living, it is very necessary that the funds should be augmented. The Home is to a large extent dependent upon the small donations of many Adult School members in and around London, and, as these people are seriously affected by the economic crisis, it is only too obvious that the income from this source must diminish. To ask payment from the mothers whom it has always been a delight to entertain as free guests would hardly be possible at such a time, and the help of friends who can spare donations or subscriptions will, therefore, be received gratefully by the Financial Secretary, Mrs. Carrington, 11, Willifield-way, Hendon, N.W.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE have come many steps nearer to the grim realities of war this week, and with the spectre of death in our homes and the cry of outraged Belgium in our ears the spirit of our people has risen. Recruiting has increased rapidly. Our mothers are giving their sons, and they will go on doing it till their hearths are bare. We have faced the situation with grim determination, and whatever happens we do not mean to be panic stricken or dismayed. The best military opinion seems to be that it will be a long war. So be it. We are prepared. Faith in the good cause has more staying power than brute strength and vulgar boastfulness. And the good cause must triumph, if all of us, thinking nothing of ourselves, serve it worthily.

* * *

OUT of the mass of diplomatic correspondence and public discussion a few things are emerging into prominence and asserting themselves triumphantly in the public conscience. Fewer people ask now what the war is about. It is not the old jingo cry, "My country right or wrong," which has silenced the protest of the peacemaker, it is moral passion which has captured our hearts, and is sweeping us along in a common movement of effort and sacrifice. We are fighting for the rights of small nationalities and the sacred obligations of the pledged word. We are also fighting for the existence of Christian civilisation against one of the most terrible forms of materialism which the world has ever seen. Let us look the matter straight in the face apart from all the high-sounding phrases with which Prussian rhetoric tries to conceal the monstrous wickedness of Prussian policy.

It is the ambition of Germany to subdue the world, and the only public morality it respects is that of the mailed fist, striking how and where it will. That godless ambition must be brought down to the dust, if there is ever to be peace or happiness in the world.

* * *

THE recommendation about the need of public speech which we made last week was already being acted on when we wrote. The Prime Minister has agreed to speak in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales and the speech at the Guildhall will have been delivered before these words reach our readers. This will be the beginning of an organised campaign in which many of the ablest speakers in the country will take part. A section of the press has commended this admirable movement chiefly as an aid to recruiting, but that is only one aspect of its usefulness. It will help to keep public opinion keen and intelligent, and it will present our policy to the world with the dignity which befits a great cause. These are both moral factors of incalculable importance in a long contest.

POSSIBLY there are still some quiet people among our readers who detect an unpleasing note of exaggeration in some of the things which we have felt it our duty to write lately. If it is so we are not surprised, for the horror of the situation has come upon us so suddenly that we find ourselves constantly slipping back into familiar habits of thought and feeling. "The mischief with nearly all of us," Mr. Arnold Bennett writes in the Daily News, "is that we do not grasp the significance of our destiny. We read history and of events magnificent and terrible, but our souls are not large enough to understand that fate has singled us out, this very generation of ours, to figure in history as no generation ever figured before."

"LET us sit down and read history," Mr. Bennett continues. "Read the most terrific pages of history. Read of Cæsar, of Attila, of Napoleon. Get our souls full of those pages. Comprehend the sublimity of their upheavals. And then force ourselves to realise that the page now being written transcends them all in horror and importance. We cannot realise it. . . . But we must. And the sooner the better. This thing has happened to us. The realisation should induce a solemn state of mind, for which there is no word except the word religious. It should stir not only the minor religious virtues of faith, obedience, fortitude, and helpfulness, but the final religious virtue of carelessness about self. Comforts, conveniences, rewards, justice, even life—what are they when the loss of them is calmly risked? We may or may not see the end of this thing. The old ideal may or may not be as moribund as we had supposed. What matter? We shall have lived in an age unparalleled; and human dignity remains. Some, I admit, are pessimistic concerning the result—not the result to Britain of Britain's pugnacity, but the vast result of the struggle between ideals. Of course, commonsense, energy, steadfastness, the informed consciousness of right, may fail. Nobody who wishes to think so can be prevented from thinking so. Personally, I do not think so. I am on the side of the far future, and the far future is always right—till in its turn it slips into the past."

LAST week we repeated our warning against too ready acceptance of stories of atrocities. Meanwhile terrible facts have accumulated, and the Belgian Government has taken steps to call public attention to the hideous story of outrage and wrong. The most damning fact of all is the cynical defence of the policy of outrage which has been issued by the German Government. It is all put down to the credit of military necessities. We are asked to believe that the great German army needs the weapons of terror, pillage, and pitiless cruelty in order to defend itself against the civil population of Belgium. Here are the exact words :—

“ The only means of preventing surprise attacks from the civil population has been to interfere with unrelenting severity and to create examples which, by their frightfulness, would be a warning to the whole country. The increased war contribution levied on the province of Liège has also had an excellent effect.”

In view of this confession of policy we can no longer hesitate to accept many acts of hideous barbarism as literally true. We know what that word “ frightfulness ” means. It is a synonym for the opening of the floodgates of hell against the helpless peasantry of Belgium.

* * *

PERHAPS not more horrible in its details than many other things which have occurred, but more staggering to the imagination, has been the sack of Louvain by the German troops. Of course, the usual official excuse has been forthcoming—it was all the fault of the misguided inhabitants. But no excuse is possible. It will remain stamped upon the imagination of mankind as an act of unbridled savagery. Much has been said about the beauty of the buildings of Louvain and its long tradition of culture. It seems probable that the University buildings and the library with its priceless manuscripts have been destroyed, while the Germans have done their best to save the Hôtel de Ville, doubtless for their own use at some future date.

BUT we agree with Mr. A. J. Dawe, an Englishman who, with an equally brave companion, Mr. Henry Furst, of Exeter College, Oxford, was a spectator of the destruction of Louvain, that the salvage of an ancient building is hardly to be mentioned in the same breath as the hideous cruelties inflicted upon the helpless people. Here are a few sentences culled from his description of the scene which appeared in the Times on Thursday : “ Lover as I am of art, I would rather that all the artistic masterpieces of this world had been destroyed rather than that the people of Belgium should have suffered the loss of property, the loss of their menfolk, and the terrible shooting, looting, and burning that I have seen. The Germans have saved the Hôtel de Ville. That is a small point. Let English people who sit safely on their island and talk of the barbaric destruction of works of art think less of the works of art and more of the human life that has been ruthlessly destroyed. . . . The city was a mass of flames, destruction, and death. Dead men, many horribly burned, lay around us. Human decency and pity prevent one from giving a detailed description of the forms of death we saw around us. . . . Burning houses were every moment falling into the roads ; shooting was still going on. The dead and dying, burnt and burning, lay on all sides. Over some the Germans had placed sacks. I saw about half a dozen women and children. In one street I saw two little children walking hand in hand over the bodies of the dead men. I have no words to describe these things. I hope people will not make too much of the saving of the Hôtel de Ville.”

FOR five centuries Louvain has been a centre of European culture. Its University was founded in 1426. By the end of the century, to use the words of Canon Rashdall, “ it was perhaps the most famous place of education in Europe.” At a later date the historian Justus Lipsius drew hundreds of students from far and near. In more recent times it has won renown as one of the chief centres of Roman Catholic learning. Indeed, by Roman Catholics all over the world Louvain was a name to be uttered with reverence and affection, and nowhere more than in Ireland. Hundreds of Irishmen were trained there for the priesthood. To this day there have been bursaries founded in the 18th century for Irish students, and the library was singularly rich in Irish manuscripts. This act of ruthless destruction, worthy of the worst days of mediæval brigandage, is thus a blow aimed at the heart of some of the world’s deepest religious affections. Its wickedness is almost equalled by its stupidity.

* * *

WE have seldom seen anything more futile and untimely than the letter which a small group of English theologians have sent to Professor Harnack in order to explain their position and to administer a mild rebuke to him for calling England a traitor to civilisation. They humbly assure him that they have no preference for France or Russia over Germany, and that their sympathies are in matters of the spirit so largely German that nothing but the very strongest reasons could ever lead them to contemplate the possibility of hostile relations between Great Britain and Germany. Perhaps a similar letter is in preparation for presentation to Professor Eucken. We have no information, but we hope not. Has the professorial mind no common sense, no saving salt of humour, no insight into the grim facts, that it must still waste its time over this kind of banal sentimentalism ? For a long time Professor Harnack has been a favourite in court circles in Berlin. Have we any evidence that he has ever resisted the demoralising ideals of Prussian ambition or risked anything for the sake of Christian freedom and righteousness ?

SIXTY or seventy years ago German professors by the score would have fought with tongue and pen for liberty from this slavery of the spirit, and they would have gone to prison gladly rather than keep silent. But not now. That is part of the tragedy of the situation. The educated classes in Germany have capitulated to Cæsar. The Universities have lost their soul. There is not the slightest use pretending that it is not so. Let us make our position quite clear. It is a matter upon which we claim to have as good a right to speak as many others, for we belong to the very small group of people in this country who know something about German thought at first hand. We have valued the German contribution to religion on the side of scholarship and speculation and intellectual culture, but we have long been conscious of its weakness in moral imagination and quickening spiritual power. For this reason our sympathies in matters of the spirit are not largely German. Scholarship, culture, refined intellectualism are of little moment in a moral battle. We had better cross the Rubicon and have done with it, though we may leave many of our friends still hesitating on the other side. We take our stand with the plain man who knows in his heart that all the books which Harnack has ever written, and all the philosophy with which Eucken has deluged the world, cannot be put in the balance against one outraged woman or one slaughtered child in the “ necessary ” invasion of Belgium.

WE read the following words the other day in a Church calendar : “ It has been deemed necessary to postpone our Harvest Festival, which is usually held on the last Sunday of September, for although the harvest is abundant in this and other countries and we are grateful for such a service there are needed cheerful hearts and joyful voices, and upon these, with war so near our shores, we cannot count.” May we say with all respect that a sentiment of this kind seems to us faithless and unworthy. We cannot understand the suggestion that we shall not be in the mood to assemble in a solemn act of thanksgiving to Almighty God. A Harvest Festival is not a feast of human merriment but a holy offering of praise and prayer to the Giver of all good. Moreover, there is a special reason why we should enter into the joy of harvest this year. We have never felt our need so acutely before, and there is enough not only for our own wants, but also for generous gifts to those whose need is far greater than our own. Will it be proposed later on that we should suspend our services on Christmas Day because we are in no mood to celebrate the coming of the Prince of Peace ? May we suggest a little quiet meditation upon the words, “ I will bless the Lord at all times ; his praise shall continually be in my mouth.”

THERE are still many people in the country who are against war on any terms. The only opposition which they can offer even to an army threatening to invade their country and devastate their homes is the sword of the spirit. This is not weakness or sentimentalism on their part, but the heroism of tried conviction in face of desperate odds. We have deep respect for the position, though we cannot accept it. We know what it is costing them to maintain it at the present time. It is a daily martyrdom, an unceasing prayer that through the shrinking of the flesh, in some moment of danger or fear, they may not be unfaithful to the inmost conviction of their souls. They would not strike a blow even to defend themselves from death. That is a courage as sublime as anything which the most splendid stories of battle can show. But if these people cannot take sides, as many of us have felt ourselves forced to take sides, even to the extent of pressing on the work of the recruiting sergeant and giving our sons to the war, they are one with us in recognising that the issue before us is one of life and death between two principles, and we must choose be the consequences what they may.

We can most of us look back to a time—was it really only a few weeks ago?—when an attitude of intellectual indifference among rival moral systems seemed almost inseparable from the tolerance of good breeding. One man upheld old fashioned Christianity, another worshipped at the shrine of a rejuvenated paganism, while a third proclaimed NIETZSCHE as the prophet of the new age. What did it matter? Let them all join in friendly argument or confute one another in the pages of the reviews. The only unpardonable folly was to refuse to keep an open mind or to believe that there is anything fixed and final in the pleasant variety entertainment which we call the world. To such a mood all sternness is unpleasant, the words of swift challenge which flash upon us from the Bible seem unreal, and moral indignation is a little brutal and unkind. Suddenly we have been confronted by a moral ultimatum. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve" has sounded as clearly for us as ever it did for the Israelites of old. All our fine-spun theories have been blown to pieces like spiders' webs in a gale. The latest novelty in morals has ceased to glitter and beguile as the storm cloud has swept over the land. We know that the days of pleasant dreaming are over and are little likely to return while we live on this earth. Quietly, with the confidence of strong men, we must take our side not simply for to-day and to-morrow, but for ever. For morality is not calculating opportunism but loyalty which exacts no terms save permission to serve the good cause to the end. And loyalty of this kind means separation from everything which is hostile to it, intolerance of everything which weakens or thwarts it, a cleavage which cuts down to the foundations of life. A Christian is not a man who speculates about the nature of the good. He has seen goodness suffering and enthroned; he possesses it as an eternal treasure in his heart; and he gives himself freely to its service, not caring what the consequences may be, as a soldier goes forth to die for his country.

In a striking book on Germany and England by the late Professor CRAMB—a book as enlightening in its description of the forces at work in Germany as it is unpleasant in its contempt for the author's own countrymen—NAPOLEON and CHRIST are described as the two spirit-forces which are contending for men's allegiance in modern Europe.

"This conflict," Professor CRAMB writes, "between CHRIST and NAPOLEON for the mastery over the minds of men is the most significant spiritual phenomenon of the twentieth century. . . . But it is in Germany alone that as yet Napoleonism has acquired something of the clearness and consistency of a formulated creed, above all in Berlin and in the cities and towns that come most within the influence of Berlin. . . . Young Germany, the Germany of to-day, in the writings of TREITSCHKE, studies Napoleonism, illumining politics with an austere and uplifting grandeur. In the writings of NIETZSCHE and of the followers of NIETZSCHE they study the same Napoleonism transforming the principles of everyday life, breathing a new spirit into ethics, transfiguring the tedious, half-hypocritical morality of an earlier generation. . . . Corsica, in a word, has conquered Galilee."

To the author of this book the position described was apparently almost wholly admirable, though he admitted that it was animated by venomous jealousy of England and presented a terrible menace to the security of English life. His only cure for it was that we in turn should abandon CHRIST for NAPOLEON. All through his eloquent pages he stumbles along, a blind leader of the blind, without even a passing tribute to the spiritual forces of honour and mercy and inflexible justice which mould the life of peoples. This is the sort of thing which has cursed German diplomacy with stupidity. Here is the source of the moral antagonisms which are written large over the diplomatic correspondence which preceded the war. Here too, we must confess with sad and aching hearts, is the national apostasy which has led directly to the violation of treaties, the blood-stained fields of Belgium, the burning of Louvain, and all the nameless horrors of the cruel lust for power which will stain the name of Germany and sterilise its nobler qualities to the third and fourth generation.

In England we have played with these things. Small coteries have welcomed translations of NIETZSCHE and slobbered over him as their new prophet. Young men of capacious ignorance have talked about the Will to Power. A few serious thinkers have tried to interpret NIETZSCHE and his school of thought to the English mind. But the whole thing has not really touched us. It has been at best a fit of midsummer madness, and now we are broad awake. We know in what we have believed, and we mean to abide by it come what may and cost what it will. There is no lust for power in our blood; there is no dark jealousy of our neighbours in our hearts; but honour and justice and the sacredness of the plighted word and the protection of the defenceless and the weak—these are things which we value more than life itself; and to these things we mean to be faithful with the stern and unflinching intolerance of conscience. If any man says that he does not feel in this way we are not going to pay him the feeble compliment of a pretended tolerance. Tolerance ranges over the wide area of things which are indifferent, about which it is lawful to keep an open mind. It has nothing to do with the ultimate things of the soul, when we are face to face with swift issues of life and death, of good and evil.

And let us not deceive ourselves that we can escape paying the price of our Christian allegiance to the uttermost farthing. It is no time for sentimental dreams about happy German friendships and everything being as it was before when the war is over. Nothing will be the same as before. Between our bright memories of German life there rises the terrible spectre of Louvain in ashes. The heart of Germany has to be purged of that and of many another ghastly offering to the MOLOCH of Prussian valour before we can feel as we did before, and the time that most of us have still to live will be all too short for the accomplishment of that work. This is not a matter of our own choice. It is laid upon us by the inexorable demands of righteousness. Perhaps our Christianity has lingered too long in the green pastures of the beatitudes. Now it bids us walk through the terrors of the dark valley. "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me." "I came not to bring peace but a sword." It is not for us to appoint the terms of our service or to measure the sacrifices which we are willing to bring. We shall have to lay sore hearts and broken friendships and our dearest affections upon the altar of God before this war is over. Let us do it with the courage of men who have defied NAPOLEON because they believe in JESUS CHRIST.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

HE that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal."—John xii. 25.

THE young man who composedly perilled his life and lost it has done exceedingly well for himself without doubt.

He who never perilled his life, but retains it to old age in riches and ease, has probably achieved nothing for himself worth mentioning.—WALT WHITMAN.

FOURSCORE and seven years ago our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived, and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle-field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a resting-place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that from these honoured dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

(Address at the Dedication of the National Cemetery at Gettysburg.)

DEAR MADAM,—I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the Adjutant-General of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any words of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I cannot refrain from tendering to you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement, and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost, and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.—Yours very sincerely and respectfully,

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

CHRISTIANITY AND LUXURY.

IN one form or another an ineradicable instinct has prompted Christians in all times to free themselves from luxurious and self-indulgent ways of living; to walk as disciples of him who "had not where to lay his head"; to lay aside, not only every sin, but every weight, that so they may run the race set before them, not as beating the air, but as those that strive for the victory. It is, indeed, not easy to define the precise kind or amount of luxury which is compatible with Christian simplicity; or, rather, it must of necessity vary. But the principle is, I think, clear. In life, as in art, what ever does not help, hinders. All that is superfluous to the main object of life must be cleared away, if that object is to be fully attained. In all kinds of effort, whether moral, intellectual, or physical, the essential condition of vigour is a severe pruning away of redundance. Is it likely that the highest life, the life of the Christian body, can be carried on upon easier terms?

CAROLINE EMELIA STEPHEN.

LORD our God, great, eternal, wonderful in glory, who art the life of all, the help of those that flee unto thee, the hope of those who cry unto thee; cleanse us from our sins, secret and open, and from every thought displeasing to thy goodness, that with a pure heart and a clear soul, with perfect love and calm hope, we may venture confidently and fearlessly to pray unto thee. Amen.

O GOD, the protector of all who put their trust in thee: we pray for the good estate of this our beloved land, that it may please thee to preserve to us the blessings of freedom and good will. Unite in mutual understanding men of alien race and faith; revive in all hearts a spirit of devotion to the public good, that strife and tumult may be appeased and justice and truth be exalted. Enable us and all thy people faithfully to discharge the duties of our different spheres, that so the kingdom of brotherhood and peace may be hastened upon the earth, and thy will be done even as it is done in heaven. Amen.

ENGLISH TOURISTS IN SWITZERLAND.

A WEEK when the civilisation of Europe was plunged into the burning fiery furnace found many British tourists scattered over all parts of Switzerland, not merely in the better-known resorts but in outlying villages hard by the snow line. Many of us who had gone off, picolet in hand, at three or four a.m., learnt on our return one evening that the order for partial mobilisation of the Swiss army had been issued, and that French, German, Austrian, and other subjects of military age must return to their native lands to join the colours. At many hotels the staff, from the proprietor to the portier, had to leave at once, and the establishments to be closed in consequence. As the alarm spread, and the Federal Government was in dread that Swiss territory might be violated, the order for complete mobilisation of the Swiss army was issued. In the tiny village where I happened to be staying the church bells were rung, and the proclamation made in the presence of all the assembled villagers and of the foreign tourists who had hastily gathered together at the signal. The tiny Catholic church was filled at first mass at 5.30 the next morning with soldiers who partook of communion ere they departed to take up arms in defence of the neutrality of their republic, which, for six centuries, has stubbornly defended its inviolability. All foreign tourists, English excepted, departed as soon as the news of war came. The latter in most cases remained, especially as the British Minister at Berne issued specific instructions to British subjects to stay where they were until arrangements for their return to England could be made. Those who in obedience to this advice prolonged their stay had a period of waiting—five weeks—which tried the patience and steadiness of most. For a few days a fairly regular service of letters and newspapers was obtainable, but gradually communication with the outside world was restricted, and later almost cut off. Letters from England ceased. Telegrams, which everybody wished to send home, were only accepted at the owner's risk and at three times the ordinary rates. Even on these conditions they were often refused. Later still, telephonic communication from town to town was cut off except for military purposes. As a result, the air was full of the wildest rumours, only too often believed, even by British subjects who have the reputation of being level-headed in times of danger and difficulty. Those who were able to make their way to larger centres from the mountain villages—and for many this was out of the question, as paper money of any kind could not be realised, and even English gold and £5 Bank of England notes were refused—if their own experiences were rather humdrum, met other foreigners who had been driven across the German or Austrian frontiers, often with insult and brutality. Terror-stricken or woe-begone faces one saw in plenty. Perhaps it was a Swiss pensionnat, containing many foreign pupils—German, Austrian, Hungarian, Russian—who were taking fearful leave of each other, and going back to find that their male relatives had gone off to fight the relatives of their girl friends. A Russian who had been in Austria, and been twice imprisoned and cruelly maltreated on his journey towards Switzerland, went mad and rushed round a Swiss waiting room asking someone to put him out of his misery. Another Russian with whom I conversed, who also had endured the grossest brutality, and who had lost his all, said that God had brought this scourge upon the nations to punish them for their materialism. A Finnish lady who came in tears to the British Legation at Berne, after being cruelly refused a passport by the Russian Consul, begged to be allowed to go to England, in the hope of being able to make her way thence to join her husband and family in Finland. England had always been friendly to Finland, and if she could only touch English soil, some friend, she was sure, would be found to help her. Meantime, tales such as these served but to stiffen the Swiss determination to preserve their borders inviolate, and sometimes, as one looked to the hills at night near the frontier, one saw rows of twinkling electric lights which showed that the mountains on which they were to be found were mined and that guns in electric communication with each other were ready to belch forth resistance to any possible invader.

Soon after the declaration of war, it became clear from every point of view that if the British subjects were to be got back to England in safety, some form of machinery to meet the exceptional circumstances would have to be devised. An organisation for the repatriation of duly accredited British subjects who desired to make their way to England was started at Berne, working with the authority of the resident British Minister. The British Consuls and Vice-Consuls of Switzerland, who had hitherto been working more or less independently, were instructed to act in co-operation with this organisation, which was manned entirely by volunteers. Some of these had been at various British Legations in Germany. Several came from Munich, which forgot its traditional bonhomie and behaved as brutally as the Prussians, whom it has so often laughed at, and whom, at bottom, it so cordially hates. It was necessary first of all to find out the exact number—no light matter under the circumstances—of those who wished to be repatriated, to make with the Swiss and French military authorities all the complicated arrangements necessary to advance money or secure credit, to work out numerous details with regard to luggage, railway tickets, and a thousand and one other things difficult enough under normal circumstances, but infinitely more so in a state of war. For weeks the office of the organisers was beset either by personal calls, or by telegraphic or telephonic messages when internal communications had been restored in Switzerland. And as the days of weary waiting mounted up it was obvious that many of those compulsorily detained were quite unstrung.

Others, more level-headed or under steadier guidance—for the whole number of tourists were grouped under leaders—offered their services to the President of the local commune to help with the harvest, to carry down milk from the hills, or do any other useful work required of them. In one party known to me the women, in order to relieve the hotel staff, helped with the household work, did washing for their party, being assisted in this operation by such of the men members as were not required by the commune. Provisions ran low in some cases, and, of course, all luxuries ceased. But those for whom the rations of a mountain village hotel were rather meagre supplemented them with bilberries, which could be gathered in profusion at the expenditure of half an hour's walk. During the tedious days and weeks of waiting the kindness and sympathy of the Swiss, for whom the outbreak of war has been a staggering financial disaster, was boundless. The proprietor of a hotel in a mountain village which had been booked by a British society for the whole season, and who was paid by fortnightly cheques on an English bank, had not been able to realise any of these in cash from his own local bank, which had temporarily suspended payment. Two days before the departure of more than 10 members of this society at the word of command from Berne his bank remitted him some money. His first act was to offer to advance to his English guests as much hard cash as they would require for their journey home. Needless to say, all of these will uphold Swiss neutrality and independence for the rest of their lives.

The Berne committee for convenience arranged that the British subjects should be drafted off by districts, except in the case of army and navy men and officials of Government departments, who naturally were sent off in the first special train. Places were reserved for each group under its own leaders. At Geneva, where we entered the train for Paris, the same order was observed. Each passenger, on presentation of a ticket, obtained from his local committee, received another entitling him to a numbered and reserved place, which he was able to keep all the way to Paris. The change was accomplished in about half an hour, a remarkable fact when it is remembered that each train carried from 800 to 1,000 passengers. At the French frontier, where we expected a good deal of vigilance about dutiable articles and the presentation of passports, we had little trouble. True, a number of lynx-eyed officials entered each compartment to inquire if we had any Germans stowed away under the seats or in the one piece of luggage allowed to each passenger, but the presentation of a collective passport specially viséed by the French Minister at Berne, and of a courier's pass from the British Ministry, acted like magic, and we sped swiftly on our journey, bearing the fervent good wishes of the frontier officials. All the way along even the workers in the fields, mostly women, seemed to be aware that a train of British subjects was passing by, and we were constantly greeted with cries of "Vive l'Angleterre! À bas les Allemandes." Even from the window of a moving train one could see the tense, eager look of those who felt that they were fighting for life and death, but that we were members of a race whose staunch aid was to make victory secure for them. At Lyons a special demonstration had been arranged, and cheers greeted us all the way through the outskirts of the town to the central station, where we stopped for an hour for refreshments. Young girls came forward to bedeck us with tricolours and then glided away ere we had time to say thanks. Boy scouts came to offer their help or to write their names on postcards for lady passengers; sometimes varying the watchword "Vive l'Angleterre" (with all the gallantry of their race) into "Vivent les Anglaises!" After many exchanges of La Marseillaise and God Save the King, sung with unforgettable enthusiasm, we left Lyons at 7 p.m. amid resounding cheers and waving of French and British flags. During the night many trains of wounded soldiers passed us, and most of us had our first sobering glimpse of the horrors of war. We had several opportunities of talking to the wounded at places where we stopped. Some spoke of having been eleven days in the trenches, others of the horrible and sometimes unnameable cruelty of the Germans. We saw a few German prisoners, amongst them a nephew of the Kaiser. Many of the ladies obtained buttons or other souvenirs from the wounded French recruits; the men could shake hands and look what their imperfect French did not enable them to say. Murderous assaults on the French language, amounting almost to a casus belli, were made from the British train so long as we were on French soil, but comrades in arms can understand each other without such a poor, imperfect medium as speech; and grammar in these stirring times becomes a mere irrelevance. At Paris, where we stayed another hour, we had more singing and cheering, less enthusiastic than at Lyons, as Paris was not the crowded Paris we had known, and the British were tired. But tea, and, more welcome still, English newspapers, or at least newspapers in English, had a reviving effect. What a curious sensation, after being shut off from newspapers for five weeks, to read one on the same day of issue. So long as daylight remained cheering and waving of flags marked the journey to Dieppe. Sometimes we stopped in small stations opposite to trains of soldiers so near to ours that they were able to shake hands with us. At Dieppe we went on board to pass the night before setting off for Folkestone. Only a small number were able to get berths, but the others disposed themselves cheerfully along the decks or took advantage of odd corners. Two ladies, finding a motor car on board, gleefully tucked themselves away in it and spent one of the most restful nights of their lives. Under a cloudless sky, a perfect passage (with not a sign of a war vessel anywhere) brought us speedily to Folkestone Harbour, which we entered singing the National Anthem and the Doxology. After the Customs formalities, a little more stringent than usual this time, we made at express speed for Charing Cross, to be met by crowds of anxious relatives in search of us, or of other people who had been interned.

THE WAR.

SIR,—Looking over the summer sea I am in the midst of nature's calm beauty, and yet I can almost hear, in spirit, the booming of the guns and see the awful scenes of carnage, where brave Englishmen are laying down their lives for their dear native land. As I wake anew to the thought of it each morning, it comes to me with fresh horror. The very loveliness of the view that greets my eyes makes the contrast the greater. In this twentieth century of the religion of the Prince of Peace, in this August sunshine, this Christian Europe, east and west and south and north, is one vast Armageddon, the nations throughout its length and breadth locked in fratricidal strife. What a commentary on our Christianity. What have we to say to it? In Tennyson's words:

Behold we know not anything;
I can but trust that good shall fall
At last—far off—at last to all,
And every winter change to spring.

We need that trust in God as we never did in our lives in the presence of the blow alike to Christianity and to Civilisation that staggers us. We need to rest in our heavenly Father's arms, finding in Him a strength not our own, bracing up our souls to be ready to bear any cross that may be laid upon us. Does not this great tragedy awake us from our spiritual slumber, and rebuke our love of relaxation, our money-making, our self-satisfaction, our worldliness, our narrow aims? Don't we hear the call of God to be, all of us, like our brave soldiers, laying down our lives in service of our dear native land, if not on the battle field yet offering them a living sacrifice, doing our very utmost to relieve the distress and the suffering of this vast calamity? I am a life-long Christian minister, a man of peace, of brotherhood and good-will to all; I hate war. I loathe it with a nation of one blood with ourselves like Germany, knit to us by many close ties, in religion, in literature, in science, in art, in music, in commerce. I prayed God that we might be saved from this fraternal strife with all my soul. But now that it has come upon us we are fighting for our very lives, for our hearths and our homes, for our national existence, and at this moment all that we hold dear is at stake. With no quarrel with the German people but with the military autocracy that is in danger of strangling Europe, amid deeds that make our blood boil as we picture the burning homes and the slaughtered women and children, we must summon all the might of our manhood and our womanhood to defend ourselves from it. If we have been too prosperous, if worldly wealth has been our chief pursuit, ours is a rude awakening, and it may be that we shall be saved yet so as by fire. Our nation, please God, will come out of this great trial purged and purified in a patriotism that will merge self in the nation's cause, with no vindictiveness against our German brothers, but with a courage that never faints or fails in maintaining our national life and liberty.—Yours, &c.,

IS GOD WITH US IN WAR?

SIR,—I stood recently on the lofty cliffs of a south country seaside town looking out to sea. It was night time, and away to the left flashed the intermittent red gleam of the Needles lighthouse. This, in the calm, starlit night, was the sign of peace. For that light burns every night of every week through all the years to guide ships of all nations past the dangerous rocks of the Isle of Wight into the safe waters of the Solent, leading to the harbour of Southampton. But as the eye followed the course of the Solent it was arrested by the vivid flare of search-lights; some stationary, casting their brilliant light all round, but one flashing now out to sea, now over land, like some huge luminous eye ceaselessly watching. This, in that same calm starlit night, was the sign of war. For those vigilant lights were searching far out on sea and land for the least indication of the approach of danger. An occasional boom of a gun sounded weirdly through the stillness of the night—a signal probably to some approaching vessel to lie by till proof had been given that it was a friend, not foe. The same searching scrutiny is being made every night all round our coasts, for we are at war.

Looking upward into the splendid mystery of the starlit sky, and then downward upon these flashing signs of human war, led me to searching questions. In all this majestic universe, framed in its manifold, magnificent harmony, what violation of cosmic law has led to the frightful disturbance of the harmony of this fraction of the universe? Where is that overruling Power of Love whom we worship as God? What part have we in It, or It in us? We have believed God with us in the days of peace and friendship; we have hailed His inspiration in the progress of science and culture, His power in the unfolding of nature, His love in the fellowship of family life. But now that nations have declared their intention of plunging into organised international slaughter, where is God? Glibly enough is His name upon the tongues of the governors of the conflicting peoples; it is God who will give victory to the German arms, to the French, the Russian, the British, the Austrian.

Have we not yet learned that God is not with us in war? The mismanagement of European affairs which has led to the ghastly appeal to the sword is a matter of human bungling; and if man can find no way out save by the hacking of the sword, let him at least refrain from appealing to the Deity. If we were striving to solve differences by mutual understanding, if we were using the weapons of generosity and love, our appeals to God would be prayers. To invoke the Deity to aid us in the slaughter of men is not prayer, but blasphemy. If necessity compels us to slaughter men, let us do our dreadful work without sullying the fair name of Love.

Maybe we shall find Him in the end—all of us who now feel compelled to turn our backs upon Him. That we may do so let us all strive, even while we plunge into the God-absent barbarity of war, to keep our hearts and minds sensitive to nobler aspirations and hopes than conflict favours. Let us watch over the citadels of our minds even as the flashlights watch over our British ports; to challenge every suggestion, every thought that seeks to enter there. We must admit none but friends, no thoughts of bitterness or hatred, no vile insinuations, no passion-intoxicating suggestions. We will harbour generous thoughts of those who are our foes, and strive to conquer ourselves and them, Europe and all the world, by true understanding, generous goodwill, and love. Then only will God be with us.—Yours, &c., J. CYRIL FLOWER.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

SIR,—You urge us to take long views. The view I wish to put forward for discussion is not "long" in the sense of being ideal. But we must recognise the facts of the world as they are, and make provisional arrangements. The present demonstration of the "will to power" philosophy compels a revision of political opinions. Hitherto, when the real Germany stood unrevealed, some of us viewed with suspicion foreign alliances and suggestions for strengthening the Army and Navy. We are now congratulating ourselves that we have Allies, and that our Government has been steadily preparing—as far as public opinion would permit—for this inevitable trial. I believe there is a growing conviction that where all stand to lose, all should be prepared to defend. At present the burden of defence is not equally shared. The bulk of our soldiers are drawn from the poorest classes. If we are prepared to stake our national existence upon the courage and stamina of the poor, we must be equally prepared to submit to the consequences. But equity and policy point the way to a national rather than a voluntary army. Compulsion of different kinds drives men into the Army and Navy. It would be horrible to think that mere love of fighting fills up the ranks. In war time we must condone the action of employers who practically force unmarried employees to enlist, but in peace time it is not a comfortable thought that economic need exercises such pressure. We preachers are fond of exhorting our people to "play the man." It seems to me that the manly thing is to face this issue squarely and support any arrangement whereby the whole nation could be brought into line.

As the champions of international morality and the custodians of our own free institutions, we ought not to trust to the blandishments of the recruiting officer and the pressure of economic misfortunes to provide us with enough men for ships and barracks. Whether we want it or not, compulsory service is visibly drawing nearer. A frank discussion of the subject might contribute to the adoption of such a form as would yield the maximum of efficiency along with the minimum of unpleasantness.—Yours, &c.,

THE SAFETY OF ENGLISH TOURISTS IN GERMANY.

SIR,—It may relieve the natural anxiety of some of your readers to know that two Englishwomen left the Bavarian village of Ober-ammergau on Saturday, August 22, and reached London safely via Holland on 28th inst. The journey was not easy, and in some parts even dangerous. We wish to record that we received courteous treatment from German police officials, soldiers and hotel proprietors. The American Consulates in Germany are, needless to say, doing everything that can be done for British subjects. Their position is very difficult. May we add that it is our private opinion that in those towns where not only British men, but women and children are being detained, the principal reason for so doing is the difficulty of securing the safety of British subjects during transit? The village of the Passion Play, Ober-ammergau, is known by name to us all. During the three weeks in which it was impossible to arrange their return, the Englishwomen in this village received every kindness; they walked the country roads in comfort, and, had they had the heart to do so, could have enjoyed all the delights of this beautiful mountain valley. The two responsible for this letter were unable to pay for their pension, yet their landlady offered to lend them the equivalent of £5 to £10 for their return journey. We feel we have met there many who literally interpret the Master's message in their daily lives. May our love and confidence in our own country take, when the time is due, the form of a striving to overthrow the barriers of hate and misunderstanding, which will be not the least of the legacies of this international war.—Yours, &c.,

THE WOMEN'S LEAGUE AND THE WAR.

SIR,—We are given to understand from THE INQUIRER of August 29 that the Women's League is forwarding the policy of doing needlework as a means of relieving distress caused by the war. I believe I am one of a large number of your readers who must be disappointed to learn of this lead being given from the Central Committee, readers who think that what we women need at this juncture is not encouragement to sew, but encouragement not to sew. If my own small experience is not exceptional, there are, at the present time, many women sewing who have an uneasy feeling that the right thing would be not to do so. Of several girls I know who have joined a sewing circle simply because they were asked and because they were more than ready to "do something," one told me that she thought "everybody agreed that it was wrong"; another that "of course, having started, they couldn't stop"; and another that she "hadn't liked to say anything about it."

I have great sympathy with these doubters, but is it not a fact that it is a finer service to give our pennies, if we cannot give our pounds, in furthering employment, than to give any amount of stitches which incidentally make the struggle harder for those to whom stitches mean a livelihood? One lady suggested to me that we should give both employment and stitches, and that, it seems, is what the League is setting out to do, that is to say, it is acting in two ways, one of which tends to increase, and the other to decrease employment; it is paying for part of the work.

May I say that our Highgate branch has become responsible for a certain amount of work which is being done by unemployed seamstresses. The plan has met with entire approval, even from those who would have enjoyed the sewing circle. I fully believe that were the League to announce that all sewing undertaken by its Committee would be paid for, it would receive the enthusiastic support of nearly every one of its members.—Yours, &c.,

AMY WITTHALL.

LETTERS FOR GERMANY.

SIR,—There may be some among your readers who are anxious to communicate with relations or friends in Germany or Hungary. They will be glad to hear that the Dutch and Danish representatives of The International Union of Liberal Christian Women have offered their kind services to make this possible. Of course certain conditions have to be carefully observed, and anyone who would like to take advantage of such opportunity should apply to me for information as to the proper method of procedure.—Yours, &c.,

HELEN BROOKE HERFORD,
Hon. Secretary.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

ON TRIAL.

THERE must be very few scholars indeed who do not know what an examination is. If you are at school you are pretty sure to know it very well; and even those who learn at home probably have their "test papers," or something like that, from time to time. It is rather a trying and alarming experience sometimes, when you are set down, with all your books and notes taken away from you, to write "straight out of your head" what you can remember in answer to questions which you have never seen before. You have been learning your lessons week by week, and thought you knew them quite well; but when it comes to the examination—then, sometimes, the knowledge does not seem so secure after all!

Well, examinations are not always pleasant; and we may even have a feeling that some of the questions are over-severe—or that they are just asking us the particular things we didn't know, which seems very hard. But on the whole we shall all confess, I think, that it is a good thing to be examined now and then; it is rather exciting, and spurs us on when perhaps we should be slack otherwise, and it does really test what we know. For you do not know a thing, in the true sense, unless you can bring it out of your mind, as it were, and show it to someone else. A poem is known when we can recite it without the book; a rule in arithmetic is known when we can show how it works with any figures that may be given to us; and a flower is known when we can draw it, or at least describe its form and colour and growth, upon just hearing its name.

Of course, we do not want to be always undergoing these tests, and there would be little time for learning anything fresh if examinations came too often. But it is well to remember the use of them, and perhaps now and then to examine ourselves a little, and make sure that our learning has really become knowledge—the power to give out again, to show to others.

You may be wondering why I have started upon this subject; perhaps it seems very much out of the way just at present, when on the one hand we are in a holiday season, and on the other hand great new thoughts and anxieties and troubles are driving the everyday things from our minds. But it came into my mind the other day that, after all, our whole life is very much like a school, and this strange, dreadful time we are in is just a great examination. We call it a time of trial—yes, a time which will try what you and I really know, not of book-lessons, but of the great lessons of life which we have been learning every day since we came into the world. How often we have been told that it is best to be cheerful, to look on the bright side, and not to grumble or complain when things go wrong! I expect we should all say that we knew that lesson quite well; but are we going to prove, in this great examination to-day, that we really do know it? We can only prove that, remember, by acting upon our knowledge, by actually being cheerful and sunny-hearted and contented. Perhaps we shall have some very hard questions set us in this subject, and some strange new “problems” to work out by this rule; but think how splendid a chance it is to show that the lessons of all the past have not been wasted!

Or, again, you and I have been taught again and again that, in Jesus' words “It is more blessed to give than to receive”; that it is not what we get and enjoy for ourselves, but what we give, or share, or do to help others, that really makes life happy and beautiful. That is a hard lesson, and I am afraid there are very few of us who, on trial, would be found to know it perfectly. But is not this a chance to give at any rate the best answer we can? In these days, when there is so much trouble all around us, we all can do something to help other people, and we must do it, unless we are to fail altogether at this point. Some of us can actually give up some of the things we have, whether it is money or other possessions; most of us can do without some of the new enjoyments we should like so much; and every single one of us can help, as we were told in this column a week or two ago, by making a little sunshine for somebody else. You see, the point is, not what kind of problem is set us to answer, but how we answer it—whether we are able to use our great rule of life when it comes to the point.

The story is told of Giotto, the great Italian painter, that once a messenger was sent to him from the Pope, who wished to find a worthy artist to decorate his palace at Avignon with frescoes. The messenger was bidden to ask for specimens of painting which might prove Giotto's powers. The painter took a brush and a black canvas, and, with one sweep from the elbow, he drew a perfect circle, and he gave that to the messenger as his sample of work. The Pope understood, and called Giotto, for a princely fee, to do the splendid work he wanted. The great artist was able, you see, to prove all his knowledge and his powers by drawing one very simple figure—just an ordinary circle, but it was perfect. “As round as Giotto's O” passed into a proverb, and a very good motto it is for us to-day, reminding us that we may put all we know of goodness and kindness and love into the least little duty that comes our way. Says Ben Jonson—

In small proportions we just beauties see,
And in short measures life may perfect be.

It is well to remember this, because for some of us there will only be very “short measures” to fill, and we may be tempted to wish we had some great work that we might be doing—how well we could do that, we think! But we may be very sure that until we can answer the easier questions creditably we are not likely to be given the more difficult ones.

So far we have been speaking rather as if examinations simply went to prove our own knowledge, and to win praise for ourselves. But you and I know it is not so, at school or in any other place. Don't we work and do our best so that our school, and our teachers, and most of all our home people, may be glad and proud because of us? Why, the very best part of doing well is the knowledge that they are pleased—just as failure hurts most because it hurts them. We feel that for the sake of all those who have worked for us, and taught us, and loved us we must come out of our trial well; we must give them pleasure that shall pay back, if so it may, a little of all they have given to us. And it is the same now, in this great trial-time of our lives. Father and mother, home, church, guild, Sunday-school, day-school, teachers, and friends—they are all looking on to see how we shall come through. They have tried to give us the great lessons of life all these years, and now we are to prove ourselves that we know them. We are indeed “compassed about by a great cloud of witnesses” to see how we run our race—some living, some gone before, but all seem to be watching us now. And above them all watches the great Father, the Teacher of teachers, Who gave us life and love and power to learn, Who has taught us every day, in ways that we are only now beginning to understand, and Who waits to see if we shall meet our trial as His scholars and children should.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

MR. EDWARD CARPENTER ON THE BREAK-UP OF EUROPE. REPLY TO BIRTHDAY CONGRATULATIONS.

On the occasion of his seventieth birthday, August 29, Mr. Edward Carpenter was the recipient of a letter of congratulation signed by a number of well-known workers in the field of literature and social reform. The signatories expressed their gratitude to Mr. Carpenter for the message of fellowship and gladness which has been given to all classes of people in England and other lands through his books, and for the earnestness with which he has called them back to the vital facts of Nature; the need of simplicity and calmness, of just dealing between man and man, of free and equal citizenship, of love, beauty, and humanity in our daily life. Mr. Carpenter sent a delightful and characteristic reply, from which we give the following extract:—

“At a moment like this when Europe is plunged in a monstrous war one naturally does not wish to dwell on one's own affairs. Yet some of us who have worked for thirty years or more in connection with the great Labour Movement at home and abroad may perhaps be excused if we cannot help looking on the strange events of the last few weeks in a somewhat personal light. For those events surely connect themselves by a kind of logical fatality with that very Labour Movement. They seem to point to the break-up all over Europe of the old framework of society, and (like the Napoleonic wars of a century ago) to bear within themselves the seeds of a new order of things.

“Insane commercial and capitalistic rivalry, the piling up of power in the hands of mere speculators and financiers, and the actual trading for dividends in the engines of death—all these inevitable results of our present industrial system have now for years been leading up to this war; and in that sense indeed all the nations concerned are responsible for it—England no less than the others. But the mad vanity of the Prussian military clique, and its brutal eagerness for imperial expansion at all costs, have precipitated the fatal move. The German Government is now involved in a conflict which the more socialistic section of its population absolutely detests, and for which its masses have little desire or enthusiasm; it is alienating from itself the loyalty of the warm-hearted and very human and brotherly folk whom it professes to represent; and is sowing the seeds of its own destruction. Curiously enough, too, by supplying the Russian Autocracy with an excuse for gratifying its lust of conquest an excuse which is welcome, no doubt, as a means of discounting the revolutionary movement at home) this action of Germany is destined to lead to a disorganisation of Russia similar to that which awaits herself.

"On the other hand, the same action has already caused an extraordinary and astounding development of solidarity and enthusiasm among the more pacific peoples of Western Europe—this partly no doubt in sheer self-defence, but even more, I think, as an expression of their hatred of militarism and bullying Imperialism. The enormous growth during the past few years of democratic and communal thought and organisation on the Continent generally is well known; and the events of which we are speaking have suddenly crystallised that into definite consciousness and into a fresh resolve for the future—the resolve that never again shall the peoples be plunged in the senseless bloodshed of war to suit the ambitions or the private interests of ruling classes. Furthermore, in Britain, where, for so long, the forward movement has seemed to hang fire and fail to define itself, we have developed—most swiftly and in almost miraculous fashion—a whole programme of socialist institutions, and (what is more important) a powerful and democratic sentiment of public honour and duty.

In view of all this it is impossible, as I have said, not to hope for a great move forward—when this present nightmare madness is over—among the Western States of Europe towards the consolidation of their respective democracies and the establishment of a great Federation on a Labour basis among them; as well as to expect a sturdy reaction, perhaps amounting to revolution, among the Central and Eastern peoples against the military despotism and bureaucracy from which they have so long suffered. In both these directions, in aiding the Federation of the democracies of the West, and in hastening the disruption of the military bureaucracies of the East, England—if she rises to her true genius, and to a far grander conception of foreign policy than she has of late years favoured—will have a great work to do. Nor is it possible to doubt that the new order thus arriving will largely be the outcome of those years of work all over Europe in which the ideal of a generous Common Life has been preached and propagated as against the sordid and self-seeking Commercialism of the era that is passing away."

THE VACATION TERM FOR BIBLICAL STUDY. MEETINGS AT OXFORD.

THE Woman's Vacation Term for Biblical Study was held this year (by kind permission of the authorities) at Somerville College, Oxford. It will be a time never to be forgotten by the students, owing to the breaking out of the war. It was a strange sight to see peaceful Oxford,

"Sweet city with her dreaming spires," full of preparations for war. Territorials marching through her streets and in possession at Balliol, Keble, New College, and Christchurch, though in quiet walks in college gardens, or in the Christchurch meadows, it was still difficult to believe that what perhaps will be the greatest war in the world's history had begun. Sad it was indeed to hear so often in the lectures the names of German scholars, and to remember that England and Germany were at war.

The term lasts for three weeks. Each week two courses of lectures are given, closing with a conversation class, at which the students are allowed to ask the lecturer questions. Besides these there are two, sometimes three, single lectures, and Greek and Hebrew readings. All lectures and readings treat from different points of view one subject, that taken this year being "The Vital Relation of Personal Religion to the Life of the Church": e.g., in the second week Dr. Anderson Scott dealt with "The Religious Experience of St. Paul," while Professor Kirsopp Lake lectured on "Life within the Christian Communities in the First and Second Centuries." He began with the Galilean period, with the day that Jesus left the synagogue in Galilee, and went to preach on the hill side, or by the sea shore; passing on to deal with the life of the Church of Jerusalem, and with the life of the Church as it came in contact with the Roman Empire and the Mystery religions. He closed by drawing a picture of the Church of Rome as we see it in the contemporary literature of that Church, I. Clement and the "Shepherd of Hermæ."

Three lectures on the "Personal and Corporate Life of the Early Church" were prepared for during the first week by lectures by the Rev. W. F. Lofthouse on "The Book of Ezekiel," and by a course from Dr. A. H. McNeile on "Personal Religion in the Old Testament and the Gospels." The lectures during the last week were on "The Relation of the Individual to the Community," by Mr. C. C. J. Webb, and on I. and II. Corinthians by the Rev. S. Kirshbaum. Two lectures by Dr. Sanday on the "Evolution of Religious Thought" were of special interest. He dealt in the first with the early stages of religion and in the second with (1) Religion in a pre-scientific age, (2) Religion in a scientific age. As can be seen by the names of the lecturers, "the scheme is on a Christian basis, lecturers being invited apart from the consideration of their special religious position." The same is true of the students. Here the Nonconformist and the High Churchwoman study side by side. The difficulties of religious education seem to have vanished for the time.

WE desire to call the attention of our readers to the Hymn in the Time of War and Tumult, by Henry Newbolt, which has been set to music by Mr. H. Lang Jones, headmaster of Willaston School. Mr. Lang Jones has a gift for music which rings with stirring melody and martial vigour, and has made a remarkable success of the choral singing at Willaston School. Noble songs can be an endless source of help and inspiration in our homes at a time when many other things have become a little difficult. The "Hymn in the Time of War and Tumult" is published by Messrs. Weekes & Co., 14, Hanover-street, W., price 2d. The proceeds are for the National Relief Fund.

AMERICAN VISITORS IN LONDON.

Service at Essex Hall.

ON Sunday morning, August 30, a religious service, specially arranged for American visitors in London by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was held at Essex Hall. Part of the devotional service was taken by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Secretary of the Association; the Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, minister of Arlington-street Church, Boston, U.S.A., led the congregation in prayer, and preached an exceedingly helpful and interesting sermon dealing with the European crisis. Mr. Frothingham's discourse was based on the story in the Book of Exodus of the Tables of the Law broken by Moses because of the sin and tumult of the people, and then later re-hewn and re-written after ascending the mount of vision. The break-down of civilisation in Europe might well cause men to become despondent and cynical, but that was not the mood in which to face either the present or the future. The laws of righteousness, peace, and brotherhood would be carved deep in newly-hewn stones in the coming days. Treaties made between nations would then become as inviolate as the spoken or written word of the most honourable individuals was at present. The higher thoughts, better feelings, and nobler aspirations of the peoples of Europe would assert themselves more effectually; and government by the people for the people would have a deeper and larger meaning than in our generation. In announcing the collection, which yielded £29, Mr. Bowie said:—"May I explain that the collection which will be taken after the sermon by Mr. Frothingham will be devoted to assisting Austrians, Belgians, Germans, Hungarians, and other foreigners in distress. America is at peace with all the countries of Europe, as well as with England, and naturally we have no wish to say or do anything here that would in the slightest degree be contrary to the spirit of universal brotherhood. We are happy to believe that nothing will occur to break the peace which has existed for 100 years between the United States of America and England."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Booth.—The following resolutions have been passed by the members of the Unitarian Church:—That this congregation: (1) Pledges itself to support relief measures, by weekly offerings placed in the boxes for the purpose—the amount being fixed by the individual's goodwill and capacity to pay. (2) Urges the Ladies' Work Society to meet at an early date, and give expression to our communal views in the matter of relief work. (3) Requests the minister to furnish a weekly report of the proceedings of the Local Committee of the National Relief Fund.

Brighton.—Special week night services are being held from time to time at Christ Church, which attract a considerable number of visitors as well as the regular congregation. At the last of these on August 27, the Rev. Priestley Prime gave an address on "Can we save Civilisation?" and a collection of over £14 was taken for the Prince of Wales' Fund. The local branch of the Women's League has met, with other helpers, five days a week in the Lecture Hall, to make garments for the wounded.

Gee Cross.—The following appears in the Calendar of Hyde Chapel for September:—"The war is a direct challenge to our faith. It is a time for constant and fervent prayer. Now, if ever, we must prove the power of the Christian religion to fortify the soul against the demoralisation that war brings, and prepare the way for a speedy and lasting peace. Let us remember 1900, and pray God that we may keep at bay the war-passions alike in defeats or victories. To this end we have invited our members to read a chapter from the Bible each day. For the first week Romans xii. was chosen, second week Isaiah lv. third week Ephesians vi. The chapter is announced each week from the pulpit. In addition, at 9.30 p.m., the chapel bell is rung, inviting all to think of our absent ones, of our comrades fighting on sea or on land, of all in anxiety and distress, and thus thinking to repeat the Lord's Prayer. Further, a short service will be held each Wednesday evening at 8.30 p.m. in the Chapel. The response to this appeal shows how great is our opportunity if we have faith to labour unceasingly."

Ilford.—The schoolroom of the Unitarian Church presented a busy scene on Wednesday evening. A few words of earnest appeal for the Belgian refugees the previous Sunday brought numerous parcels of clothing. Members of the congregation had ransacked their wardrobes and the result was a constant stream of gifts, which were all carefully sorted and packed and forwarded to the Belgian Refugees Committee. The response was so generous as to be almost overwhelming. At 8 o'clock the busy workers joined other members of the congregation in the church for a short service of intercession and then returned to their labour of love.

Lewes.—The balance sheet of the fund which was raised to meet the cost of alterations recently effected at Westgate Chapel has just been issued. It shows that after paying the expenses, £661 13s. 9d., a balance of £8 19s. 4d. remains. Hearty thanks are given to all the donors.

London: Essex Church.—The Rev. J. H. Weatherall, M.A., of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, has accepted a unanimous invitation from the congregation of Essex Church to undertake the sole ministry of the Church on the resignation of the Rev. F. K. Freeston, which takes effect at the end of the year.

London: Islington.—During the present crisis a short devotional service will be held at Unity Church on Wednesday evenings, at 8 o'clock. A generous response has been made to Mrs. Tudor Jones's appeal for help in working for the Red Cross Society, and a sewing circle, with 50 members, meets in the Preston Rooms on Monday evenings at 7. The collections in aid of the Prince of Wales' Fund on August 16 amounted to £43 16s.

London: Kentish Town.—The Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, of Arlington-street Church, Boston, U.S.A., will be the preacher at the Clarence-road Unitarian Church, Kentish Town, on Sunday evening, September 6, at 7 p.m. We may add, for the benefit of American or other visitors to London, that the church is near the tube station, South Kentish Town.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

NEWSPAPERS FOR THE FLEET.

The London Chamber of Commerce has undertaken a very useful piece of work in collecting and distributing newspapers and periodicals to the Fleet. Cut off as they are from all communication with their friends at home, and forced to maintain their long vigil in complete ignorance of what has been happening on land, there is nothing our sailors will welcome more eagerly than these bundles of papers which will help to relieve the tedium of watching. Mr. F. Faithfull Begg, chairman of the Executive Committee, writes that a supply of daily papers of current dates to an extent sufficient for present requirements is now in sight, but there is still room for a further supply of weekly newspapers. The London Chamber of Commerce has no corporate funds out of which the necessary outlays can be defrayed, and contributions may be sent to Mr. L. A. Martin, hon. treasurer, 1, 2, and 3, Oxford-court, and 97, Cannon-street.

THE FUTURE OF "THE VINEYARD."

Much regret will be felt by the friends and supporters of the Peasant Arts Fellowship movement at the announcement that The Vineyard is to be temporarily discontinued. After four years of active service on behalf of the people, in the course of which it has laboured for the very foundations of Peace, it must face, together with many other periodicals devoted to similar aims, difficulties resulting from the war which none of us contemplated less than six weeks ago. These difficulties are for the moment insuperable, but it is the earnest hope of those responsible for its publication that The Vineyard may be revived in an enlarged and improved form early next year. It has worked on the lines of the Peasant Arts Fellowship, a society of those who believe in the spiritual and economic necessity for the restoration of simple country life and craft, and has gathered round it a band of writers from other lands who have been drawn together by their common faith in the people of the soil. An earnest appeal is made to those who have found help and inspiration in its pages to help on its work by joining the Peasant Arts Fellowship. Inquiries should be addressed to the secretary at 17, Duke-street, Manchester-square, W.

CHILDREN'S SUNDAY IN AMERICA.

Children's Sunday, the main object of which is to bring the church and its Sunday school together in at least one formal service annually, was first given a place in the calendar of the American churches in 1857, when the Rev. Charles Hall Leonard, then minister of the Universalist Church at Chelsea, Mass., instituted it. The idea was adopted among the churches in Boston and the vicinity, and five years later it was generally observed in that neighbourhood. Ten years later at the session of the General Convention at Baltimore, it received formal recognition, but the institution had by this time spread to the churches of other denominations. In 1868 the Methodist General Conference recommended the setting apart of the second Sunday in June as Children's Day, and in 1872 made its observance a law of the Methodist Church. In 1883 the same step was taken by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, the Congregationalists took similar action about this time, and other denominations followed suit. It has now become an established thing.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MANY of us have been convinced for a long time that Mr. Asquith's name will occupy a high place among the great Prime Ministers of England. The whole nation feels it now. The speech which he made at the Guildhall last week was marked by the simple massiveness of treatment, the fine political instinct, the indignation and the moral sublimity which the occasion demanded. He spoke for the country and the world will listen. In a splendid passage, which should be written in letters of flame in every patriot heart, he said: "What account should we, the Government and the people of this country, have been able to render to the tribunal of our national conscience and sense of honour if, in defiance of our plighted and solemn obligations, we had not done our best to prevent, yes, and to avenge, these intolerable wrongs? For my part, I say that sooner than be a silent witness, which means in effect a willing accomplice of this tragic triumph of force over law and of brutality over freedom, I would see this country of ours blotted out of the page of history." The speech closed with the memorable words of the younger Pitt: "England has saved herself by her exertions and will, as I trust, save Europe by her example."

MR. ASQUITH'S speech was something much greater than an appeal for recruits. It gave great expression to the faith and affection which are filling the hearts of our young men, as they press forward to serve their country, ready for every sacrifice which may be asked of them. We doubt whether in all the centuries of our glorious history we have had a more splendid and moving spectacle than this of our boys, in the midst of a peaceful and happy life, eager to go where danger calls. There is not a trace of personal ambition or flashy sentiment in what they are doing. It is all so quiet, so steady, so irresistible. They know their duty, and they mean to do it. They are lifted above all care for themselves by patriotism, one of the noblest sentiments which ever glows in a human breast. The God of all grace and glory go with them where they go, and with the mothers who sit at home proud and happy to have borne such sons.

It is just the voluntary nature of this response to the country's call which is a source of pride and strength to us. It makes the plea for compulsion, which some of the obstinate fanatics of conscription continue to advocate in the press, a little absurd, and throws deserved discredit upon every form of artifice to force men to enlist. A letter which we publish to-day from Principal Mellone shows that some enthusiastic people are trying to shame divinity students into becoming soldiers. We agree with him that this is a mistake. Our power is in our willingness. At the same time we should be sorry to give any countenance to the idea that the theological colleges ought not to provide as large a percentage of men as any others. If anything, the sense of duty, the readiness for the supreme sacrifice, ought to be keener there than elsewhere. If it is right for any young man to go, it is equally right for the student of divinity to go. And for him it will be a far less serious interruption to work than in the case of the young doctor or lawyer. He will be training for his special calling all the time. If he looks up at the stars from the trenches and risks his own life to save a wounded comrade, he will probably learn in a few months more of the primary virtues of the ministry, its discipline, its self-sacrifice and its unflinching courage, than in years of leisurely study.

THE Daily News of Tuesday contained a striking article by Archdeacon Lilley on the Labour Movement and the War. His wide knowledge of foreign thought and the unswerving consistency of his democratic sympathies give force and fire to his words. "I fear I am a little impatient," he writes, "of phrase-making about justifying 'the policy leading up to war' when the democracies of France and Belgium are being strangled, when the very existence of those little nations to which the Labour Movement owes its best thinkers and most energetic champions, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Switzerland, is at stake. One would have thought that if the 'International' ever had a meaning, now was the time to prove it, now that Marcel Sembat and that old lion of uncompromising Socialism, Jules Guerde, are members of a French Ministry of National Defence, now that 'l'Humanité' and Gustave Hervé himself, yesterday the inspired prophet of anti-militarism, are preaching every morning the national crusade against the enemy of the human race, now that Vandervelde, since Jaurès' death the greatest and most honoured Socialist in Europe, as one of the Ministers of a martyred nation, is bearing the tale of its martyrdom to the great democracy of America. These men cannot be accused of being militarists. They are fighting militarism with their back to the wall."

ARCHDEACON LILLEY'S article concludes with the following prophetic glimpse into the future: "With the victory of Germany, even if incomplete, we return perforce to the cynical and inhuman diplomacy of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. With her decisive victory we move forward into a barbarian Empire, to a Germany enthroned in Western Europe with enslaved and soulless nations about her feet. We are fighting for the hope of a regenerated Europe, of a League of States bound together for the prosecution of greater conflicts and the solution of more difficult problems than those which war can ever decide or solve. Now we know that till the Prussian idea, incarnate in the German body, is broken by the righteous wrath of offended nations, that League can never be formed. Hard necessity has decreed the cost at which the next step forward towards human right must be won. All of us can feel the terror of our mighty Fate. I should have thought that the organised Labour forces of this country would have been the first to feel the thrill of its hope."

ON Wednesday evening the Westminster Gazette published long extracts from an appeal to "Evangelical Christians Abroad," which has been prepared by a group of German theologians and is being circulated in neutral countries and elsewhere. Among those who accept responsibility for it by their signatures are Professors Harnack, Eucken, Deissmann, Kaftan, and several others. It is a long document, but it is singularly ineffective for its purpose of presenting Germany to the world in the guise of the injured lover of peace, in spite of a good deal of pious sentiment which may be accepted as quite sincere, if indeed the high and severe virtue of sincerity is possible to a state of mind so confused in its thinking and so ready to grasp at even the weakest plea of self-justification. The whole thing strikes us as the confession of men who, whatever their personal desires may be, know that Germany, whose "ideal was peaceful work" and who "desired to thrust no one from his place," has a very weak case.

BUT the crucial passage, by which the manifesto as a whole must be judged, is the one dealing with the violation of the neutrality of Belgium in defiance of the pledged word of Germany. It is as follows:—

"Unnameable horrors have been committed against Germans living peacefully abroad—against women and children, against wounded and physicians—cruelties and shamelessness such as many a heathen and Mohammedan war has not revealed. Are these the fruits, by which the non-Christian peoples are to recognise whose disciples the Christian nations are? Even the not unnatural excitement of a people, whose neutrality—already violated by our adversaries—could under the pressure of implacable necessity not be respected, affords no excuse for inhumanities, nor does it lessen the shame that such could take place in a land long ago Christianised."

UPON this passage the Westminster Gazette makes the following comment:—"This passage bears internal evidence of having been invented by some official special pleader and foisted upon the theologians, or we should be compelled to stigmatise it as a peculiarly shameless invention for ministers of the Gospel. We greatly prefer Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg's blunt admission that Germany was doing wrong." We confess that it does not appear to us any more 'official' than many other sentences which come before and after. But in any case the theologians have endorsed it with their signatures, and we hardly know whether to wonder more at the intellectual blindness or the moral stupidity of the whole passage. It is the old story of the wolf and the lamb. In libelling the innocent people whose country they had decided to invade German professors deceive nobody but themselves. It will be observed that there is really no attempt at justification of a singularly disgraceful proceeding; it is merely the stale appeal to "implacable necessity." Their honour rooted in dishonour stands. Those who slur over the initial step in this way make themselves accomplices, whether they will or no, in all the atrocious things which have followed. Germany's career of crime in Belgium has a certain grim consistency about it. "Necessity knows no law."

FROM the terrible conclusion that these German professors have set their hands to this vile creed there seems to be only one way of escape. It has been suggested to us that a careful examination of the list of names throws doubt upon the genuineness of the whole document. This is a point which cannot be settled till the war is over. If it can be shown that the names of men whom we have held in honour and affection have been used without authority by an unscrupulous press bureau, we can hardly describe what an immeasurable relief it will be to many minds.

* * *

WE have received more than one rebuke for the severity with which we handled the German intellectuals last week. We are not in the least surprised. We were quite prepared to be told that we had sinned against good taste and a becoming moderation of tone. Possibly it is a useful thing, if not altogether pleasant, that THE INQUIRER should startle its readers sometimes, and do its part in forcing quiet, educated people to face the naked issues of right and wrong to which our idolatry of culture often makes us almost criminally blind. In the past we have used equally stern and uncompromising language about the misdeeds of countries with which most of us feel few bonds of friendship and sympathy. But righteousness is no respecter of persons. Turkey and Germany will be weighed in the same balance. We should make short work of any apologist for atrocities in Bulgaria or Armenia. We cannot feel less scorn for those who invent excuses for Germany's crime against Belgium, though they may happen to be among the most cultivated men in Europe.

* * *

AT any other time the election of a new Pope would have excited a good deal of interest, but Cardinal della Chiesa, who has become Benedict XV., will probably have his policy and his plans fully matured before the world has time to recognise that there is once more a diplomatist at the Vatican. A writer in the Westminster Gazette, who has had exceptional opportunities of estimating the gifts and sympathies of the new Pope, believes that France and Belgium will find in him a staunch friend in their hour of trial. It also assures us that, like Leo XIII. and Cardinal Rampolla, he is a sincere admirer and supporter of England, and has always frankly stated that Catholics have the fullest freedom and protection throughout the British Empire.

THE following sketch of the personal characteristics of Benedict XV. is taken from the same article:—

"He is dark-complexioned, with a firm mouth, square forehead, keen, lustrous, brown eyes which miss nothing, about the ordinary standard in height, and moves and walks with great dignity. There is nothing slipshod about him in style, or dress, or work. Unlike Pius X., his saintly predecessor—who to the end of his days was a simple, open-handed, parish priest, who loved a gossip with a peasant far more than a function in his Palace—the present Pope is first and foremost a thoughtful and highly gifted man of affairs, without prejudices, but a man who knows his own mind. His marvellous memory and rare gift of sifting grain from chaff, his charm of manner and melodious voice, his powers of literary expression and of marshalling facts and arranging them in order of relative value, have always impressed those who have had dealings with him in Madrid, Rome, or Bologna. To these must be added a dislike of vulgar display or publicity, a love of art and music, a genuine simplicity of life, a devotion to the interests and work of the Church which is untiring, a zeal and industry which exacts from others service not less laborious than the standard which he rigorously imposes upon himself. It would be untrue to describe the Pope as a great orator or preacher. He is, however, clear and forcible in his public utterances, and has the precious gift of knowing when to stop."

 Next week we shall publish a special article by Archdeacon Lilley, written at our request, on "Christian Morality and the War."

OURSELVES AND OUR CRITICS.

FOR several weeks we have had to write about the war and the vital issues which it has created for the nation. We had hoped now to be able to turn aside to the quieter but not less necessary task of ministering to personal and collective faith at a time when people need to feel the quickening power of the presence of God, His light in their conscience, His strength in their will. But certain letters which we publish to-day show that our first duty is to push our line of argument home. From one point of view we do not regret these letters, for they seem to us the complete justification of what we wrote last week. We meant our words to rouse and to sting in quarters where the high decisions of conscience were in danger of being weakened by the enervating habits of a sheltered intellectual life. There is not a word which we wish either to modify or to retract. We did not write hastily. Everything was carefully weighed. We intended our message to be plain, stern and uncompromising, as befits men who stand at the centre of a colossal human tragedy.

Some of our correspondents make it a ground of complaint that we have changed our point of view. In a sense that is perfectly true. We hope that we are alive and not dead. Like many other people we have learned much during the last few weeks. The situation is not the same as it was even a fortnight ago. Terrible new problems have confronted us. Our moral perspective changes from day to day. We know better now than it was possible for us to know at the beginning what this war is going to cost us, how stern we have got to be with ourselves in crucifying our affections and ridding ourselves of crippling indecision. But in another sense we have not changed at all. We believe still in the same invincible principles of righteousness. We place our trust in a Divine love which can redeem to the uttermost. We even venture to hope that when the days of peace come again we may be able to recover some of the pleasant things of culture, which have now retreated into the dim background because they are relatively insignificant, though we are not the victims of the delusion that it is likely to be on the same terms of intellectual devotion or with quite the old abandon of heart. But we have realised, as we think our critics would do well to realise, that the best service which can be rendered to German culture at the present moment is to cease to talk about it. For the time being it has become quite unimportant. We are living far too intensely to have any inclination to listen to conventional platitudes in its honour. If a man stayed to talk about philosophy and scholarship while a ruffian was outraging his wife and murdering his children in the next room we should be filled with intolerable moral disgust. That is a precise description of the present situation. We are watching the crucifixion of a nation, and some people seem to feel the horror, the world-confounding wickedness of it so little that they can still talk about German culture in the same breath. One of our correspondents tells us that he could weep over these horrors. Tears, idle tears! unless conscience is raised to a white heat of indignation, in which everything that weakens the moral protest is consumed and forgotten. That is what we mean by the intolerance of conscience. We do not believe that it is possible to have a virile and inspiring Christianity on any other terms.

We think it is also necessary to warn our readers against the rather placid view of the German people which our correspondents seem still able to accept. It is the view of a very small coterie of philosophers and theologians with which we have long been familiar. It is no more representative of Germany as a whole than the talk of an Oxford common room represents the mind of England. The time has come for discarding academic spectacles and facing facts as they are. Germans are not dumb-driven sheep, the helpless victims of a system of which they disapprove. They are all part of the system, and have contributed of their thought, their obedience, and their ambition to its effectiveness. We hear a good deal too much in some quarters of the machine, as though it were a kind of impersonal force, and far too little of the millions of people who compose the machine and devote their whole strength to keeping it going. The men who are committing these atrocious crimes against the Belgian people are the fathers, the sons, and the brothers from nice German homes. They cannot do these things without taking their share of the indelible shame of them back with them to mother and wife and child. It is the very soul of Germany that has received a mortal wound. In saying this we are not conscious of the slightest tinge of racial hatred. It is to us a matter of unutterable pain that it should be so. Perhaps our knowledge of Germany and the German spirit is as good as that of our correspondents. Perhaps our memories and affections are at least as long as theirs. But wise men will accept the bitter facts just as they are, extenuating nothing and setting down nought in malice, and they will devote all their efforts not to the salvage of culture but to the salvation of souls from the bondage of wickedness, without which culture is one of the vainest and most corrupting of human possessions.

"After the war nothing will be the same as before." For this sentence we are also taken to task. But is it not literally true? Did anything remain the same as before in France after the Revolution and the Terror? Does anything remain the same as before in our private affairs when life has been shattered to its foundations and we have dwelt in hell with our own sins or those of another soul? We come forth on the further side of disaster new men in a strange world. We shall not be able to go about when the war is over picking up the broken threads of friendship as though nothing had happened. We shall not find our pleasant asylums of culture waiting to receive us as soon as the grass has covered the graves of our dead. Affection will take a long time to recover from its wounds. It will be a stern and terrible world which will need the ministries of thought and love, if it is to be remade with all the lessons of the war wrought into the tissues of its life. Men in future ages will date the death of many delusions and the emergence of new forms of life from the passing of the great war. Nothing will be the same as before. It is useless either to hope or to desire it. But this does not mean that we need waver in our confidence in a redeemed world, and in a redeemed Germany as part of a redeemed world. We have never written a syllable to impugn or weaken that faith. But history teaches us that the divine purification of a nation is often a matter not of years but of centuries, and that children bear the sins of the fathers to the third and fourth generation. But, be the divine work quick or slow, only those can be worthy to take part in it who have not shrunk from the uncompromising sternness of moral indignation and the swift decisions of moral action. The healing pity of CHRIST is inseparable from the Wrath of the Lamb against every form of iniquity.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE eyes of the Lord are upon them that love him. He is their mighty protection and strong support; a defence from the heat, and a shelter from the sun at noon; a preservation from stumbling and a help from falling. He raiseth up the soul, and lighteneth the eyes; he giveth health, life, and blessing.—Ecclesiasticus xxxiv. 16, 17.

"ENGLAND has saved herself by her exertions and will, as I trust, save Europe by her example."—William Pitt.

"THE RIGHT GOES MARCHING ON."
THE Hands wherein the sparrow falls, that beckon to the Star,
Are Hands that harness unseen dooms to Wrong's triumphal car,
And the steeds untiring draw the nations trembling to the Bar—

And the Right goes marching on!
Then, if perchance a nation's Soul from out her shame shall rise,
And light of Justice kindle fresh within her chastened eyes,
The God who dooms shall save her by the pain that purifies—

And the Right goes marching on!
Lo, the flowers are all a-blossom, and the grasses are a-wave
Where the bodies of our hero dead are sleeping in the grave:
So shall beauty crown salvation through the Hands so strong to save—
And the Right goes marching on!

W. C. GANNETT.

As Christian men we must confess that War is an evil, a curse. But if it be a curse, as Christian men we must utterly refuse to let it go, until we have wrestled out of it a blessing. . . It becomes us to consider whether even War have not its pearls. Has it not some hidden good? Not one that we run after, that we should rush into War for—but, War being thrust upon us, can we not extract its blessing? . . .

Should a brave man even ask God for peace at all, until he has loved justice and truth first? "First pure, then peaceable." Never hope for such "peace, where there is no peace"; never ask for it, never wish for it! May there be in the world discord, as long as there is wickedness; until the leaven of righteousness has leavened the whole lump. . .

We thank the Lord that amid the sins and iniquities of the battlefield flowed out the old faith in the forgetfulness of self, the victory over self. It is part of our creed to love good wherever we find it . . . to hold righteousness to be ever of the Lord, wherever it comes; and to be always the more glad to pick a pearl from out the dunghill. Let not, therefore, the war, and the men that fight therein be robbed of the brave, good things they do.

And let us bless God for another fruit of the common suffering. Pleasant it is to see all ranks of men joining without stint to do their part; that throughout the length and breadth of the land runs one common spirit, one common devotion; we all seek the best way of relieving the suffering . . . and knowing our past, do it. Let us pray that the oneness of the people may remain, that they may be one grand family, holding their distinctions, but never suffering Party to break down the oneness of the Nation—that terrible Unity of the Bundle of Life and Death.

That is a lesson which peace does not teach. In the days of peace each man is living too much for himself; he preaches the philosophy of selfishness, caring for his neighbour nothing, shutting himself up in his little world, knowing nothing beyond. But up comes a brave, stout spirit within him and others. The wall that hedges in the little world is broken down; party distinction is blotted out in war time, and men find that in the presence of reality—in the face of a great common danger—our little lines of latitude and longitude perish. . . These little lines are found to be small utilities in small daily life, but not realities. . . Let us, therefore, hope that the terrible hand of war, rooting us up so much, and changing the face of the world, will blot out some of these lines that have gone down too deep; and let us feel that we are still children of one household, sons of one God, united together for the good of the old land. . . Let us feel that we are bound together for life and death—one great living heart, beating for righteousness and truth; and we will bless and praise Him whose right it is, out of man's works to bring forth His glory; and we will magnify His holy name that chose this time for the doing of these things. . .

Let us pray God that our men may never lose their courage, until they bring their hearts, with their swords, to Christ's altar, and offer them up a sweet sacrifice to the Prince of Peace. May the sword of England never lack strength and sharpness until they can lay it on the altar and say, Now the Prince of Peace hath given us His Peace, and we fear not War any more!

GEORGE DAWSON.

[These words were written in 1854.]

O LORD our God, under the shadow of Thy wings let us hope. Thou wilt support us, both when little, and even to grey hairs. When our strength is of Thee, it is strength; but when our own, it is feebleness. We return unto Thee, O Lord, that from their weariness our souls may rise towards Thee, leaning on the things which Thou hast created, and passing on to Thyself, who hast wonderfully made them; for with Thee is refreshment and true strength. Amen.

ALMIGHTY God, the refuge of all that are distressed, grant unto us that, in all trouble of this our mortal life, we may flee to the knowledge of Thy loving-kindness and tender mercy; that so, sheltering ourselves therein, the storms of life may pass over us, and not shake the peace of God that is within us. Whatsoever this life may bring us, grant that it may never take from us the full faith that Thou art our Father. Grant us Thy light, that we may have life; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE SUMMONS.

THE strong note sounded in THE INQUIRER will find an echo in many hearts. You do not propose that the Liberal Churches should raise a regiment and send it to the front; but were such a thing possible it would do no more than give effect to the admirable spirit of your article on the Moral Ultimatum. It is interesting to speculate on what the influence would be on the "prospects" of these churches. Since the thing is impossible it is futile to enlarge upon the matter; but I cannot refrain from expressing my feeling that it would do us more good than a century of organisation and propaganda.

In affirming that we are confronted with a moral ultimatum, I think you are essentially right. My only fear is lest we should fail to realise what a moral ultimatum is. It is not a problem to be discussed: it is a challenge to be met with all the resources of the spirit and all the might of the will. When a moral ultimatum is delivered there is no more talking; the sword of the Goodwill (which it does not carry for merely ornamental purposes) simply leaps out of its scabbard. One of those rare moments in the history of nations has arrived which reveal the truth hidden in the old saying, "The Lord is a man of war." Do we sufficiently realise that however long we may live we shall never be faced with a greater moral crisis than this? Those who are deaf to the call of public duty now may rightly be judged incapable of hearing it under any circumstances whatsoever.

Of the many appeals to the religious spirit recently made only one seems to me to be relevant to the facts. It is the appeal for a complete self-surrender to the good cause. The crisis is one which calls for the last proof of good citizenship—which is “that a man lay down his life for his friends.” No piety touches the need of the times so long as it stops short of this application. The merely contemplative spirit, however loftily instructed, will either break down in despair or end in affectation unless it is reinforced by the resolution to resist unto death. There is no other way of dealing with a moral ultimatum. Especially should we be on our guard against seeking consolation in those elastic solutions of the problem of evil which stand ready to gloss over everything that comes, no matter whether it be the death of a fly or the massacre of Louvain. Moral ultimatums reveal such theorisings in their true character of ineffable humbug. They show us that there is such a thing as a bad will in the world. And just because it is bad it will listen to no arguments, no reason, no pleadings; its refusal to listen being the very essence of its badness. We read in the story of the German massacres that if any of the poor captives ventured to plead that mercy should be shown to a woman or child he was immediately shot. That is the answer of the bad will to reason, and the spirit of it, fostered by poisonous philosophy, is at the back of this war. It brings argument to the end of its resources, and summons us, in language there is no mistaking, to act. If we hang back from the summons the memory that we did so will undermine our faith in the moral order for all time to come. The men who take their lives in their hands and offer them for the service of this holy and unescapable conflict are at this moment doing more than all the preachers to confirm our faith in God.

Like Mr. Dowson, I loathe war. But what I loathe with a thousandfold intensity—and I am sure he agrees with me—is the spirit which claims the right to stay at home in peace and enjoy all the blessings of culture and happiness in defence of which braver men are shedding their blood on the battlefield. We can all respect the man who, on Christian grounds, refuses to fight. But who can respect the man who, while refusing to fight himself, is willing enough that other men should fight for him? If war is detestable, that spirit is infinitely more detestable. Far be it from me to boast of valour, but my conscience would be far more at ease if at this moment I were in the trenches with the brave boys, with Mr. Dowson on one side of me and the Editor of THE INQUIRER on the other—where I know they would be only too glad to be. As we gather in the quiet of our churches on Sunday, as we look at our happy families, as we return to our comfortable studies for reading and reflection, let each of us remember that all this peace and security is being purchased at this very hour by the blood of gallant men—and remembering that, let us hold our tongues, for the present, about the wickedness of war. The Uhlans have not yet stabled their horses in our churches, or burnt the leading members of our congregations alive in their houses, or used the children in our Sunday schools as a screen against the enemy's fire, or blown the chapel of Manchester College into a heap of ruins—and, please God, they never will. But if they did—well, we should find it necessary to revise our notions about many things. For example, I venture to think that Mr. Cyril Flower's letter in your last issue would not have been written. Mr. Flower's former contributions to THE INQUIRER have appealed to me so strongly that it gives me pain to realise the depth of my disagreement with what he has written in your last issue. I am sure that he has expressed only half his mind. The notion that God has, so to speak, washed his hands of the whole dirty business of the war and left Europe to stew in the juice of its own wickedness is to me appalling. If God has no part in this war he has no part in anything whatsoever, and I refuse to acknowledge his presence either in the majesty of the starry heavens or in the mother's love. The other day I saw a regiment of clean-limbed, honest English lads going to the war, and as I looked on the beauty of their self-devotion a ray of God's sunlight seemed to break from the darkness. It was no more than an impression, but it gave me unspeakable comfort, for it made me feel the presence of something vast and noble and triumphant rising up in antagonism to the forces of the devil. Mr. Flower has recorded his impression; let me record mine! I am confidently expecting that before long we shall see “God's errand executed on the wicked,” but I believe that he has entrusted its execution to our hands. As Cromwell wrote in that splendid mood of exaltation that came to him on the terrible night before Dunbar, “We are in the Mount; and in the Mount the Lord's hand will be seen.”

CULTURE AND MORAL POWER.

SIR,—Now that many German philosophers have, as we hear, expressed their intention of renouncing the honours and degrees lavished upon them by British universities (a childish act quite consonant with the not-yet-grown-up attitude of Germany at the moment), perhaps the long-suffering lay mind may venture on a word of protest. It may be unfair to say, as so many are saying, that the contentions of these men are made invalid by their present temper and utterances. But as their “culture” and enlightenment have failed utterly as a moral force at the crucial opportunity; as they proudly bolster up with their “intellectualism” an ideal which shocks the whole civilised world; as side by side with the imperial and military worshippers of brute force they make an “idealism” of war and pan-Germanism as against the idealism of Christ; we can hardly wonder if the plain man questions the efficacy of their writings in the sphere of religious ideals. When he sees how the “ethics” of Nietzsche work out in actual practice, and the doctrine of the Superman, carried to its logical conclusion, affects the world and himself, it is not surprising if he (in the outer darkness of the non-philosophical mind) lumps Nietzsche and the rest together, and refuses any longer to have the dull solemnities of German philosophical argument presented to him when he craves for the stimulus, the practicality, the motive power, the personal insight of real religion. He remembers, it may be, that when Jesus gave that spiritual stimulus to the world against which Nietzsche raved maniacally, he did not spend precious time in discoursing on the body of thought left by Plato, nor on the ethics of Aristotle, nor on the super-seding of the academic arguments of his own ecclesiastical contemporaries. He had something else than this to do; and interesting as it is, mentally, to mark the course of philosophic thought, the plain man, now more than ever, will look to his religious teachers for something other, something deeper and more inspiring, than philosophy—something that teaches him that love, not hate, is victorious, that only he who loses his life saves it; that the eternity of “Blessed are the peacemakers” sounds on when the Treitschkean shriek of “Blessed are the warmakers, for they shall be called, if not the children of Jahve, the children of Odin, who is greater than Jahve,” has long disappeared into the silence of forgotten things.

It does not require the prophetic gift to know that this war, cutting down like a knife between our past and our present, will change everything; and this holds true of the theological world. There may be a great reaction towards religion, in the general horror of this recrudescence of barbarism fostered by anti-Christian philosophy. If so, may our pulpits be ready for it; eager to take the current when it serves. But they must be filled, not by philosophers, not by academic disputants, not by men pre-occupied with immaterial things; these will not serve in a new world sick of illusions. They must be filled by saints; and saints who, having themselves penetrated into the Holy of Holies, can come out to us and tell us what they found there.—Yours, &c.,

THE MORAL ULTIMATUM.

SIR,—Doubtless it was a surprise to others as well as to myself to see the sudden change of front presented by THE INQUIRER in its last issue. May I ask, on what grounds do you condemn the teachings of men like Harnack and Eucken? Can you point out that there is anything in their teaching which is unchristian? Are you sure that Harnack and Eucken did say what they are supposed to have said? You are by this time aware of the falsehoods scattered over the world by the Vossische Zeitung—a third-rate journal, published at the very centre of the “lying factory of Berlin.” A Japanese professor has just reached London, and he informs me of Eucken’s great grief concerning the dissensions caused by this war. This professor was in daily contact with Eucken from the beginning of August to the 20th, arriving in London on the 26th. We hear a good deal from you about the evil influence of Nietzsche’s teaching. No one has condemned that teaching more than Eucken; and Haeckel is too gentle a spirit to have any sympathy with it. But Nietzsche’s teaching is only a fragment of the influences which have led to this war. The time has not arrived to analyse these causes, and certainly it has not yet arrived to pass sweeping generalisations on men who hate war as much as we do, and who have endeavoured in their writings to lead individuals and nations away from love of power and insolence to goodness and love of enemies. This is exactly what the writings of Harnack and Eucken have attempted to do. That they have failed is not their own fault, but is the result of forces which have been operating in contrary directions for over half a century.

By all means let us not make war on literature. Your opinion with regard to the work of the best German type of mind is not borne out by such eminent thinkers as Bradley and Ward in England, Boutroux in France, Lossky in Russia, and Royce in America. I emphasise again that this literature has nothing to do with this war. Literature is international, and your attempt to parcel out the literature of Europe and value it in the scales of the motives which led to this war is doomed to failure.—Yours, &c.,

W. TUDOR JONES.

Highbury, N.,

September 8, 1914.

[The suggestion of our correspondent that the opinions of Professors Harnack and Eucken which have been published to the world are the inventions of a lying press seems to us improbable. If their names had been used without authority they could at once have administered a stinging rebuke. If, however, this should prove to be the case, what we said last week would surely meet with their approval. It simply amounted to this, that compared with goodness and the actions by which goodness is either honoured or defamed, scholarship and philosophy, even as represented by the highest names, are as the small dust in the balance. We have always held that to be one of the elementary principles of Christianity. May we also point out to Dr. Tudor Jones that in any reference we may have made to literature we were thinking of the great books which ennoble and inspire a nation and are dear to the popular heart. We know of course that Germany teems with specialist studies which other specialists tend to admire with exaggerated reverence;

but these things are not literature. Since 1870 Germany has not produced a noble literature like that of France, rich in significance for the world, and we are coming to see more and more clearly the moral cause of this defect. In spite of its loudly trumpeted fame, the German culture of the last generation has been a strangely limited and one-sided thing.—ED. OF INQ.]

SIR,—Since my return from Germany and Switzerland, I have, amongst other things, read with some care the issues of THE INQUIRER published since the outbreak of war. If you will permit me to say so, I have admired the spirit which has animated your paper, and felt almost entire sympathy with it until I read the article in your last issue under the heading, “The Moral Ultimatum.” In that article, I confess, there are things which, it seems to me, cannot be allowed to pass without protest, though, heaven knows, this is no time for controversy or criticism. Still, will you permit me to have my say?

At a time like this it is fatally easy to let passion blind our eyes and prejudice and destroy our perspective, and in any circumstances it is a dangerous and, I believe, wholly unchristian thing to preach the utter, blinding “intolerance” rampant in the article to which I refer. Such a gospel, even though it be illuminated by the high-sounding phrases of a genuine passion, hardly seems to accord with the teaching of Him who bade us love our enemies! It is one thing to realise the deadly seriousness of the issues at stake; it is a totally different thing, and an evil thing, to vilify a whole nation, even though that nation is the German one, and to speak as if the possibility of redemption did not exist. Have you not not fallen into the easy confusion of charging the whole German people, past, present, and to come, with the mistakes—if you like, the crimes—of a section of it? Do you really believe that this war has the approval of the whole German nation as such? Is there no pitiful element of compulsion present somewhere, no suggestion of a hated despotism, that was fast losing all power, taking its last maddened fling? Personally I think there are these things present: I believe there are multitudes of German men and women who hate this war from the bottom of their souls, and hate still more the Prussian tyranny that is behind it. The militaristic system of the Hohenzollerns is not Germany, and there is much in the present situation of that unhappy country which should call forth the pity rather than the conscientious intolerance of all good men. Because of a terrible mistake, because of a hideous disease, which has now to be destroyed by force, are we to forget all that is and has been valuable in German life? If our friend were stricken with a cancer that required the use of the knife, should we straightway forget his good qualities, and treat him ever afterwards as a polluted and degraded monster? Evil as may be the condition of Germany to-day, hideous and ghastly as may be the militarism that has infected her, I, for one, cannot forget that she has made imperishable contributions to the culture of the world, given nobly and wonderfully to philosophy, to poetry, to music, and to scholarship, and though to-day I would take arms against her, it would be with the prayer in my heart that she might be redeemed (and, along with her, the rest of the world) from her accursed disease, and yet rise to the noble level of her destiny foreshadowed by the life and work of the great men and women who have, in the past, adorned her history and aided the salvation of mankind. I do plead that, in the “intolerance of conscience,” we should not forget these things. “Nothing,” you say, “will be the same as before.” Is that really so? If it is, then, for all our boast of a Christian conscience, we run the risk of becoming as evil as the worst of our enemies. I pray that much will be as before, that all the indubitably good and valuable elements in German life and culture may emerge purified and freed from disease, and remain a perpetual blessing to humanity. Amongst these valuable elements there may even appear some of the lightning flashes and strange burnings words of the hated Nietzsche! Who can tell? After this, you will probably refrain from paying me “the feeble compliment of a pretended tolerance.” Well, I cannot help it; I will go with you so far, but no further; I will pay the price of Christian allegiance to the uttermost, but I will not participate in your boasted intolerance, I will not forget the debt I owe to German thought, the joy I have received from German learning and culture. I could weep over these horrors, as I might weep if I saw a brother or a friend dragged down into the pit of hell. And, in conclusion, I cannot help wondering what you would say if the German people rose in revolt against the tyranny that is now revealed in all its brutality, and thus at one stroke ended this war and freed their better self. There are many things far more unlikely than that.—Yours, &c.,

STANLEY A. MELLOR.

Liverpool, September 8, 1914.

SIR,—I am one of those who, as you say, “detect an unpleasant note of exaggeration” in some of the things you have given us in THE INQUIRER, and especially in this latest number. Detesting the brutalities in Belgium and the wickedness of war, may we not still believe there is some good in the German nation? A month ago it was generally asserted that we went to war to liberate the great mass of the German people, as well as others, from the dominance of the Prussian military oligarchy: the excellent message signed by the Presidents of the National Conference and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which I was glad to read to my congregation, spoke of “millions of men who had no grudge against one another being driven to mutual carnage by small groups of statesmen.” Is there any reason to suppose that Professor Eucken is one of these statesmen, or that he is responsible for the Louvain horrors? The philosophy with which Eucken has "deluged the world" as you say (though I believe THE INQUIRER has spoken more respectfully of it in past times) was in opposition to the intellectual influences in Germany which you deplore. Why should not Englishmen seek for explanations and a better understanding? In Germany this war is being proclaimed as a "holy war," not in England only, and many believe that its object is to protect civilisation from Russian barbarism with which Britain has joined. Is it wrong to try to dispel an illusion? Shall no one use the weapons of reason and humanity? We do no good by ignoring the debt the world owes to German people in scholarship, music, science, and social organisation. There will be a time after the war when, if we have crossed the Rubicon and left the Beatitudes behind us, we may want to return and pick them up again. The article, "The Moral Ultimatum," seems to put you, or the writer, on the side of Napoleon—not that of Christ. Remember that England had her attack of race conceit and superiority to morality in the Boer war, but England was not wholly evil. The argument seems to be—Some Germans have committed atrocities: atrocities are detestable: therefore all Germans are detestable. That is bad logic and worse morality. The tide of hatred is beginning to rise. Those who want to keep the nation from animal passion and disintegration will do, well to keep head and heart in unison, and strengthen those bonds of humane brotherhood which have been rudely strained but not broken by war.—Yours, &c.,

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

Brighton, September 7, 1914.

SIR,—Those who belong to the small group of men and women whose attitude is described in the first paragraph of your leading article this week—how small they are realising with ever-deepening sorrow in the loneliness of their hearts!—owe you sincere thanks for the generous way in which you have referred to their position, although it is one which you personally cannot accept. In the great battle against the forces of evil wherever they are at work, in the depths of our own nature not yet free from atavistic instincts as well as in the souls of men who are the declared enemies of our beloved country, we are, indeed, banded together for the defence of righteousness and justice. The only difference between us lies in our methods of combating "the world rulers of this darkness." To be compelled at a period of national crisis such as none of us have ever had to face before to refrain from giving our whole-hearted encouragement to men of magnificent bravery, who are ready to lay down their lives for their country's honour, or to those who are helping to gather in recruits for the Army throughout the length and breadth of the land, must at times cause some of us acute mental distress. But it would involve us in far greater agony of mind if we were found disloyal to the essential teaching of Christ, as we understand it, when so much more is at stake than even the safety of our country—if we were to lose faith in the spiritual forces which can alone end war, not by actual fighting in the physical sense, but by removing the causes which lead to war—if we were to take sides with such passion as to forget that God is neither a respecter of persons nor of nations, but the Father of the whole human race and the Maker of worlds beyond number. We, too, have received our "moral ultimatum," and though we may go down to the grave defeated, the ultimate triumph of the ideals for which we labour is assured. Moreover, we believe that if we are true to the voice of conscience at all costs, we no less than the patriot shall lay a not unworthy offering on the altar of freedom to which so many noble hearts are consecrated to-day.

The new Pope is said to have written at the end of August to the vicar of Bologna, where he was then Archbishop: "I would regret if any parish priest should take sides for one or the other belligerents. I have done my best to propose that we pray to God for the cessation of the war, without dictating to the Almighty the way in which the terrible scourge may cease." And, again, during a conversation before his election, when he repeatedly declared the necessity of the Pontiff intervening with an appeal for peace, he said: "The Pope must actually place himself amidst the combatants, instead of keeping away and preaching peace and concord from a distance." If for "parish priest" in the first paragraph and "the Pope" in the second we substitute the word "Christian," we shall have some indication of the attitude, by no means a negative one, which should, we humbly think, be taken by those who are true followers of Jesus. Can we, seeking to serve him who forgave his enemies even on the cross, possibly enter upon the hideous work of slaughtering our fellow-men—and to condone the slaughter is to share it though we never see the battlefield—with his words of love upon our lips? May I quote, if space will permit, the following passage from Origen written in answer to Celsus at a time when martyrs were perishing for their adherence to the Christian faith: "Then Celsus afterwards urges us to help the Prince with all our strength, to relieve him in his just quarrels, to fight with him, to bear arms under him, and, if he calls upon us, to assist him in the conduct of his armies. Now it may be said as to this, that we do as occasion requires assist our princes, taking up (if I may so say) divine assistance and the whole armour of God. And these things we do, obeying the voice of the apostle when he says, 'I exhort you therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks should be made for all men, for kings, and for all that are in authority.' And by how much any is the more godly, by so much the more efficient is he in helping princes than are those soldiers who go forth to their armies and slay whomsoever they can of their enemies. Besides which, we may say to those who are strangers to the faith, and who require us to fight for the common good, and to slay men: that even those among yourselves who are priests of certain images, and have charge over the temples of those whom ye esteem gods, keep their right hand undefiled, and may on no account enlist in the army. . . . Yea, we rather fight manfully for the Prince whilst we do not engage as soldiers under him though he urge us to do so; but we fight for him, training our own camp in righteousness, through continual communion with God."—Yours, &c.,

THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES AND THE WAR.

SIR,—I should like to have an opportunity of expressing a sense of the value and timeliness of your recent utterances on the moral and spiritual, as well as the national, significance of the struggle in which our country is now engaged. At the same time I ask your permission to speak of another, though a closely related, subject. The more I see the significance of this struggle, and the just claim of the country on the services of her sons, the more do I feel the utter unworthiness of some of the methods now being adopted to induce young men to enlist. I speak of this in a connection which closely concerns many of your readers. There are persons in what is sometimes called "our own household of faith" who think fit to fling taunts of undutifulness and cowardice at young men who, having sacrificed other callings to devote themselves to the work of the ministry, and being in full course of preparation for that work, do, in fact, think it right to go on in the pathway to the calling which they have chosen, and therefore do not enlist. I do not hesitate to say that such taunts are a disgrace to the men who utter them, and an insult to all our theological colleges and to the ministry as a whole. I honour the man, in whatever calling, who acts because he feels it to be his duty to give himself to a branch of national service if he can pass the tests; but—to put it on the lowest ground—is this the time to take a course calculated to make men of spirit feel that greater courage is required not to enlist?

Of the implied insult to the ministry I will only say this: In the common round of diffused strife and turmoil which we call "peace," it may be easy for many to live without God in the world; and the Church may seem a mere social convenience, if not a useless excrescence on civilisation. But in these world-upheavals which search the hearts of men and nations, crying human needs are felt far and wide, which the Gospel of the Living God alone can satisfy. The demand on the ministry for the highest type of service was never greater than it is now; and in the years which lie before us that demand will become more insistent and more searching.—Yours, &c.,

S. H. MELLONE,

GERMAN CULTURE AND THE WAR.

SIR,—As a lover of German philosophy and all the thought that has been stimulated by the great German students, may I suggest that there may be truths learnt in the war which will largely affect abstract reasoning? Philosophy means nothing unless it is a philosophy of life. The writings of the recent philosophers can be read only by a limited number of even intelligent people. The phraseology and the references are quite beyond any ordinary practical thinker. Is it not possible that under such conditions the thought itself loses its value, being out of relation with everything with which it proposes to deal? For instance, we must take now into account:—(1) The effect upon the brain centres of concerted action under one master mind, who, having a fixed aim of his own, leads other minds almost unconsciously in the same direction. (2) The effect upon character produced by the immediate physical response to a word of command or to some extraordinarily strong sense stimulus. (3) The conscious demand for some eternal refuge when sudden danger is apparent, showing the justification of many old-fashioned religious phrases which we had supposed the nation to have outgrown. (4) Eventually, the effect upon artistic production of a great national stirring of the blood-vessels of the brain as well as of the body. The analysis of causes by the individual thinker (while carrying us safely along the line of truth for a time) has always been subject in nature's history to tremendous upheavals from which it has emerged purified.—Yours, &c.,

ANNIE J. LAWRENCE.

THE WOMEN'S LEAGUE AND THE WAR.

SIR,—In your issue of August 29 appeared a somewhat misleading notice under the heading of "Women's League" which has evidently produced misunderstanding, and has led to Miss Withall's criticism on League methods of help. On the same page, however, is a "Note from Essex Hall," in which it is stated clearly that material for garments is only sent from Essex Hall to those congregations in and near London that wish to help through their sewing societies, but who cannot possibly raise the money to pay for the necessary material. Miss Withall's letter, however, deals with a wide question much to the fore just now, namely, the rival claims of paid and voluntary work. I am not concerned now to argue the pros and cons as to the condition of splendid idleness which to many seems the only reasonable position for every woman who has a banking account on which she can draw a cheque, or has even a spare half-crown in her purse, but who has not as yet secured a footing on one of the numerous committees and organisations, new and old, now at work. There is, also, no need for me to press the claims of the unemployed seamstress, for I believe that there is far more help being given in this way quietly and privately than is perhaps realised by those who put all their faith in organisation. But, between the woman who can pay wages and the one who must needs receive them, is a vast company, ranging from the woman who, although she may have servants for the housework, always from motives of economy does a great deal of her own sewing, and who certainly cannot now increase her wages bill, to the woman who, though not actually earning money, has to do herself all the work required for her home. These, too, are anxious to help in England's need, and they are skilled workers; are we to say this to them: "The nation needs this work that you wish to give, but it must only be done in return for money. The price that you can pay, the sacrifice of the scanty hour of leisure, or the effort by more strenuous labour to win a spare half-hour out of an always busy day, this is no fair offering. Money alone should be given, and you must stand aside." Again England is asking great sacrifices from the mothers now. When a woman has given of her best and is left, sick with anxiety for perhaps months to come, is she debarred from the natural relief to this heartache, the taking part herself, in however small and humble a way, in the struggle to which she has given her son? Are we to meet her yearnings for action with the cold statement: you are not dependent on your sewing, therefore you must pay someone else to do it or leave it alone? Surely it would be taking a wider view of the nation's needs and her people's hearts to say instead that the lack of money shall not stand in the way of their craving to give. The Women's League is proud to think there are many people of this sort throughout its branches, and the Committee, in following Mr. Bowie's lead, and offering them what help it can, has endeavoured to do a little to strengthen their hands.—Yours, &c.,

EMMA G. DRUMMOND,
Chairman of the Women's League Committee.

NONE of Mr. Kipling's poems is better known than the "Recessional." Written in 1897, its success was instantaneous; it has been used in churches throughout the world, but it is not to be found in the ordinary hymn-books. To meet a demand which has become greater at this time, Messrs. Methuen are issuing the poem in a separate form at one penny, and also on leaflets (for church use) at a low price. "Hymn before Action," by Mr. Kipling, is also being issued by Messrs. Methuen at one penny.

THERE is such a demand for Mr. Charles Tower's book, "Germany of To-day," in the Home University Library, that it is impossible to satisfy it immediately, but Messrs. Williams & Norgate are preparing a new edition, which will be ready in a few days. Mr. Tower, who is at present acting as war correspondent, has had the advantage of many years' residence in Germany, and describes in his book the aims, constitution and government of the various States comprising the German Empire.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

"CULTIVATE YOUR GARDENS."

WHAT gardens? Not the little plots where we grow flowers and vegetables, and which, in this dry weather, we have to water every evening. These are very nice and very interesting, but just now our minds are full of bigger thoughts. And it was something much, much bigger and more important that the great French writer was thinking of when he said "We were all to 'cultiver nos jardins.'" There has never been a moment in history when it has been more necessary that our gardens should be found well cultivated than at present. For they are the gardens of our character; the gardens where, when we are young, we sow all kinds of seeds. The grown-ups help us all they can, and call it "education." They show us, when we are quite small, what will be the best things to put in (for every bit of soil is different, and wants its own special treatment); they tell us how we are to guard them against all that may destroy them, just as we have to protect our plants against slugs and snails and earwigs, and even the dear birds; and how we have to be always busy pulling up the weeds that will come up and try to choke the flowers. They tell us how careful we must be to get hold of them by the roots, else they will quickly grow again, and they tell us to be patient—especially the littlest ones—and not to go poking about in the earth a week or two after we have planted our bulbs or seeds to see if they are growing. They promise us that, if we will be content to wait without seeing anything for a long time, but go on diligently watching and watering and weeding, the time will come when our little garden will be a blaze of beautiful flowers, some of which will, perhaps, go and gladden sick-people's bedrooms, or—if we have planted humbler things—will put fresh, wholesome vegetables on someone's table. And, as we get older, we find out lots of things for ourselves, by experience, and try little experiments which the grown-ups don't always approve of, but which teach us a great deal, even when they turn out badly.

Now do you see how it all applies to our characters? It seems to me that this terrible war is like a general summons to all the men and women, not only of England, but of many other countries as well, to show how they have cultivated the gardens of their character. If they have spent years of care and toil upon them, they are amply repaid now. Everywhere we see beautiful flowers springing into life—flowers of heroism and self-sacrifice, of patience and endurance—and we may be very thankful that so many of our English people have sown and planted so carefully that now, when the time has come for the Master of the vineyard to demand the fruits, they are not found empty-handed. Every soldier and sailor who goes bravely and calmly to his post, every mother and wife and child who sends him with a smile and a glad word, are showing that they have cultivated their gardens.

But not everyone has fruit and flowers ready for gathering. Some are found with bare and desolate gardens, all overgrown with weeds. And it is too late for them to do anything now; that is the pity of it. If you did not put in your bulbs in the autumn, how can you expect a gay show of hyacinths and daffodils in the spring? And if people in childhood and youth—the seed-time of their lives—have never cultivated self-control or hardihood or courage, which require years to grow and ripen, how can they expect to display them when harvest-time comes?

So I want you to realise how supremely important it is for you girls and boys to be diligently cultivating your characters now. When the actual test comes it will be too late to begin. You will simply be cast aside as useless—a branch that bears no fruit, a mere cumberer of the ground. How any one of us behaves in the hour of sudden danger depends entirely on how we have behaved in the peaceful years that have gone before. You know, in a great crisis there is no time to think what you will do, to say to yourself, Now I must be brave, I must keep calm, and not lose my head. You can't calculate or plan, you must act on instinct, and if years of self-discipline have not made it your first instinct to think for other people, and help them, you will find yourself among those despicable cowards who, in shipwrecks, trample others' underfoot in order to get into the boats first, or, in war, moan and grumble at its privations, if they do not actually turn their backs on the enemy when under fire.

There is no lesson which God teaches us more plainly, whether in nature—which is His garment—or in our own lives and experience, than that nothing worth having ever comes into being suddenly, or without long and secret growth, often accompanied by struggle and pain. Think of the parables of Jesus—the sower, the leaven, the mustard seed. Think of his own life, thirty long years cultivating the garden of his character before he even began his work, and revealed to us the perfect life which is the pattern for us all.

The testing time has come for the men and women of England. It is for her boys and girls to see to it that they are so cultivating their gardens now that, when their turn comes, they will not be found wanting, but will be worthy successors of those who are now yielding generous fruit to be reaped by the awful sickle of war.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Bolton: Bank-street Chapel.—The congregation at Bank-street Chapel has received with much regret the communication from its minister, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, M.A., intimating his desire to terminate his ministry on December 31 next, in consequence of his having accepted the pulpit of Essex Church, London. During Mr. Weatherall's stay at Bolton the happiest relations have prevailed between pastor and congregation, and both Church and Sunday school alike have continued to enjoy great activity. Mr. Weatherall has been in Bolton ten years, and in a message to the congregation has intimated that the change is due to a strong conviction on his part that long ministries are irreconcilable with the continued prosperity of any congregation. The resignation has been regretfully accepted, and the following resolution has been sent to him from the congregation:—"That this meeting of the Bank-street congregation, now hearing from its beloved minister of his acceptance of a ministerial appointment in London, desires to send to him, on behalf of the congregation, a message of affectionate regard and goodwill. For a period of over ten years this congregation has been privileged to enjoy the spiritual leadership of its present minister. In his care and under his guidance the church has grown in numbers and in religious strength, a sense of brotherhood throughout the congregation has been inspired, and the service of its members to religious and civic causes has been encouraged and stimulated. With so much accomplished, and in such happy relationship, this congregation would have desired for many years to co-operate with its minister and with Mrs. Weatherall in new activities. Recognising that the prospective change has been due to a high sense of duty, and believing that its minister is entering into larger opportunities for the service of the Christian Church, it accepts his message with affectionate regret, and conveys to him its earnest hope that in his new sphere of labour he and his family may be strengthened in courage by the memory of happy association with this church and congregation."

Clifton.—The members and friends of Oakfield-road Church are arranging to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of the church for divine service in 1864 by a public meeting on October 3, when addresses will be delivered by Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, the Rev. Herbert Morgan, the Rev. Lewis Johnson, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, Dr. G. F. Beckh, Dr. W. Blake-Odgers, K.C., and others. On the following day Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter will conduct the services in the church where he was ordained and was the first appointed minister.

Kendal.—On Tuesday, September 1, the Rev. H. V. Mills was among the speakers, who included the High Sheriff, the local Member of Parliament, and the Mayor, at a largely attended meeting in the Market Hall, when addresses were given on the present duty of the public in reference to the war. Several members of the Unitarian Chapel and Sunday school have enlisted in the Army, and the women of the congregation are busy making articles for hospital use.

Liberal Christian League.—The Islington Branch will open its session on Thursday, September 17, at 8 p.m., at London College, 409, Holloway-road, opposite Nag's Head, when Dr. Lionel Tayler will speak on Industrial and National Efficiency. Friends invited.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The following is taken from the Sheffield Unitarian Monthly Record for September:—"There was some slight question as to whether we ought to hold harvest thanksgiving services while Europe is being torn with fratricidal strife. But the ladies, at their meeting on the 18th ult., when consulted on this point, with one voice properly demanded that the services should be held as usual. What right have we to suspend them when the harvest is itself unailing? Rather is there special reason at this time for thanksgiving to God that the harvest is so abundant. God's work is good and reliable, however evil man's may be. He must not be held accountable for trampled corn fields and desolated homes. But there certainly is reason for less expenditure on the decorations than in an ordinary year." It is announced that the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Crooker, of America, will be the preachers at the thanksgiving services on Sunday, September 13.

Tenterden.—The 252nd anniversary services were conducted at the Unitarian Chapel on August 23 by the Rev. Thos. Van Ness, of Boston, U.S.A., whose visit was very heartily appreciated.

Warrington.—The Rev. Irvine Lister, of Manchester, has received and accepted an invitation to Cairo-street Chapel, and began his ministry on September 6. Mr. Lister was trained for the Congregational ministry at the United College, Bradford, and was formerly in charge of a Congregational church in Yorkshire. He received the certificate of the Advisory Committee of the Lancashire and Cheshire Provincial Assembly early in the present year.

Woolwich.—The first religious service in connection with the reorganised Woolwich and Plumstead Unitarian congregation took place on Sunday evening, September 6, in the temporary meeting place, the Lecture Hall over the Royal Arsenal Society's Co-operative Stores in Herbert-street, Plumstead. The Rev. D. Delta Evans, who has been in charge of the congregation for nearly twelve months, was the preacher, and there was a good congregation.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

CHILDREN IN WAR TIME.

There are many victims of the war, the Daily News and Leader points out, among the children who are leaving or have recently left school. Usually their labour is much in demand, but this is no longer the case, and in one instance which is given, out of 260 children on the register only half are in work. Thousands are therefore left at the most critical time of their lives with no occupation, to amuse themselves in the streets and acquire there undesirable habits which may spoil their whole career. Something ought to be done to protect boys and girls from this danger, and it would be well if all who are on the point of leaving school could be kept there until those who have just left are in employment.

NORMAN ANGELL AND THE EUROPEAN CRISIS.

No one who has really penetrated to the central truth upon which Norman Angell's theories are based will share the opinion of many people at the present time that the movement which he represents has failed. On the contrary, it is more certain to be recognised in the future by thousands who have hitherto given no thought to it whatever than it would have been had not the great conflagration which has set Europe in a blaze broken out. From the moment when war was proclaimed events have followed step by step the path which he has repeatedly foretold, and when this war is over the task of those who have adopted his ideas will be to drive home the lessons which are being learnt through such terrible suffering at the present time. One thing is certain, as he has pointed out in the Daily Mail, that civilisation, and the economic interdependence of nations, has rendered it impossible "to push home military force with the old ruthlessness for the purpose of destroying the nationalities of others."

* * *

"If all the preponderance of force," he goes on, "which men of small nationalities, like the Alsations or the Irish or the Finns, have had to face has failed in its object (as it has), it is certain that the destruction of France, for instance, is impossible of accomplishment. Whatever may be the future place of the Slavs, Teutons, French, or English in the world, this war is not going to settle it or seriously to affect it, except to render the condition of all more barbaric. We may inflict or bear atrocious suffering, but when it is all over we shall see that it is as futile to settle problems of nationality and racial culture by war as an earlier generation found it futile to settle religious rivalries by that means."

SALE OF ALCOHOL PROHIBITED IN RUSSIA.

According to a Petrograd correspondent the war will certainly give an enormous impetus to the temperance movement in Russia. The diminution of crime and rowdiness produced by the prohibition of the sale of alcohol, which has been provisionally prolonged till September 14, has been so obvious to everybody, it is declared, that the Government is being inundated with petitions from local representative bodies demanding that the interdiction shall remain in force till the end of the war, and even for all time. The women of the country are stated to be taking the leading part in this propaganda. Judging from statements by the Minister of Finance, it would appear that the extension of prohibition, at any rate till peace is concluded, has been practically decided upon, and that after that a comprehensive scheme of local option will be put into operation.

THE TEMPERANCE CAMPAIGN IN LONDON.

In spite of the counter-interest in the war, the open-air summer campaign conducted under the auspices of the United Kingdom Alliance in London in August has proved singularly successful. The seriousness which the war has engendered has tended rather to quicken and deepen interest in the temperance question. Forty meetings per week have been held, and the community and the Alliance owe a debt of gratitude for splendid devotion and unflagging zeal in carrying them through in all parts of the Metropolis. The points driven home were the great benefits of total abstinence, restriction of hours, and prohibition, which the action of the nations at war has brought into prominence. Hundreds of pledges were taken, and at a most successful week's open-air mission at Hammersmith about thirty men took the "War Pledge," which was binding only so long as the war lasted. It is hoped that the result of their experience will be so satisfactory as to induce them to keep on with their pledge in time of peace. At two great meetings of working men in Fulham resolutions in favour of restricting the hours of sale of intoxicants during the war were passed unanimously.

THE WORK OF THE HUMANITARIAN.

"Has all the work of love and mercy been of no avail?" asks Dr. Hadwen, reviewing the present situation in the Abolitionist. "Has the progressive work of humanitarian feeling, of which we have boasted so frequently, come to a tragic end? . . . Or, after all, is not the God who rides above the war-cloud working out the destinies of the nations, and fashioning His own purposes out of the reckless madness of ambitious War Lords? Such temporary aberrations of mind and reason have resulted ere now in gigantic, far-reaching issues of good and blessing in the world's great battle fields. The very fierceness of the passions let loose in armed conflict is apt to recoil upon itself, and to lay the foundation for a fresh start along the path of peace, and a call to tread it with chastened and subdued souls. . . . History will doubtless repeat itself in the present campaign, and humanitarians must wait in calmness and patience until the thunders of battle are over, and the reckoning day of the aggressor has come and gone. Our own particular work, so far as its aggressive character is concerned, must be delayed, and it will be for us to consolidate our forces against the day when peace is declared in the councils of political state-craft."

THE FABIAN SOCIETY AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

The Fabian Society has issued a new tract by Sidney Webb, entitled, "The War and the Workers: Handbook of some Immediate Measures to Prevent Unemployment and Relieve Distress." It contains a series of detailed proposals for carrying out the declared policy of the Government with regard to the prevention and relief of distress which is arising through the war. A large number of suggestions are put forward with regard to the kinds of work that could be put in hand at once, together with a statement of the powers and duties of the authorities, central and local, which should undertake such work. Amongst other useful information is included a full list of the various central committees appointed by the Cabinet Emergency Committee to deal with unemployment and distress. Advice is also given as to the various activities in which voluntary workers can usefully take part. This tract will be of special value to members of the local committees for the prevention and relief of distress, trade unionists, co-operators, and members of social organisations. Copies are to be had from 3, Clement's Inn, Strand, W.C.

By JOHN DENDY,

Author of Successful Life: A Series of Essays.

This book is concerned with certain great questions which lie behind all forms of religion and with which all forms of religion are more or less closely bound up.

The questions are such as these: "What are we?" "Is there such a being as God, and if so, what is His nature?" "How are we related to God?" "What is the nature of this universe in which we find ourselves?" "What do we mean by such words as 'Matter' and 'Spirit'?" "What is the meaning and object of our lives?"

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

SIR EDWARD GREY'S vigorous answer to the charge of the German Chancellor that England would never have interfered to defend Belgian freedom against France will be a salutary rebuke to people—there are some of them still in our own country—who believe that our plea of honour was only a stalking-horse for ulterior designs. No doubt there are foreign men of affairs who are so incapable of understanding our sentiment on matters of this kind that they either denounce it as hypocrisy or dismiss it as quixotic and unreal. But it is still one of the moving forces of our public life. It is the determining moral factor in the present war. It is just this element of sacrifice for the sake of principle which has raised the whole contest to a noble level, and given the sanction of religious faith to the effort and the terrible suffering which are demanded of us.

THE answer to which we refer seems to us so important that we reproduce it here. It is contained in a statement issued this week with the authority of the Foreign Secretary :—

“ ‘ Does anyone believe,’ asks the German Chancellor, ‘ that England would have interfered to protect Belgian freedom against France ? ’ The answer is that she would unquestionably have done so. Sir Edward Grey, as recorded in the White Paper, asked the French Government ‘ whether it was prepared to engage to respect the neutrality of Belgium so long as no other Power violates it.’ The French Government replied that they were resolved to respect it. The assurance, it was added, had been given several times, and had formed the subject of conversation between President Poincaré and the King of the Belgians.

“ The German Chancellor entirely ignores the fact that England took the same line about Belgian neutrality in 1870 that she has taken now. In 1870 Prince Bismarck, when approached by England on the subject, admitted and respected the treaty obligations in relation to Belgium. The British Government stands in 1914 as it stood in 1870 ; it is Herr von Bethmann Hollweg who refused to meet us in 1914 as Prince Bismarck met us in 1870.”

* * *

As we feared, the circumstantial stories of atrocities are increasing rapidly. The things that are undoubtedly true are so horrible that most people have little difficulty in believing everything else. Once again we must warn our readers against the dangers of credulity, and the subtle aggression of the state of mind which almost demands lurid tales of cruelty for its daily food. We must be careful to discriminate between charges which are clearly based upon evidence or vouched for by persons of repute, and sensational paragraphs in the newspapers. At the same time, we cannot deny that the whole situation has become painful and disquieting in a high degree. The official document of charges which has just been issued by the Belgian Government is terrible reading, and cannot, we fear, be dismissed simply as the product of an over-wrought imagination.

IN all the circumstances we think that there is urgent need for careful inquiry into these sporadic stories of atrocities, apart from the larger and more public crimes like the sack of Louvain which are generally admitted. Of course, such an inquiry would be all the better if it were completely free from the suspicion of national bias. Lord Selborne's suggestion in a letter to the Times is an admirable one. Would it not be possible, he asks, for trained lawyers or judges belonging to a neutral nation like the Netherlands or the United States to conduct a sworn inquiry into such cases as are already open to investigation ?

AN article “ After Victory ” by Maurice Maeterlinck appeared in the Daily Mail on Monday. None of us can remain unmoved as we see how the iron has entered into the soul of the gentle writer who gave us “ The Treasure of the Humble ” and “ The Blue-Bird.” He pleads that we must not flinch from realising the horror of what is going on while we are in the midst of it. “ We are face to face with reality now ; let us look at it well, and pronounce our sentence ; for this is the moment when we hold the proofs in our hands, when the elements of crime are hot before us, and shout out the truth that soon will fade from our memory.” He also pleads that blame attaches to Germany as a whole, and rejects the plea that the unfortunate German people are “ merely the victims of their monarch and their feudal caste.” But running all through the article there is a cry for vengeance—“ let us know how to be pitiless that we may have no more need for pity ”—which is terrifying and must in the last resort be self-destructive. Some of our readers have thought our words about the treatment of Belgium a little too stern and unrelenting, and we have even been accused of needless exaggeration. Let them try to realise the hideous terror of this thing which has turned Maeterlinck into an avenger who will smite and spare not, as he sees his country violated and crushed into the dust, the innocent victim of inhuman ambition.

BUT while we should have despised M. Maeterlinck if his heart had not been hot within him, and while we believe that indignation such as few of us have ever known before is necessary and right, we must set our faces as flint against any policy of ruthless revenge. Acts of reprisal on the part of the Allied Armies will only increase the wrong. Heidelberg must not be sacrificed to atone for Louvain. We do not believe that such things are likely, and if the danger should arise the English troops with their finely disciplined strength will act as a steadying influence. We associate ourselves with every word of the appeal for self-control which Sir Edward Fry has published in the Times. It is a restrained and forcible warning against the moral disasters of retaliation. This is one of the forms of evil against which the Christian conscience must always declare itself as inflexible and intolerant.

SIR EDWARD FRY writes as follows :—

"The official adoption by the German Army in Belgium of the methods of barbarism has raised a sincere outcry of horror throughout the civilised world. The people of England as a whole have, I think, shown a praiseworthy absence of anything like lust for revenge, and will applaud Mr. Churchill's admirable plea that we should fight like gentlemen; but there is already evidence that in some quarters a clamour for reprisals may arise. From Russia comes the utterance 'God help them when we get into Berlin,' and from a learned English historian the hope that 'shrieking professors . . . will intercede in vain for their beloved Germans when the facts are published to the world.' If we are to make good our claim of fighting in defence of civilisation against a militarism to which nothing is sacred it is essential that the people and the Press of England, of France, and of Russia should alike show stern self-control in the repression of any desire to 'get even' with our adversaries by adopting their practices. It would be well if public expression could be given to this resolve on the part of the allied nations; it would be still better if their Governments would unite in instructions to their troops, expressly forbidding acts of initiative vengeance, and so leave, in the smouldering and desecrated towns of Belgium, an isolated monument of the ethics of Prussian militarism."

CARDINAL MERCIER, the Archbishop of Malines, has paid a brief visit to London on his way from Rome to Belgium. His gracious reception by the King, and the moving demonstration of the Irish in London in his honour last Sunday, will touch the hearts of his people and nerve them for further endurance. In the form of a conversation with a friend he has sent a message to us all, which will add fresh energy to our work on behalf of the Belgian refugees.

"During my visit to England," he said, "I have been overwhelmed by a sense of the unanimous determination of all classes of the community to see this war through. The word 'enthusiasm' fails to express the firmness of their set resolve. On the Continent it is often said that Englishmen are cold. What I have seen and heard during these two days has convinced me more profoundly than ever that this view is utterly false. The English people are full of heart. On Saturday I went to Edmon-ton to see the refugees from Malines. The quiet, undemonstrative fashion in which everything is being done for them, the trouble that is being taken to make these poor people feel that they are surrounded by thoughtful friends whose only wish is to help, can hardly be described. It must be seen to be realised. It is enough that I should say that my fellow-citizens feel not only consoled for the losses they have suffered, and for the trials they have gone through, but that they are almost glad that their misfortunes should have given them an opportunity of knowing the depth and warmth of English feeling."

WE should like to call special attention to the interesting letter by Professor Dawes Hicks which we publish to-day. His long residence in Germany gives special weight to his words. It will be observed that his view of the deterioration of German character and its lapse from high ideals is similar to our own. "Only in the relatively small circles of university life and activity," he writes, "are the old ideals still honoured and cherished." "It is only too true," he adds, "that the philosophers and theologians of Germany do not now represent the nation as a whole." This is not the opinion of prejudiced pessimists, who take a delight in vilifying a whole people. It is a judgment based on a good deal of careful observation, and many of the most competent students of the industrial and political life of modern Germany feel themselves compelled to agree with it. One of the most depressing accounts to which the present writer ever listened of the enslaving influence of the spirit of materialism upon the life of a people was given to him by an eminent German thinker. Of course, this does not mean that there are not numerous and delightful exceptions; that is always the case, whatever the general tendency and colour of national character may happen to be at any given period.

It is quite possible that Professor Hicks and ourselves and many other observers are entirely wrong in their conclusions, though we think that there is a mass of evidence in support of them. Social observation is extraordinarily difficult, if it is to be accurate and unprejudiced. But people who still look at modern Germany through the literature of a rather far-off past or in the light of a few pleasant private friendships, would do well to remember that we are dealing with forces which are operating over a wide field at the present moment. Even if the conclusions which we are compelled to draw are depressing, it is foolish to try to brush them aside or to stigmatise them as anti-Christian, as some of our correspondents are inclined to do. Christianity has to face facts just as they are. There are occasions when, instead of talking in general terms about brotherhood, it must try to make a cool estimate of the strength of the forces which are arrayed against it.

ON one matter in Professor Hicks' letter we should like to enter a caveat of our own. He seems anxious—perhaps we fail quite to apprehend his meaning—to withdraw the quiet circles of the philosopher and the theologian from any share of responsibility for national character and national tone. "What has German philosophy and culture to do," he asks, "with the unspeakable atrocities to which you refer? What had English philosophy and culture to do with the burning of villages and the devastation of homes in South Africa in the Boer War? The reply in each case is, absolutely nothing." For ourselves we are quite unable to accept this notion of little pools of culture far withdrawn from the great tides of the national life. Must not philosophy in the last resort bring its speculative vision to bear upon the practical affairs of the world? Ought not theology to be concerned chiefly with deepening the currents and enriching the ideals of the faith by which men live? Just in so far as philosophers and theologians are content to isolate themselves from intimate concern with the world around them, and refuse to accept a large share of responsibility for the aims and ideals of the community in which they live, they will have to bear the reproach of moral ineffectiveness and they will forfeit much of the respect of good men. Through a long period of comfort and peace the academic mind has found it fairly easy simply to live its own life and pursue its own aims. But its day of trial has come. Much will be changed by the war. It will be all to the good if the philosopher learns to pay more heed to the real stuff of human life and thought, and the theologian has the grace to remember that he must draw much of his richest material from the actual working of the Christian spirit in the life of the common people.

FACING THE FACTS.

WE care very little for pleas of consistency or self-justification at a time like the present. We felt it to be our duty to speak sternly and without respect of persons a fortnight ago, and the interest, in some cases the vehement dislike, which our words have aroused is good evidence that they were at least vital and timely. We fear, however, that controversial blindness has fallen upon some of our correspondents, who are in a hurry to attribute to us opinions, and an attitude of mind, which we can only describe as an amazing perversion. When, for instance, Mr. G. G. ARMSTRONG accuses THE INQUIRER of making it a test of patriotism that "we should accept every story against our enemy of atrocities in the field," we can only suppose that he is hurling words about at random, without taking the trouble even to read what THE INQUIRER has said. More than once we have warned our readers in explicit terms of the dangers of credulity in the matter of atrocities, and we explained how our own reluctance to believe some of these terrible facts had been overcome by the public avowal of German military policy and an accumulating weight of evidence, which it is impossible to dismiss as lying rumour. Mr. ARMSTRONG himself admits that it is beyond dispute "that atrocities have been committed even graver than the atrocities which report invariably attributes to both sides in every war." The real difference between us seems to be that he wishes to obliterate the distinction between "legalised and illegal atrocities in war," in other words, if we understand him rightly, to put the battle of Mons and the sack of Louvain on the same moral level, and we absolutely refuse to do anything of the kind. We are content to leave the moral common-sense of mankind to decide the question. But in view of this and other strange lines of criticism we cannot refrain from a few more words of explanation. We hope that they will be clear. We intend them to be final.

In treating the violation of the neutrality of Belgium as a crime against civilisation, and in using words of stern reprobation of the horrors which have been committed, THE INQUIRER is only doing what it has always done. It is not joining in a hot fit of popular passion and simply shouting with the crowd. On these matters we have a clear record of which we are justly proud. We have always pleaded for the rights of small nationalities. Over and over again we have written in words of burning indignation of crimes of lust and cruelty, and we hope that sometimes our pen has been as sharp as a sword. Do our critics forget Armenia, Persia, the Congo, the Putumayo? Have they no memory of our pleadings for the miseries of the Balkan States and our recent fund for the relief of the Albanian peasants? Is it only when the great country with which we are at war is concerned that we must keep silent about things at least as bad as any of these and refrain from judging? We know that easy policy of non-committal. We too have explored in thought the safe retreats of silence. We respect in its proper place the desire not to hurt anybody's feelings. But in the circumstances in which we found ourselves silence from strong words would have meant dishonour and the abandonment of a splendid tradition, of which the present Editor is only the temporary guardian. For him it is a matter of intimate and proud concern that posterity should be able to say of THE INQUIRER, long after his own name is forgotten, that it never showed any respect of persons or of nations in the judgment of public wickedness or failed in its defence of the rights of oppressed peoples.

We fear that our readers, like ourselves, must be tired of the word culture, but here again some strange conclusions have been drawn by a few people, who seem to have small understanding either of the meaning or the motive of our words. Let it be remembered that we did not introduce the word. The war has been defended in Germany as a war in defence of culture. Certain leaders of cultivated thought have accepted this plea and at the same time have brushed aside the immoral violation of Belgian neutrality as a matter of small importance, accepting without protest the "scrap of paper" theory of treaties. At the very time when the newspapers were full of the sack of Louvain by the German troops we were bidden by people in our own country to remember the claims of German culture. We felt that a plain and stern word must be spoken, if respect for culture was not to be entered as a plea for the suspense of moral judgment, and some of us were to be saved from allowing the pleasant memories of German universities to make us a little soft, indulgent, or hesitating in presence of one of the colossal crimes of history. And so we said with all the decision at our command that culture must go into the second place, and that considerations of national decency made it unsuitable at the moment to talk about culture at all. We tried to look the facts in the face, and we felt with an intensity of conviction which had to find expression, that our own love of scholarship and literature and art—and does any attentive reader of our pages think that these things have little attraction for us?—was as nothing compared with the ultimate things of the soul, love and honour and justice and the difference between right and wrong, which we share with the great mass of men to whom culture is a thing unknown. We are not obscurantists. We shall never decry the noble interests of the cultivated life. But we know Christian men can only serve these interests worthily when they recognise their inferiority, and bid the scholar take an obscure seat in presence of the moral hero and the saint. At the bar of conscience no respect is due to the academic mind. Righteousness is our sovereign lord, culture only one of our humble servants.

Having thus explained in part how we tried to face the facts, may we venture to turn to some of the critics who have been kind enough to rebuke us, and bid them have a little more confidence in the strong forces of the soul. We have received several homilies about the dangers of moral indignation. Is it not written, "Be ye angry and sin not"? To refuse to be openly indignant in presence of meanness or cruelty or foul oppression of the weak because we may be betrayed into racial hatred or revenge seems to us the act of a coward. If a man feels that he cannot trust himself let him retire from the fighting line altogether. But if in our anger we keep the Holy Spirit in our hearts, we are the allies and not the enemies of CHRIST. It is the men who have condemned the crimes in Belgium most severely, who have dared to say that they are not likely to be forgotten for generations because they believe it to be the literal truth, who will have the most effective influence in checking racial hatred and rebuking the ignoble spirit of revenge. The people who love best and longest are those who realise the enormous difficulties of loving at all. This is all in accord with the moral structure of the world. It is part of the divine sternness in the midst of which we have to live.

Some of our correspondents seem to be full of crippling doubt about the future; and their fear of evil is making them blind to the splendour of the good. The very word patriotism conjures up for them a terrifying vision of a nation drunk with military pride. War means to them simply a scene of brutality where the finer virtues have no room to play. Is that an adequate facing of the facts? We do not think so. We pity the man whose heart does not glow with admiration of the fine traits of human character which danger has revealed. Some of us have learned more from the faces of the young men who are going to the war than from many books. Their modesty, their quiet good manners, their anxiety to go just where they are wanted, the complete absence of any trace of boastfulness or brag, have been an unexampled revelation of personal character and national greatness. We are not going to reduce our admiration for these things into a minor key, lest some misunderstanding should arise about our attitude or a timid friend accuse us of forsaking the paths of peace. When we face the facts resolutely there are divine compensations in the darkest tragedy, for God never forgets or forsakes us. In any case it is at once more Christian and more patriotic to praise what is good in our own country even in time of war than to anticipate evil and to surrender to sorrow and dismay before they have arrived. Without this high and kindling joy we can do little to guard our people from ignoble passions. It is the secret of true courage. We believe that it is also the secret of a confident trust in God.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

WHEN I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate on thee in the night watches. Because thou hast been my help, therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice.—Psalm lxxiii. 6, 7.

"WITH malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right—let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up this nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and orphan; to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace."—ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WHEREFORE DIDST THOU DOUBT?

O GRACIOUS Lord, thy help I crave,
And in each grievous failure still would cling
To that blest hand held down to me to save,
And, sinking in doubt's sea, I yet would bring Tears as an offering.

Yes, I would pray, and never faint,
And lay before thee all my poignant need,
That, raised once more from bitter sin's constraint,
I may to thy rebuke give patient heed,
And on thy goodness feed.

Yea, I have doubted and have strayed,
And mournful cry, help thou mine unbelief.
Thou who dost freely give, and not upbraid,
Thy pity moves to penitential grief,
That, loving, finds relief.

Remove the frailty of my will,
And dissipate through faith my shrinking fears,
That I may walk no more in ways of ill,
But offer songs of gladness, and not tears,
Throughout the coming years.

ANON.

It has grown upon me more and more to feel that though belief, in the doctrinal sense of the word, becomes yearly more impossible, more obviously human in all its innumerable manifestations, on the other hand Love—a clinging to something outside ourselves and not liable to accidents—becomes yearly more possible, and seems to me to be the one supreme truth that will some day emerge clearly above all the fog and the jar and tangle of disputing creeds. I do not know what I should do if I had the sole directing of a young ardent nature in such matters, but I feel that what I should do would be to try and get that capacity for love developed, and then let everything else take its chance. At the lowest the Being that she had learnt to love would be the noblest and tenderest in all history, and as for miracles, the miracle of His turning the bitter waters sweet, and pulling wrecked lives straight, and that not by ones and two, but by millions upon millions, is quite miracle enough for me. Of course, the advocatus diaboli will whisper that one is adoring a myth, but one must just let him whisper, and once the root of love is well grounded I do not think such whispers matter. The heart is a far more tenacious organ than the head, and not nearly so much at the mercy of those loud winds of doubt.

EMILY LAWLESS.

O GOD, our heavenly Father, lift our hearts, we beseech thee, into the communion of thy perfect love. May we bring all our burdens into thy presence, and find our strength in thee. Grant us patience to endure, and the love that conquers hate. Be near to those who suffer in this time of war, on the field of battle and in darkened homes, in the privations and anxieties which are laid upon all our hearts. Give to us some ministry of helpfulness, of pity and of healing. Make us wise in judgment and generous in the giving of our best. Unite us all, through the suffering and the endeavour of this time, in the bonds of a true brotherhood, in the love of goodness and the spirit of Jesus Christ. Amen.

O LORD, make us, we implore Thee, so to love Thee that Thou mayest be to us a Fire of Love, purifying and not destroying. Amen.

CHRISTIAN MORALITY AND THE WAR.

THE Manichæans may have been bad philosophers, and I think they were; but at least their philosophy and their ethics held together. Faustus, their most persuasive oracle in Augustine's day, bluntly affirmed that it could not have been the good God, who was therefore also the true God, who enjoined upon Moses the waging of cruel and relentless wars. Had not the true God, revealed in Jesus Christ, enjoined instead the turning of the other cheek when one had been smitten? Clearly the same God could not have had different minds.

The problem was knotty, and it need not be wondered at if Augustine's answer was, ethically, somewhat involved and unsatisfying. But at least there was a wholesome vigour and directness about it which faced the facts. If the Old Testament and the New contradicted each other, so too Jesus had contradicted Himself. "He said unto them, When I sent you forth without purse and wallet and shoes, lacked ye anything? And they said, Nothing. And he said unto them, But now, he that hath a purse, let him take it, and likewise a wallet; and he that hath none, let him sell his cloke, and buy a sword." Augustine felt that religion lay in facing the universe as God's; and that the universe was full of contradictions. The price that had to be paid for religious optimism was heavy, and it has been paid ever since. It was the price of a hopeless ethical confusion in great corporate issues. The most contradictory phases of experience have been in turn justified, and even glorified, in the name of religion.

That is the most tragic thing about this war. Christianity has nothing to say to the contending nations which have all alike issued from her womb. Christianity cannot speak with authority to Christendom. The Catholic religion has no catholic message. In the Papal Conclave itself, Rumour announces with a probability which is not always hers, fierce and heated division declares itself. Cardinal Mercier protests on behalf of an outraged and tortured nation. He is supported by the French and English Cardinals. The Austrians and Germans vigorously impugn this "undue interference of politics in the highest spiritual functions of the Church." And an American and an Italian, apparently, endeavour to keep the peace—i.e., to refrain from taking sides, as it is the duty and the privilege of neutrals to do. That is indeed high comedy. But it is also terrible, appalling tragedy. Infallible authority in the sphere of morals, being in temporary commission, when challenged by the most momentous of moral issues, goes just one better than Janus. It presents three faces to the world and utters itself through them all, passionately proclaiming its yes and no, and with the smooth politeness of the neutral deprecating both. And while religious authority is in this spirit preparing its new infallible voice, prayers go up from the Catholic altar, which, we know, wherever it may be set up is one, for the triumph of each of two contending causes and for the confusion of its opposite.

The fiction of Catholic unity is self-refuted, self-dispelled. Faith and morals are indissolubly bound together, as Catholic instinct has always felt and Catholic dogma has definitely asserted. And what is the meaning of unity of faith if it cannot translate itself, I will not say into a definitely righteous action, but into a definite conviction as to what action, in a given crisis of decision, is righteous? The fiery furnace through which human history is passing will burn up every shred of the pious pretence in which it has delighted to clothe itself. There will be left nothing but the facts, or rather the naked fact, of history; and that fact is that morality, the very knowledge of what morality is, is not an original and secure possession, but the dubious conquest of a truceless struggle. The nerve of that struggle has been knit by the spirit of Christ. That is our faith, and that faith itself grows out of the growing experience that no other spirit gives us such satisfying success in the predestined conflict. Only the knowledge of fuller right wrung from the fierce wrestle with circumstance in what we now see of the Spirit of Christ can lead us into a deeper knowledge of what that Spirit is for us. The content of faith itself is not fixed, but progressive. Like the content of righteousness, it is not a fixed sum to be jealously preserved, but the growing result of a courageous venture in the world of action. If we are to bury our talent in the earth, let it be in the fertile earth of opportunity, where it can strike root and grow.

Our idealism has been weak and futile, because it has been blind to the plainest fact. We have talked sentimentally about the unity of Christendom. We have made an appeal against the horrors of war, in favour of international arbitration and universal peace, to the universal Christian conscience. But the fact is, and always has been, that the universal Christian conscience does not exist. The Christian conscience of Eastern Europe is not the Christian conscience of the West. The Christian conscience of Western Europe in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was not what it is to-day. The Christian conscience is not at unity with itself in any country, in any Church, of Christendom at this present hour. We may not clearly see or acutely feel the division in times of quiet, while life moves in its customary grooves. It is when the earthquakes of history shake every established fact to its foundations that we discover the rents which have been there all the time, now enlarged and fearfully gaping. We have, I think, in Western Europe moved on, however hesitatingly and fitfully, towards a higher, a more moral, conception of international relations. We have grown, at any rate within our own circle, to think of and to treat nationhood as a sacred thing. We have learned that a nation, however small, however weak, has a right to its soul, to the same opportunities as ourselves of concentrating and expanding its inner force derived from the spiritual tradition which has made it a nation. We have learned to treat, no longer with a contemptuous toleration, but with a high-hearted and sincere respect, as indeed the fair and exquisite garden-grounds of European culture, little nationalities like Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Switzerland, and the Scandinavian kingdoms. France and England represent that forward movement towards international right—the France that has grown out of the Revolution, the England of ordered growth from precedent to precedent of liberty. But facing us in appalling strength is the eighteenth century, the spirit of Frederick, incarnate in a Prussia which frankly despises a sentimental world-politic as the last of impossibilities, in a Prussia which has converted even sentimental Germany into the efficient body of her own iron soul. There ought to be no doubt, in such a world-crisis, as to what the claim of the Christ-spirit is. But we are suddenly brought up against the fact that Christianity in its most highly organised and authoritative form has no word to say to which all its own children will hearken. If through its new infallible voice it ventures to speak at all, it will be only to indulge in a futile "Peace, peace!" just at the moment when there is and ought to be no peace.

It is well that this fiction as to the nature of authority in the sphere of morals should be exploded once again. For the truth is that the Christ-spirit makes its ultimately effectual appeal to the individual conscience, that it calls upon the individual conscience to make the venture in action through which alone its decrees can be interpreted and put to the proof. Christian morality may have, and undoubtedly has, its clear standards of right. But in the crises of circumstance which demand the translation of those standards into concrete action, the decision as to what the appropriate action is to be rests with the individual conscience and with the various corporate units of conscience in which individual consciences tend to concentrate. To-day those units prove to be nations, not Churches.

GERMAN CULTURE AND THE WAR.

SIR,—I would not lessen by a single phrase the force of your stirring protest against the barbarous crimes that have made one almost despair of humankind. I am ready, if you press me, to admit that the men and women in Germany who, in the midst of a hateful political régime, have been striving to maintain the ideals of a great past, are woefully to blame for not having made long ago a combined and determined stand against Prussian militarism, which, as Maeterlinck says, "it is essential the modern world should stamp out as it would stamp out a poisonous fungus that for half-a-century has disturbed and polluted its days." But, in the name of justice and common honesty, let wrath and indignation be expended upon the things that merit them, and not upon those features—already, alas! in imminent danger of being choked and smothered under the dire tyranny that prevails—in which the hope of a liberated and regenerated Germany mainly lies. It is only too true that the philosophers and theologians of Germany do not now represent the nation as a whole. If they did, even to an appreciable extent, it is very certain that neither Belgium nor France would have been invaded. In like manner, Oxford teachers were not representative of England as a whole on the occasion of the wild excesses of Mafeking night. Had they been, we should have been saved from that discreditable episode of our history. Would it not be ridiculous, for example, to speak as though the Principal of Manchester College and his colleagues shared in the responsibility for scenes of debauchery which they loathed and detested? So again, if a man stayed to talk about philosophy, even with M. Bergson, while a ruffian was outraging his wife and murdering his children, "we should," as you say, "be filled with intolerable moral disgust." But surely such moral disgust would be averted by the man hastening to attack the ruffian and not by his reviling M. Bergson. And though it should chance that the ruffian were of the same nationality as the latter, that would not in the smallest degree be a reason for denouncing the author of "Creative Evolution."

What has German philosophy and culture to do with the unspeakable atrocities to which you refer? What had English philosophy and culture to do with the burning of villages and the devastation of homes in South Africa during the Boer War? The reply in each case is, absolutely nothing. It may be said, it has been said, that the German leaders of science and thought might at least make their voices heard, and give expression in unmistakable terms of their abomination of the brutal deeds of a frenzied soldiery. For aught we know, they may be doing so, by every means that is open to them. I remember how, when the Jingo fever was here at its height, it was well-nigh impossible in any town in the country for those who disapproved of what was going on either to get a hearing on a public platform or to obtain the smallest space for stating their case in the columns of the local press. Is it surprising, then, that in Germany at the present moment, when the popular madness can scarcely restrain itself, when martial law is everywhere in force, and when the entire press is under the strictest supervision, we hear nothing of the opinion of those who may be as wrathful as we are over the ghastly horrors which are staining the name of Germany in the eyes of the civilised world.

Is it objected that Harnack and Eucken have given utterance to their conviction that the policy of England has been self-interested and insincere? I believe they have done so under a misapprehension prevalent on the Continent of the motives of English diplomacy. But the essential point is that neither of them is entitled to speak for the whole body of German teachers. In England also, at the period to which I have alluded, there were not wanting Professors of Divinity who approved of Mr. Chamberlain's mode of dealing with the Dutch Republics, and a foreign critic might well have imagined that they represented the attitude of English divines generally. And yet how erroneous that surmise would have been.

Let us, at any rate, withhold judgment of this kind until we are acquainted with the actual facts. The truth is, it is an illusion to suppose, as Maeterlinck appears to do, that the eighty millions who inhabit the Fatherland are a highly intellectual people. The vast majority are totally destitute of any real culture. It is precisely intelligence, in the proper sense of that term, that Germany does lack at the present time, so far as nine-tenths of her population is concerned. The rapid rise and spread of industrialism, of commercial enterprise, and of the rush for wealth, has simply changed and transformed the aspect of German society as compared with what it was in the days of Goethe and Schiller. Only in the relatively small circles of university life and activity are the old ideals still honoured and cherished. Blame, therefore, if you will, and with unsparing severity, the true perpetrators of this wickedness. But do not cover in one universal condemnation those who are as guiltless of it as any one of ourselves. There are yet seven thousand men in Germany who have not bowed the knee to Baal.—Yours, &c.,

G. DAWES HICKS.

Cambridge,

September 15, 1914.

[We have not made a special point of any criticism which German professors have passed upon English policy. There they are clearly within their rights. What we have condemned is their defence of the violation of the neutrality of Belgium, and their acceptance of the "scrap of paper" theory of treaties. That is a matter for stern moral judgment. Professor Hicks has rather missed the point of our criticism last week. It was directed against the people in our own country who seem inclined to talk about German philosophy and culture and to emphasise their immense debt of gratitude to it at the very time that the mind of the world is filled with horror at the crimes in Belgium. We still think that it is unseasonable and mischievous to do so, and likely to do more harm than good to our respect for German culture.—ED. OF INQ.]

SIR,—May I help to swell the chorus of appreciation which will now be reaching your ears with regard to your lead in the crisis? I cannot speak from the wide knowledge of German territory possessed by some of your hostile critics, but I am a keen student of international politics, and, being an ex-teacher of German language and literature, I have had scores of German friends. These have not been students or professors of philosophy, but mainly business men—just average German citizens; and the impression which, against my will, I have received from them has been that war with Britain was regarded by them as inevitable, and, indeed, necessary to the expansion—the fated expansion—of the German Empire. My impression has been confirmed by a talk which I have just enjoyed with an Englishman who escaped last week from Prussia. He tells me that Germany is absolutely united in favour of the war. Dr. Mellor looks forward to a revolt of the German people. It is a dream which some of us long cherished as of a possible check upon the aggressive attitude of German statesmen. Should the revolt occur now there would be practical value in such a rising, but no moral value. It would be due, not to the pacific intentions of the rebels, not to their disgust with the war policy; it would obviously be due to disappointment that matters had been bungled, and that success had not come. Of course, in Germany, as in every country, there must be thousands of peace-loving citizens; but to regard the people as being mere passive sheep led to the slaughter by a few fire-eating Prussian statesmen is to blink many obvious facts. The atrocities proved against the Germans and committed, as you well remind us, by average citizens, "the fathers, the sons, and the brothers from nice German homes," go to show that the nation has, as perhaps all the great nations now have, the form of Government which, as yet, she deserves. And, too, Invisa nunquam imperia retinentur diu. Kaiserism has been rampant in Germany for 25 years.—Yours, &c.,

IS GOD WITH US IN WAR?

SIR,—Some of the ideas now being expressed by the correspondents in your paper and elsewhere about the relation between God and man in connection with the war seem to show considerable confusion of thought. I refer to such expressions as "Is God with us?" "Does God withdraw Himself from us in the war?" and the doubts which some seem to be feeling about God Himself because such a terrible state of things can exist.

We have been taught that "in Him we live and move and have our being." Surely this means that if He were not with us, if He did withdraw Himself from us, we should cease to be at all. And the doubt about His goodness, grounded on His permission of the present state of things, leading to a doubt even of His existence, is the outcome of an attempt to transfer to Him man's responsibilities for the use made of that freedom of thought and action which He has given to us, and without which we could do neither good nor ill, nor be moral beings at all.

God does not withdraw Himself from the sinner any more than from the saint—from the devastators of Louvain any more than from the servants of the Red Cross. The difference in the relation arises on the side of man, and because some men ignore the Divine presence or misconceive its nature and significance. We are born in the sanctuary and cannot escape from it, but we may and often do forget where we are and pollute it by our actions. What the present crisis ought to drive home to us is not doubt about God, but the awful responsibility for the right use of human freedom.

To draw the sword, as we have done, is of course a terrible thing involving immense responsibility. There is no sign that our leaders have thought otherwise. But it is not necessarily a wrong thing, nor one that need make us ashamed to remember the Divine presence or think of ourselves as polluters of the sanctuary. Whether we are that or not depends upon the objects for which the sword has been drawn and the temper in which it is wielded. So long as our objects are such as have been defined by Mr. Asquith, and the temper such as breathes through Lord Kitchener's address to the troops, and is echoed in Mr. Churchill's last speech, why should we feel that our action is separating us from God? The danger, and it is a real one, is that as the war goes on we should degenerate and become brutalised. But war has not always had that effect, and it need not be so with us now.

When some Eastern fanatic "runs amok," wounding or killing all who come in his way, we do not blame those who seek to restrain him by force, and death if need be. To-day we have to deal with a nation gone mad and ruthless under the influence of false ideals, inordinate ambition, and overweening pride. The scale makes no difference in the principle.

May I thank you for the stand you are taking in this matter. It seems to me idle to talk about things being the same after the war as they were before between the Germans and ourselves. When a neighbour has broken his solemn obligations to us, and has violently ravaged the home of another and a wholly unoffending neighbour, we cannot easily or quickly return to the same friendly relations with him as we tried to cultivate before he did these things. Time only and some sufficient evidence of a changed mind can restore these. And it is equally idle to throw the whole blame on the Kaiser and the military caste. They could not have done what they have done if they had not been supported by a great body of opinion in their country. Whatever line individuals here and there may have taken, the Germans as a people have acquiesced in the preaching of ideals and the establishment of a system which has culminated in this war. They are brave men; and if they had really disapproved of what has been done they would have freely risked their lives if need be to stop it. It will not be possible to forget all this as soon as the war is over. It would not be right, if it can possibly be prevented, to leave them in such a position that they may hope to renew in a few years' time their attempts upon the peace and civilisation of Europe. If any one is in doubt as to the significance of the German problem, let him read Bernhardt's book. Before we can hope to convince the people who have embraced such doctrines as his that those doctrines are wrong, we must prove to them conclusively that they do not pay, and that "the day" is not merely postponed.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN DENDY.

Swinton, Manchester, Sept. 13.

SIR,—The unprovoked attack on Belgium, with the barbarous punishment of its resistance, is a wicked thing, and we are bound to fight it. If that were the whole matter we might, indeed, hope that God was on our side. But who will dare to say it is the whole matter? We have no right to forget or ignore or be "impatient" about its antecedents. Autocracies, Slav and Teuton, eaten alternately by covetousness and fear, have armed themselves in the alternate hope and dread of a territorial war. France and Britain have successively become involved in the feud, not because they believed one side was right and the other wrong, but because they believed their material interests lay in this particular "balance of power." The White Paper makes it plain that we were committed to war before, and independently of, the Belgian emergency. It is on that fact that we must judge whether or not God is with us. Germany found herself confronted by overwhelming odds, and attempted to "hack her way through" the line of supposed least resistance. It was a wicked thing to do, and it must be punished. But the situation which made the emergency will surely be remembered by history, and by the Ruler of nations, not in justification of Germany, but in condemnation of her opponents side by side with herself.

In face of these facts, the certitude as to our rightness in every possible respect, and the wrongness in every respect of Germany seems to me childish in the extreme—self-righteousness which it is hard, indeed, to stomach. One would have hoped that at least THE INQUIRER and its writers would have a worthier contribution to make to the thought of our country in this moment of mental and moral anguish than to make it a test of patriotism that we should accept every story against our enemy of atrocities in the field, that we should believe that a whole nation has deserted Christ for Treitschke, and that we should elevate "intolerance" into a virtue to be practised not only against our enemies abroad, but against our brethren at home, to the breaking of the ties of family and of friendship. It is beyond dispute, I fear, that atrocities have been committed even graver than the atrocities which report invariably attributes to both sides in every war. But I doubt whether God, whose name we are all invoking so freely, makes the same precise distinctions that we do between legalised and illegal atrocities in war. War is itself the supreme atrocity, and it is amazing to me how easily good men find reasons for viewing with enthusiasm the wholesale slaughter of men by their brothers at the behest of Governments and Kings.

It should surely be a sobering thought—and I would urge, if a little timidly, that sobriety of thought is even at this crisis not necessarily unpatriotic—that sincere and high-minded Germans believe that Britons, too, have been guilty of atrocities, that Britons, too, have evolved a philosophy which upholds them in a desire for world domination by fair means or foul, and that because of these things God—Professor Jacks' and the Kaiser's God, who "is a man of war"—is fighting on the side of Germany. I have cut out and filed from the last two issues of THE INQUIRER the letters of Professor Jacks and Mr. Cyril Flower, and I hope to read them again in ten years' time. Which, I wonder, will seem to us then the more pleasing representation of the thoughts of God on the war of 1914?—Yours, &c.,

GEO. G. ARMSTRONG.

Victoria Park, Manchester, Sept. 14.

SIR,—I am genuinely sorry to cause Dr. Jacks pain, but I cannot help it. My difference from my old teacher, for whom I have the profoundest respect, is that while he believes that the "Lord is a man of war," I do not. In the vision of faith I can struggle to see the God who is Love at the end of the whole tragic process: I can hope for "the day of the Lord" and work for it. But my God is still "Our Father, which art in Heaven"—i.e., in Ideal. When the Fatherhood of God is real on earth there can be no international murdering. All the nations have been more or less parties in promoting the militarist curse. It is, of course, very nice for us to think that Germany is the worst—as she may be—because we are at war with her. But I am inevitably reminded of the saying, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her," I do not believe that God (i.e., Love) has any errand to entrust to a nation which goes out to kill men.

I recognise a "necessity" in this war, and in England's part in it; but it is a necessity which arises from the very fact that the errand of the God of Love has never yet succeeded. That errand will require "that a man lay down his life for his friends," but not that a man take the life of his "foes" for his friends. Self-sacrifice in the service of Love is not taking equal chances of killing and being killed, but is, as I understand it, the way of Jesus. I am optimist enough to believe that there are still some who are willing to lay down their lives for their friends who are not willing to slaughter their "foes." I am not one of these. I am willing even to try to slaughter our "foes" if the last need arise; but I know only too well that in that my God cannot be with me. The "man of war" of the bellicose old Jews might be with me stimulating in me the frenzy of battle, but not the God who is Love. A nation is better nowadays, in my opinion, with no God, than with a "man of war," a "God of battles," or a "Lord of hosts."—Yours, &c.,

J. CYRIL FLOWER.

A JUST AND LASTING PEACE?

SIR,—Human distress is sure at this moment to find access to the human heart. The need of enlightenment as to the profound issues involved in this war will neither be so widely nor so acutely felt. And in this direction, especially, our own group of churches might render signal service.

A passage in the recent Message of the Society of Friends states the case as well probably as it can be stated:—

"It is not too soon to begin to think out the new situation which will arise at the close of the war. . . we shall be faced with a stupendous task of reconstruction. . . we shall be able to make a new start. . . Is it too much to hope for that we shall, when this time comes, be able as brethren together to lay down far-reaching principles for the future of mankind such as will ensure us for ever against a repetition of this gigantic folly? . . . (We) must begin to think and plan for such a future. . . in time of peace all the nations have been preparing for war. In the time of war let all men of goodwill prepare for peace. Now is the time to speak of this thing, to work for it, to pray for it."

I would suggest that the special question for the earnest study and discussion of our churches at this hour of crisis should be, in the words of Abraham Lincoln:

How to "achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace" in Europe.

That is the first statement of the question that occurs to me, but a far more pointed and pregnant statement of it could doubtless be found. This would involve the consideration of such questions as the following:—(1) The significance of racial sentiment; the taking full account of this in the re-drawing of the map of Europe, and in determining future national boundaries. The avoidance of such territorial aggression and national abasement as would tend to pave the way for fresh wars. (2) The absolute prohibition throughout the world of the manufacture of guns, warships, &c., for private gain. (3) The practicability of national disarmament. (4) The neutralisation of the sea. (5) The practicability of establishing an International Court of Justice with power to settle all disputes between European countries. (6) The creation of a spirit that shall make war in the future an impossibility. Whether merely secular reforms and a merely secular education can ever create such a spirit. Whether we can ever expect such a spirit to be created apart from religion and the influence of a vital Christianity. (7) Christian ethics and war. (8) The press and war. (9) The balance of power and secret diplomacy. (10) The future of Russia, of China and Japan.

Such questions as the above should be dealt with in a comprehensive course in study circles and classes in connection with our churches, extending, say, from October to March, inclusive, to be followed, if this could be arranged, by a full day devoted to this question at the next Triennial Conference at Leeds. Our churches might also arrange, apart from the Sunday sermons of their ministers, for a series of lectures on various aspects of this question by competent authorities.

The Committee of the National Conference Union for Social Service is now engaged in mapping out such a course, and in order that this may prove as comprehensive and effective as possible, I should be grateful if any interested reader would send me along suggestions, especially as regards suitable books of reference, articles, &c. I should also be glad if they would forward to me the names and addresses of competent lecturers who might prove available for dealing with these matters. I should also be exceedingly obliged if really suggestive articles appearing in the daily and periodical press could be forwarded to me, such, e.g., as those of H. G. Wells, the Message of the Society of Friends, the Bishop of Winchester's Pastoral, the Collegium's "Call to Prayer," the I.L.P. Manifesto, &c., all of which I already possess. It is difficult to get just what one wants from a press cuttings agency.—Yours, &c.,

A PLEA FOR WIDER PATRIOTISM.

SIR,—Should we not take heed lest, in our eagerness to overthrow the Power which seems to-day the incarnation of the spirit of war, we foster in ourselves or in other peoples something of the same temper? It so easily gains strength and runs riot in the minds of men. Are any of the nations now at strife quite secure from the delusion that armaments are the bulwark of a people's strength? In yielding to panic and demanding more, and ever more destructive munitions of war, have not all these nations, for years, been cherishing the spirit and increasing the possibilities of such a conflict as now is devastating the fair plains and cities of Europe? And when the conflict is over, and the power of the war demon is crushed at his headquarters, is it so sure that neither of the nations now engaged in crushing him will be in danger of offering him a refuge in its midst?

Reading the strong language of THE INQUIRER against Germany—and I do not say it is too strong, being unable to judge how far one nation is in a position to apportion blame against another—and seeing that in a letter which appeared in your columns last week conscription has already found support from a minister of religion, I would plead for the advocacy, even while the conflict rages, of that spirit of goodwill, of international good fellowship, which alone can stay the hand of the oppressor. No nation is clean and blameless in this matter. Our sin has found us all out. Yet, in every nation, there is a mighty spirit of love and of generous good feeling, and of large-hearted sympathy towards the people of every other nation. Is it not to this that now, if ever, we need to appeal?

In the time of the French Revolution a great Englishman returned from Paris, not long after the September massacres, to declare himself a "Patriot of the World." If we really wish to overthrow this domination of militarism, is there any other way than this of widening our patriotism till it includes all nations that share with us the civilisation of to-day? And now that we have seen what a narrower patriotism and its dependence on armaments has brought us to, is not this the hour and this the opportunity for throwing ourselves out, in fearless goodwill, towards all the peoples of Europe, by cherishing among ourselves that loftier Nationalism which, while leaving us free to keep alive the national spirit that makes each people one, lifts us into a larger fellowship such as needs not armaments, because its interests are common, and its brotherhood is strong?—Yours, &c.,

W. J. JUPP.

Leitchworth, September 9, 1914.

THE WOMEN'S LEAGUE AND THE WAR.

SIR,—The Chairman's defence of the League's action in calling upon women to sew, leaves out of account altogether the economic question involved in its policy. Is this sewing doing more good than harm, or more harm than good, to the community? If the committee has considered that question, well and good. But Mrs. Drummond has, I think, adduced no strong argument in favour of voluntary work. To suggest, as she does, that a woman should be encouraged to ply her needle because she has "yearnings for action" and a "craving to give" which need satisfying, is to suggest treating us after the manner of children, who are sometimes allowed to hinder the business of the household under the fond illusion that they are helping it. Women want to be of some real use, and if I can best help by not sewing, then, unless I deliberately choose to be selfish, I must not sew. And this holds good, whether I am rich or poor, a very idle or a very busy person.

I quite agree with Mrs. Drummond that it is very unfair that so many women should have no money to spare, but we are living at present under a social system which secures the pleasures of such giving for a minority only, and demands unjust sacrifices from the great majority.—Yours, &c.,

AMY WITALL.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

OUR OWN BUSINESS.

THERE is a story I want to tell you this week. It is about a little shepherd boy of the Tyrol, named Findelkind; he was nine years old. Three times a week he used to go to school in the nearest town, with his two little brothers, and the rest of the time he used to guard the sheep or cows for his father. He was a dreamy, fanciful little boy, and he loved stories. One story above all, which the old priest, who kept the school told them, seized upon his mind; it was about a boy who had lived in those parts five hundred years before, who had left a famous memory, and who, strangest of things, had been named Findelkind, like himself. This earlier Findelkind of Arlberg had been so grieved for all the poor souls who, travelling over the wild mountain passes, perished of cold or hunger, or were killed by bears and wolves, that he had left his home and journeyed up and down the world begging alms, in the name of Christ and of St. Christopher; and many gave to him, so that at last he was able to return and to found a church, and a house where he and six others lived as a brotherhood of St. Christopher, going forth every evening, when the Angelus sounded, to seek the lost and weary.

Findelkind used to think and dream over this story day and night. He felt he, with the same name and living in the same place, must somehow go and do likewise. Although there was now a good road over the pass, and travellers hardly ever were lost or perished in these days, he did not think of that at all, he only wanted to go out, too, and beg for the poor as the other Findelkind had done. Day after day he brooded over it in secret; he let the cow stray, he forgot his lessons, he left the loaves to burn, even Katte, his favourite ewe, and her two little lambs no longer interested him; his brothers and sisters teased him, and his mother cried because she thought he was going out of his mind; but nothing made any difference to his one great thought. At last he could bear it no longer; one autumn morning he rose before anyone else, stole out, and started on his strange pilgrimage, barefooted, with his school satchel slung empty behind him, and a little staff in his hand.

There is no room to tell here of all his adventures that day; enough to say that he soon found that begging alms for the poor was no easy or pleasant task. People laughed at him for a silly little boy, or drove him roughly away; when he told them he was only copying Findelkind of Arlberg they did not know what he meant. He wandered at last into the beautiful town of Innsbrück; he found no more sympathy there than on the country roads, and he was nearly killed by the horses of a cavalry troop, which shied as he ran in front begging for money. The officers laughed loudly when he told his story, and whispered together, "He is crazed." Findelkind heard them, and, frightened and tired and miserable, he ran for shelter into the great church of the Franciscans, and there sank down and fainted. When he came to himself he found his father standing over him, half angry, half tender. The poor man had spent the whole day hunting for his son, following up this clue and that, and now he took him off home in a cart, grieved most of all because he thought the boy must really be mad. When they reached home, out ran his mother and brothers and sisters, glad, indeed, to see him safely back. They put him to bed tenderly enough, saying he should wait till tomorrow for his punishment; but he had it that night nevertheless, for, as his mother bade him good-night, she told him "Little Stefan had care of the sheep in your place, and he has lost Katte's lambs—the beautiful twin lambs! Do you hear the poor thing mourning for them? Do not go afield from your duty again."

Findelkind was cut to the very heart then. He could not sleep for listening to poor Katte as she bleated for her babies, and thinking of the two little things out in the cold on the great mountain-side. A second time he crept downstairs and out of the house, and began a weary search for the little lambs. And, at last, as the snow was falling on the grey dawn beginning to break, he found them—but they were dead. He had come too late, and the tiny woolly bodies were cold and stiff, and Findelkind gathered them up in his arms and went sadly home, murmuring as he went, "I killed them." He fell ill with the grief of it, and nearly died; but in the springtime he recovered, and then he began to go about his daily work again, and do the little tasks that were given him, sad always at heart because nothing could bring back the little lives that were gone, but humbly trying not to fail his duty again.

It is a sad little story; but it helps us to remember what we sometimes, all of us, forget. It is just as true for you and me as it was for little Findelkind that, if we "go afield from our duty," our duty may never get done at all. There is one piece of work in the world that we have to do now, and if someone else has to take it up instead of us, or if it is put off while we run away after some other fancy, it cannot be quite the same in the end. We may be sure that we shall best help the world if we first "do the work that's nearest," and then, but not before, begin to take up fresh tasks if we have time and strength.

Just now we do all want to help the world; so many things around us are sad and wrong, and we wish so much that we could have a hand in putting them right. Now a great and wise thinker said long ago, "Justice" (that is, fairness or rightness) "is doing one's own business." Yes, if everyone began by doing that we should soon have far more rightness and fair play on every hand. But the point for us to remember is that we, at least, must not shirk "our own business," but must do it faithfully whatever it is, even "though it's dull at times." You and I have each a post of duty, just as much as the soldier on the field; there is only One who knows the whole plan, and our part is to do the work He gives us, wherever we may be stationed.

And what is your own business? I cannot tell you; but, generally, you will find it quite easy to tell yourself. School or home is there for you to take your place and do your duty, and you know well what that duty is. But if ever it seems not so easy to be sure, and two or three different kinds of duty seem to be conflicting, I know of only one way, yet it is a never-failing way, of finding out which to do. Ask of the great Captain who has set you on the field of life, whose love for all of us, His soldiers, makes us call Him Our Father; and He will tell you clearly, in your own heart, your place and your task. Here is a little prayer; I do not know who wrote it, but it says just what we all need to say, "Lord, teach me to feel my need of help from Thee, and to seek it; find my place, and keep it; know my duty, and do it."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE VILLAGES AND THE WAR.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—My life here is passed in the society of village labourers. They are a very silent people. They have almost no language of their feelings. At first they could not understand the war. It was incomprehensible. They said nothing about it, until tale upon tale of frightful barbarity reached us, and then they said, "These Germans be a cruel people," and one by one the boys began to enlist, and the parents who were averse to their sons joining the army say nothing against it now. And the lads come round to say good-bye. "I thought I should like to serve my country. I can't do no more, can I? They're doing terrible things out there." So says one, and so say all. The boys are moved beyond all fear to go and help where help is sorely needed. "God bless you, lads; be good soldiers. We would fain come with you too," we say. They pack their kits, mount their bicycles, and ride off to town to join their company without a drink or a cheer. The carrier brings the bicycles home again.

When I think of the hosts of young Americans who fought and died for freedom for the black race, or when I think of my old friend Emanuel, who asks eagerly how the war is going on; he who, when a youth of twenty fought at the side of Garibaldi, was one of the thousand who landed in Sicily and captured Palermo, and wears the red shirt still, I know that the deeds and the sufferings of those brave men are rightly hallowed and blessed for ever, for they were moved by God and have exalted the human race. Then, too, I think of these sturdy village boys in Wiltshire asking to be taken to France to fight in defence of the villages there and in Belgium; and it seems to me we shall come to honour them for a priceless sacrifice and service to humanity, even as those others.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN LEAGUE.

OWING to the indirect effects of the war there is an increasing demand upon the social centres and mothers' kitchens established in connection with the Liberal-Christian League. The chief objects of these institutions, which are located in poverty-stricken districts, both in London and country, are to provide cheap dinners at 2d. and 1d. per head to expectant and nursing mothers, and to look after the needs of the children. With the assistance of the National Relief Fund emergency dinners for the destitute are also being provided. But this supplementary work is necessarily dependent upon the ordinary activities being fully maintained. For this purpose increasing funds are necessary. About £700 was raised last year. Subscriptions and donations will be thankfully received and acknowledged by the Hon. Treasurer, L.C.L. Social Service Dept., 28, Red Lion-square, W.C.

WE are requested to call attention to the facilities for communicating with friends in Germany or Hungary through the kind offices of the Dutch and Danish representatives of the International Union of Liberal Christian Women. Full information may be obtained from Miss Brooke Herford, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

THE October number of The Hibbert Journal will be largely devoted to the moral issues involved in the war and its deeper causes, and will open with an article by Field-Marshal Lord Roberts on "The Supreme Duty of the Citizen in the Present Crisis." There will be further articles by Sir Henry Jones, the Bishop of Carlisle, Professor Gilbert Murray, and the Editor. Contributions will also appear dealing with the relations of the war to German literature and German philosophy, and there will be a special study of the teaching of Nietzsche as partly responsible for Prussian militarism.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Diss.—G. A. Birks, son of the Rev. W. Birks, has secured one of the five Senior County Scholarships awarded by the Norfolk County Council, obtaining First Class Honours with three distinctions.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The church at Holbeck, Leeds, has suffered a serious loss by the death of the wife of Mr. J. T. Kitchen in her 58th year. The funeral took place at the Lawnswood Cemetery, Leeds, on September 7, in the presence of a large assemblage, including the members of the family, relatives, and reprerepresentatives of the Holbeck and Mill Hill churches, the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, and employees at the works of which Mr. Kitchen is the head. The Rev. J. McDowell, a former minister at Holbeck, conducted a service at the home, and the Rev. W. R. Shanks read the committal service at the grave. Last Sunday evening a memorial service was held in the church conducted by the Rev. W. R. Shanks.

London.—The Committee of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties has decided to alter the arrangements for its annual meeting. Instead of the visit to the church at Ilford, with the usual programme extending over the whole day, there will be a meeting for the necessary annual business in the Schoolroom of Essex Church on the afternoon of Tuesday, October 6. In the evening, at 7 o'clock, there will be a united service in the church conducted by the Rev. A. Farquharson, of Maidstone. The preacher will be the Rev. W. H. Drummond, Minister of the Assembly.

Manchester: Moss Side.—The Rev. T. M. Salmon, of the Unitarian Home Missionary College and Owens College, Manchester, has accepted a unanimous call to the pastorate of the Unitarian Free Church. He will begin his duties in October, conducting the harvest thanksgiving services on October 4.

Newport, I.W.—Harvest thanksgiving, with special service of intercession, was held last Sunday. Prayers were offered for our country, for our soldiers and sailors, for our King, for the triumph of justice, truth, and mercy. The collections, altogether amounting to about £10, will be sent to the Prince of Wales's fund.

Tenterden.—At the close of the service on Sunday evening, September 13, Mr. James Rowlands, M.P., delivered a vigorous address on the war in the Old Meeting House.

York.—On Saturday, September 12, the congregation of St. Saviourgate Chapel was invited by Mr. and Mrs. Manning to a garden party at their home in Acomb. An interesting programme was carried out. The party had originally been intended for the purpose of helping the new organ fund, as well as social intercourse, but under present circumstances it was thought better to devote the proceeds to the War Relief Fund. Several of the members have relatives at the front. The minister is giving a series of addresses on Sunday evenings on "Great Warriors," in historical order, as follows:—"Arjuna Refuses to Fight," "Marcus Aurelius in his Tents," "Attila, the Scourge of God," "King Alfred in Success and Defeat," "Akbar, the Humane Conqueror." Though a congregation of peace lovers it is felt that the war must now be prosecuted vigorously in the hope that militarism will sustain a final and irretrievable blow.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

WOMEN'S WORK IN THE CRISIS.

Miss Margaret Macmillan points out in an article in the Daily News and Leader that to the educated well-to-do women it falls, or may fall, to envisage the whole problem of social distress, and apply remedies that are in some degree, at least, equal to its partial solution. Among other things, she thinks it is the moment to ask for and obtain the use of large free spaces. There are 14,000 acres of unused space in London alone. In crowded areas, more especially, a group of women should look for sites. On these cleared sites large, well-ventilated canvas or corrugated iron buildings could be run up, and the surrounding space cleared and dug up to make a good vegetable and flower garden. The cost of a building to hold 50 children would be £100. In one of these camps a large number of children—from 40 to 200 children—could find a healthy, happy home and refuge till these calamities be overpast. If they are close to the parents' homes, so much the better. The camp will improve the whole neighbourhood. In a quarter where excitements run high and riots are apt to break out, this children's camp would be a more softening reminder than a church even to the whole populace.

THE NATIVE STATES OF INDIA.

International lawyers, we learn from Mr. Nevinson in the Manchester Guardian, have not yet made up their minds whether the Native States of India ought to be called allied, vassal, tributary, dependent, or semi-sovereign, and, although their rulers have enormous wealth and kingly honour, their rights are strictly limited. They number about 680 (693 if Nepaul, Baluchistan and the Shan States are included) "and their population, excluding those extraneous countries, amounts to about one-fifth of the whole of India (roughly 63,000,000, as against the 232,000,000 of British India proper). The largest and most important may be divided into the five groups of the Hyderabad, Rajput, Maratha, Mysore, and Baroda States, in order of population. Like most things in our history, they have grown up haphazard, their regulation being suited to the occasion and based on no theory or principle."

THE CHRISTIAN ARMY.

In a leading article in the Challenge the editor draws a comparison between the British soldier and the Christian warrior which is not without a note of warning. The former, he says, unconsciously and without subtleties of words, "proves the Christian paradox, 'Whoso loveth his life shall lose it.' No longer is it the little spark entrusted to his own body which is the real life; to feed a life far greater he will sacrifice his own with cheerfulness. England is immortal because Englishmen die. Before this example the Christian Church should pause with a burning self-reproach and a new resolve. The issues to which we, as Christians, are committed are not smaller than the soldier's, but far more great. The dedication of self to which we are called is not less but far more complete. If we fail it is because we do not believe passionately in the Christian conflict or intend to make our obedience uncompromising. We have lost the simple sense of duty, which is the unfailing secret of gladness. We are not certain of our hope. Saving our own life we lose the larger life. We are not happy because we are not unselfish. As the bands of young recruits march past our office windows in this wonderful year, shouting the songs of light inconsequence, we have a kind of vision of the Christian army facing its task with the same aggressive joy."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE crowning event of this week for all who care for noble and beautiful things has been the bombardment and partial destruction of the Cathedral of Rheims. We use the words partial destruction intentionally, because there can be no reliable estimate of the extent of the damage until the wave of battle has receded from the district and a thorough architectural examination has been made. But there is no mitigation in this bald statement either of the horror of the deed or of the intensity of irreparable loss. We know what it looked like in its incomparable splendour in the middle of July. We can dimly imagine its roofless nave, its shattered windows, its scarred and splintered statues at the present moment.

OUR first word must be one of deep and respectful homage to the French nation in a loss which neither time nor money can ever make good to them. The cathedral embodied some of the most glorious memories of France. It was the traditional site of the baptism of Clovis. It was rich in associations with Joan of Arc. It was the crowning place of her kings. The spirit of her religion lived in its stones. In the matchless statues which long ago sprang into life beneath the sculptor's hand the heroes of her own race took their place with the prophets and kings of the old dispensation, and the humble worshipper was lifted into fellowship with the mysteries of the religion of redemption, as he lifted his eyes to the figure of Christ throned in judgment, or felt a touch of intimate kinship with his own common days in the more than earthly beauty of the groups of the Annunciation and the Visitation.

WE are only using the language of modesty and truth when we speak of Rheims Cathedral as one of the greatest buildings of the world. It was the supreme effort of the Gothic architects of the thirteenth century. No wise man will wish to draw up a list of the great churches of France in order of merit and to decide whether Chartres or Rheims must come first. There is more of the spirit of quietness and retirement at Chartres, but Rheims had a regal splendour all its own. The massive strength of its design bore with ease the lavish richness of its adornment. It was at Rheims that Christian sculpture reached its highest expression both in technical skill and spiritual beauty. Nowhere else in the world were so many sublime figures of the Church militant and triumphant gathered together in one place. And everywhere amid prophets and saints and kings and the humbler symbols of human virtue and toil were angels with outstretched wings, radiant beings of fire and air, though wrought out of common stone, who seemed to bear the souls of mortal men into the heaven of light from which they came. How much of all this is left to us now?

LET no one accuse us of exaggeration, because we speak in this way of the spoiling of one church amid all the grosser horrors and miseries of war. We are not growing sentimental about the loss of a building when all our thought ought to be given to the destruction of human life. The Cathedral of Rheims was something much greater than an object of beauty. It was a shrine of the human spirit, one of the highest expressions that the world has ever known of Christian worship and adoration. Generations of men have found shelter and consolation within its walls. It belonged to the common people, and in language which all could understand it taught the scholar and the unlettered peasant of the things of God. To many of us in its soaring appeal to the religious imagination and its intimate witness to the reality of faith, it meant more than a whole library of books. Its loss—a loss which the hand of the most skilful restorer can never make good—is comparable to the blotting out of great literature from human memory, as though Plato or Shakespeare should be read and remembered no more. Great books can be reprinted so long as one copy remains, but Rheims Cathedral can never be repeated to the end of time. The whole world is poorer because one of its noblest and most inspiring possessions has fallen a prey to the hand of the spoiler.

WE believe that this sense of religious bereavement will be so poignant as to check any feeling of harsh vindictiveness. Some crimes against humanity cut so deep as to make us incapable of the tawdry satisfactions of revenge. It is a true human heart that speaks in the words of the French Socialist, Gustave Hervé:

"How shall we retaliate?" he asks, "When we enter Germany I hope General Joffre will issue a proclamation reminding everybody concerned that to the soldiers of the Allies the lives of women, children, and non-combatants are sacred. When we are before Cologne our 75 (the deadly 3½-in. French field gun) must be told—our soldiers do not need the reminder—that Cologne contains one of the Seven Wonders of the World, which must not be touched. And at Munich, Dresden, and Berlin a guard of honour must be placed before every library, museum, and art gallery.

"Our conduct in Germany must be so different from that of the Germans in Belgium and France that the very stones will recognise that our victory is the victory of civilisation.

"I would not send the masterpieces of German art to Louvain, but I would rebuild her University out of funds contributed by every country but Germany, and stock it with treasures from every land but Germany, and found a Chair of International Law, to be filled by a Belgian or English jurist, who would each year deliver a lecture on International Law and Respect for Treaty Rights!"

It is impossible for men who are Christians first and denominationalists afterwards not to sympathise with the expressions of regret that the organised religion of the country has been incapable of any common action during the present crisis. There have been numerous appeals issued in the name of different sections of the Church, but so far there has been no attempt to unite them in a common effort to educate and guide the faith and conscience of the nation. Churchmen and Nonconformists in large numbers are aware that their traditional differences have become unimportant in face of a common danger and a common need. Under the stress of a searching experience religion has become more vital and has thrown itself back upon its fundamentals, where men are far more at one than they often imagine in the days of argumentative peace. But so far there is no sign of common action or of heartfelt union in worship. At a time when a truce has been called in all other controversies, why does not the Archbishop of Canterbury cut himself adrift from the cramping proprieties of Lambeth and do the great and sensible thing which the occasion demands? If it is right in politics that the party platform should become national, is there any reason except in the punctilious minds of theologians why Dr. Clifford should not speak to Christian England from the pulpit of St. Paul's?

WHILE, however, we are in hearty agreement with the discontent that in religion alone our divisions are maintained, we must remember that the Christian conscience has spoken and the claims of righteousness have been vindicated in the speeches of our political leaders. And this seems to us in the highest degree natural and right. Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George have struck the note of confident faith in the unseen forces which mould the lives of men. They have spoken as religious men to the religious instincts of the people. Instead of appealing to prudence or expediency they have inspired us with moral vision. It is not in the messages of its professional teachers that we find the highest witness of the Christian Church to the things of the Spirit, but in the mastery of honour and righteousness over the lives of our public men, and in the response which is made by the nation to claims upon its loyalty and endurance. In this wide field of the common life the Christian conscience has spoken with power, and religion has been justified of her children.

INDEED, few things have been more impressive at the present time than the witness to the reality of the things of the Spirit which has come from the lay mind, in spite of its ingrained habit of reticence where the deeper motives and affections of life are concerned. Here, for instance, is a passage from a letter to The Times by Professor J. A. Fleming, the eminent electrical engineer. Many people will feel that his words could hardly have gained in force and impressiveness if they had been spoken in Westminster Abbey.

"No one familiar with the achievements of scientific thought would refuse to admit the indebtedness of the world to such thinkers and workers as Jacobi, Gauss, Bessel, Riemann, H. F. Weber, von Helmholtz, Kirchhoff, Hertz, and Röntgen, but the fact is quite as astonishing as it is painful that a nation which has made such contributions to the upbuilding of natural philosophy should have permitted itself also to be dominated by an immoral militarism by whose votaries sheer brute force is worshipped as the highest virtue and the only source of national advancement. Side by side with immense ability in creating and applying scientific knowledge we have an almost complete failure to recognise truth, honour, faith-keeping, and justice as the foundations of national greatness. Germany has no greater need at the present moment than some inspired prophet to enforce on her the truths of which Thomas Carlyle was so eloquent an exponent—namely, that physical force is in the long run impotent unless backed by those spiritual forces which spring only from loyalty to the everlasting difference between right and wrong."

THE same quality of living faith is present in the Declaration issued by an important group of British authors. "The undersigned writers," it begins, "comprising amongst them men and women of the most divergent political and social views, some of them having been for years ardent champions of goodwill towards Germany, and many of them extreme advocates of peace, are nevertheless agreed that Great Britain could not without dishonour have refused to take part in the present War." "Many of us," the Declaration continues, "have dear friends in Germany, many of us regard German culture with the highest respect and gratitude; but we cannot admit that any nation has the right by brute force to impose its culture upon other nations, nor that the iron military bureaucracy of Prussia represents a higher form of human society than the free constitutions of Western Europe. Whatever the world-d destiny of Germany may be, we in Great Britain are ourselves conscious of a destiny and a duty. That destiny and duty, alike for us and for all the English-speaking race, call upon us to uphold the rule of common justice between civilised peoples, to defend the rights of small nations, and to maintain the free and law-abiding ideals of Western Europe against the rule of 'Blood and Iron,' and the domination of the whole Continent by a military caste." Among the signatures attached to this impressive declaration are those of William Archer, Granville Barker, Robert Bridges, G. K. Chesterton, John Galsworthy, Thomas Hardy, Maurice Hewlett, J. W. Mackail, John Masefield, Gilbert Murray, George Macaulay Trevelyan, George Otto Trevelyan, Mary A. Ward, Margaret L. Woods, and Israel Zangwill.

ONLY the inexorable limitations of space prevented us from calling attention last week to the highly important letter on Russia by Professor Paul Vinogradoff, which appeared in the Times on September 14. Its value does not consist chiefly in its wealth of information, but in its power of suggesting to the reader the existence of a vast national life, rich in possibilities of good, which it is his business to explore before he jumps to hasty and often hostile conclusions. We are most of us too ready to think chiefly of the menace of the Slav. We imagine that Western culture has nothing to gain and much to fear from contact with the Russian spirit. Let us at least ask ourselves whether this opinion is based upon accurate information. Is it seriously contended that the civilisation of Russia and that of Western Europe can go on indefinitely in closed compartments? We are conscious that we on our side have much to give in the love of freedom and respect for representative institutions. Have the cultivated minds of Russia and the faith of its dim populations so little to offer us in return that our attitude towards them must be dictated chiefly by the civilised man's dread of barbarism?

IN the speech which Mr. Lloyd George made to the Welshmen of London last week he touched the heights of great prophecy, when he spoke of the emergence of a new patriotism as the crowning blessing of the war.

"The people of all lands," he said, "will gain more by this struggle than they comprehend at the present moment. They will be rid of the greatest menace to their freedom. That is not all. There is another blessing, infinitely greater and more enduring, which is emerging already out of this great contest—a new patriotism, richer, nobler, more exalted than the old. I see a new recognition amongst all classes high and low, shedding themselves of selfishness—a new recognition that the honour of a country does not depend merely upon the maintenance of its glory in the stricken field, but in protecting its homes from distress as well. It is a new patriotism which is bringing a new outlook over all classes. The great flood of luxury and of sloth which had submerged the land is receding, and a new Britain is appearing. We can see for the first time the fundamental things that matter in life, and that had been obscured from our vision by the tropical growth of prosperity."

It is this new patriotism which is coming to the birth in the exalted emotions of the present moment. The reality of danger, the sense of the significance of every day, the challenge to turn our dreams into action, the rapture which is born of stern sacrifice—these things are destroying all the familiar lines of division and making us conscious that first and last we are sons and daughters of the one Motherland, who has the pearl of great price in her keeping. We should despise ourselves if we thought much of our own comfort and safety; these are the mean cares of less eventful days. What can we do? What can we give? How can we acquit ourselves worthily as patriotic children of the British race? These are the only questions worthy of the hour.

But when we speak of patriotism we are aware that all good men have not an equally strong affection for the word. For some of us it glows with a splendour which no ignoble use can ever dim. For others it is a word of doubtful omen, the badge of a limited affection which shuts us off from the rest of mankind. On one side is the ineffaceable glory of it, in spite of all the ill deeds which have been done in its name. On the other is the cramping fear that patriotic feeling may be simply a prelude to the hatred of our enemies and the praise of ourselves. It is on this matter that we wish to offer a few plain words this week, not as judging others, but as defining the spiritual core of our own position.

We hope that we shall always be grateful to those who warn us of the existence of hidden snares. We know only too well that the loftiest virtue, when it is plucked out of the symmetry of Christian character and set up for solitary devotion, may give us a false sense of security. But it is an unworthy inference from the existence of danger that the virtue itself should be regarded as doubtful or commonplace, never to be practised with a resolute will or to be praised without some undercurrent of fearfulness. We judge from letters which have reached us, and from our own limited opportunities of observation, that this is exactly the way in which some people whose hearts have been long set upon peace and social reform are disposed to meet the patriotic feeling of the present moment. They find their peaceable neighbour transfigured by the consciousness that he belongs to a great nation, and at once they warn him that if he loves England too much he may love Germany too little. They listen to the praise of the temper of resolution and sacrifice in which the country has met an unexpected crisis, and they wonder whether our national sin of self-righteousness ought to be encouraged in this way. They read the speech of the Prime Minister, which crystallises the actual moral situation into a few terse sentences, and they are unmoved by its glowing appeal to our common love of honour and freedom because they imagine that with the use of an abler diplomacy we might have escaped from the miseries of war. And so they keep themselves in hand, calm and collected in their persistent sadness, ready to tone down all highly coloured language and to pierce with the shafts of their criticism every cordial expression of admiration and praise.

We have no wish to say a single word in disparagement of the high conscientiousness of this attitude of mind. We know something of the suspicion of the crowd, which is bred in the bone of people who are compelled to wander for years in the wilderness of opposition. We confess, too, to some native slowness of mind in adjusting familiar habits of thought to problems which we have never had to face in the same way before. But we believe that this policy of keeping patriotism on low diet, lest Jeshurun should wax fat and kick, is a capital moral blunder at the present time. It is an impoverishment of the individual life which is beyond all calculation, if we find ourselves in the midst of great happenings and are unable to discern the signs of the times. These days in which we live are days of exultations and of agonies, and our hearts must be large enough to receive them. The man who can only think of the physical horror of a battle, and is never uplifted by the awful joy of the redemption which is won by the consecration of death, walks blindfold through the world. As a moral agent he is weak just where he thinks he is strong, for he knows only a narrow segment of experience and is more skilful in denouncing the evil than in praising the good. In these searching hours God is trying to kill this critical and hesitating spirit in us. Already men by the hundred and the thousand are losing their own lives to find them again in the larger life of their country. If we miss the splendour of this experience and resign ourselves to a mood of fear and depression, because the days are evil, we may escape some danger of boastfulness or vain-glory, but it will be at a price which no good man ought to be willing to pay.

And who will listen to us if we do? If there is some real danger of a deterioration of national sentiment; if in the glow of their patriotism men are likely to forget the rights of other nations or the just claims of pity; if the hot passion of war or the temper of a relentless foe may engender the spirit of revenge; who will be equal to the patriotic duty of restraining these things and keeping Christian ideals of self-control and compassion in the ascendant? And when the war is over and the tasks of the new patriotism, the larger sense of equality among men and nations, the new vision of the fundamental things that matter in life, demand all the consecrated service which we can give to them; who will be able to meet the need of the hour with deep understanding of its significance for ourselves and the world and with unshaken confidence in the purposes of God? To these questions there can be only one answer. The salvation of the world, and national salvation at the moment, depend upon positive and not negative virtues. Christianity loses its power of virile moral guidance whenever it hesitates to put its strength into praising the good because it fears the approach of evil. And the same is true of patriotism, which in its highest form is Christianity applied to national duties and affections. Like everything else that concerns the deepest issues of our moral life, it must take the risks of great and decisive action. At this sublime crisis of our history it should breed in us strong and clear emotions, admiration for the noble and enduring qualities of our national life, blazing anger against baseness and cruelty and the oppression of the weak by the strong, compassion for the helpless, justice and honourable dealing towards our foes. The Christian has no use for patriotism in a minor key. He loves his country for its excellent greatness; and his love for his country gives a richer content to his love of God.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

COUNT not of great importance who is for thee, or against thee; but let this be thy aim and care, that God be with thee in every thing thou doest. Have a good conscience, and God shall well defend thee. For whom God willeth to help, no man's perverseness shall be able to hurt. If thou knowest how to be silent and suffer, without doubt thou shalt see the help of the Lord. Himself knoweth the time and manner of delivering thee, and therefore thou oughtest to resign thyself to Him. It belongeth to God to help, and to deliver from all confusion.—THOMAS À KEMPIS.

CHRISTIAN ART.

THE highest element of truth and beauty, the Spiritual, was beyond the soar of Phidias and Praxiteles; it is true, they felt a want—they yearned for it, and this yearning, stamped on their works, constitutes their undying charm. But they yearned in vain—Faith, Hope and Charity, those wings of immortality, as yet were not. Herein lies our vantage: not in our merit, not our genius, but in that we are Christians, that we start from a loftier platform, that we are raised by communion with God to a purer atmosphere, in which we see things in the light of Eternity, not simply as they are, but with their ulterior meanings, as shadows of deeper truths—an atmosphere which invests creation with the glow of love, and its human denizens with a beauty and expression of its own, a ray of heaven beaming on the countenance, especially of woman, which mere beauty of intellect or feeling, the highest charm attainable by Greece, can never rival. It is not, in a word, symmetry of form or beauty of colouring, apart or conjoined, that is required of us and that constitutes our prerogative, but the conception by the artist and expression to the spectator of the highest and holiest spiritual truths and emotions—and in this the vantage of the Bible over the Iliad is not more decided than that of Christian over Classic Art—than the depth, intensity, grandeur, and sweetness of the emotions at the command of Christian artists, as compared with those elicited by the ancients. Few will dispute this who have ever soared into the symbolic heaven of a Lombard or Gothic cathedral; renewed their vows of chivalry before the St. George of Donatello; or shared the cross and the palm, the warfare and the triumph of the Church of all ages in the sympathy of the Spirit, while contemplating the old Byzantine heads of Christ, the martyrdoms of the Lombard Giotteschi, the Paradises of Fra Angelico, the Madonnas of Perugino, Leonardo and Bellini, the "Dispute" of Raphael, and the Last Judgments of Orcagna and Michael Angelo. And yet these too are but aspirations after the Ideal, glimpses of that truth and beauty which the soul seeks after, and of which the prototype exists but in heaven. The Ideal is to us as a bright particular star which we fancy we shall grasp if we reach the top of the mountain, and so we still toil on, up and still upwards for ever; love, if it be true love, supplying the motive to persist, even though the higher we ascend the more distant it appears, the more hopeless our pursuit. Such is the Ideal, such its influence on the Artist.—from "Sketches of the History of Christian Art," by Lord Lindsay.

WE say that repose has fled
For ever the course of the river of Time;
That cities will crowd to its edge
In a blacker incessanter line;
That the din will be more on its banks,
Denser the trade on its stream,
Flatter the plain where it flows,
Fiercer the sun overhead.
That never will those on its breast
See an ennobling sight,
Drink of the feeling of quiet again.

But what was before us we know not,
And we know not what shall succeed.

Haply, the river of Time—
As it grows, as the towns on its marge
Fling their wavering lights
On a wider statelier stream—
May acquire, if not the calm
Of its early mountainous shore,
Yet a solemn peace of its own.

O LORD, who callest thine own sheep by name, grant, we entreat thee, that all whom thou callest by the voice of conscience may straightway arise to do thy most compassionate will, or abide patiently to suffer it. Amen.

MAKE us of quick and tender conscience, O Lord; that understanding we may obey every word of thine, and discerning may follow every suggestion of thine indwelling spirit. Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. Amen.

THE ATTITUDE OF "THE INQUIRER."

SIR,—I have been asked to try and express the gratitude of some of your readers for the noble tone THE INQUIRER has taken since the war began, especially for the articles on National Responsibility and The Moral Ultimatum. These are indeed inspiring. We wish also to thank Mr. Jacks for his manly letter of September 12 and Mr. Gow for his article on War against War. It seems to us "childish"—to use the expression of one of your correspondents—to talk of war as "the supreme atrocity." Can anyone fail to see that it is a consequence and not a cause; that it is, in fact, the result of many apparently trifling and obscure phenomena—that, combining, render it inevitable? We do not talk of the "atrocity" of a tempest or an avalanche, or even of a disease. Given the causes, a war is inevitable; and the only thing to do is to face it with generous courage. It is a pity some of your correspondents remind us of their attitude during the Boer War. Do you not think it time to cease using the word Mafeking as a term of contempt? To some of us it brings memories of long and anxious suspense, followed by one day of wild excitement in London. I was in the City on that day, and saw grey-haired men dancing for joy like little children. Joy not for a victory—only because one little insignificant town had been relieved and a few brave people had not died of starvation. The excitement showed how great the suspense had been. There may have been regrettable incidents. I saw none. Vulgar people will express their feelings in a vulgar way. But is that worse than having no feelings to express? I wonder. At any rate, I am glad that once I saw a city mad with joy.—Yours, &c.,

SIR,—At the risk of being thought to be "a little soft" and lacking in the sternness you commend, I venture to suggest that we are in no little danger in our would-be struggle against a frightful evil in Europe, for which all the great Powers are equally responsible, of assuming a spirit of over self-righteousness, and in our eagerness to escape all blame for a war resulting from a Europe organised in hostile camps, from huge weapons of war, from secret foreign policies and a crushing industrialism, of trying "to indict a nation" and to rivet on the Common Man of Germany a spirit primarily belonging to, and rampant in, the dominant classes of all Europe. Let us not forget our own Prussians. "Germany's policy, gentlemen," said Lord Roberts not so many months ago at Manchester, "is an excellent policy. It is, or should be, the policy of every nation prepared to play a great part in history." And, again, in The Times of October 9, 1911, "My country right or wrong, and right or wrong my country, is the sentiment most treasured in the breast of any one worthy of the name of man." This "Prussian" spirit is not the peculiar possession of Germany, nor would it be more intelligible to German common people than to English or to French. Mr. John Dendy cannot seriously suppose that the German millions are all disciples of Bernhardt. Indeed, at this moment, thanks to a deft, commercial smartness, probably more English than Germans have read the famous author and his inhuman book. To destroy the evil which is eating the heart out of Europe it may be necessary now to carry this war we have all been busily preparing for to a point which shall prevent its renewal. But if in the process we are going to lose all trace of the "international mind," and see ourselves with the poet laureate as the champions of Christ against the devil, we run the risk of suffering not merely the fate which overtakes all pharisees, but of being possessed by the very devil we suppose ourselves to be combating.—Yours, &c.,

"TEN YEARS HENCE."

SIR,—In these critical times it is reassuring to find a cautious and thoughtful man who has enough confidence in the future to announce what he is going to do ten years hence. At the expiration of that period Mr. George Armstrong tells us that he hopes to compare two cuttings from THE INQUIRER of last week, containing respectively Mr. Flower's contribution and mine. I too hope he will be able to do so. Whether he will or not depends very largely on the issue of the present conflict. If the town where Mr. Armstrong lives should happen to share the fate of Louvain he may have some difficulty in finding his newspaper-cuttings ten years hence. At any rate, I would suggest his keeping them in some place where they cannot be easily found by another person. I tremble to think of what Mr. Armstrong's fate would be if a German officer quartered in his house should discover my contribution to THE INQUIRER among his archives. In that event it is pretty certain that the comparison with Mr. Flower's contribution will never be made. But let us suppose the contrary, and imagine Mr. Armstrong, ten years hence, quietly comparing the two contributions in the peace of his study with a view to communicating the result to THE INQUIRER of that date. Then I hope he will remember to whom he owes the security which enables him to make the comparison, the liberty to express it, and a free newspaper in which it can be published. He will owe it to the men who, when most of us—myself, alas! among them—were blind and deaf to every warning, knew what was coming, and did their best to prepare England for this war. He will owe it to those who, when the war came, believed in the righteousness of their cause, and fought with the valour which that belief alone can inspire. "Had those men not believed in the righteousness of their cause," he may then say to himself, "these newspaper cuttings from THE INQUIRER of 1914 would probably have perished. But for those men I should not be able to publish the results of this my present comparison in THE INQUIRER of 1924—for there would be no INQUIRER to publish them in. But for them, democratic principles, and civil and religious liberty, would have been crushed long ago under the heel of the military despot." If Mr. Armstrong remembers this I have little to fear from the results of his comparison ten years hence. I suppose that he would find no profanity in the belief that God has a part in the strife for civil and religious liberty. Well, it is civil and religious liberty for which our young men are shedding their blood, which Sir Edward Grey is defending by his foreign policy, and Lord Kitchener upholding by force of arms.

The same thought is suggested by the letter of Mr. Flower. He, too, would place a watertight door between his religion, which he loves, and the war, which he hates. But the two cannot be separated. The fortunes of the one are interbound with the fortunes of the other. Believing, as I do, that "God is with" Mr. Flower in the preaching of so lofty and beneficent a faith, I cannot, at the same time, believe that God is indifferent to a war the results of which will exercise a vital influence on all the conditions under which that faith is delivered and received. If God is on the side of Mr. Flower, as a Christian teacher, must He not also be on the side of those who are giving their lives in order that Mr. Flower may have freedom to deliver his message, and leisure to reflect upon it, and an audience of free minds to receive and accept his teaching? If Germany wins, Mr. Flower will have the same kind of difficulty about his message that Mr. Armstrong will have about his newspaper-cuttings. He will have to submit his teaching to the approval of the Prussian police. What they will say to him may be gathered from the two following passages from the work of Dr. Emil Reich:—

(1) "Friedrich Lange, erstwhile editor of the Tägliche Rundschau, has gone so far as to invent and preach a species of 'German Religion,' and from many pulpits it has been announced that 'the German people is the elect of God, and its enemies are the enemies of the Lord.'"

(2) "The Vorwärts records that to a numerous and sympathetic audience of professors and students of Protestant Theology the theologian Lezius made a speech, which was loudly applauded, in which he said: 'The Polish press should be simply annihilated. All Polish societies should be suppressed without the slightest apology being made for such a measure. This summary procedure should be likewise applied to the French and Danish press, as well as to the societies of Alsace, Lorraine and Schleswig-Holstein. Especially should no consideration whatever be shown to anything relating to the Poles. The Poles should be looked upon as helots. They should be allowed but three privileges: to pay taxes, to serve in the army, and to shut their jaws.'"

I would earnestly appeal to Mr. Flower to reconsider the whole question in the light of this quotation. Can we conceive that God has no relation to a war which, if it ends in a certain way, will leave Mr. Flower, his ministry, and his congregation at the mercy of men inspired by the ideas of the amiable theologian Lezius? If the war ends as we desire, will not Mr. Flower also remember those to whom he is indebted for so great a deliverance? Will he not join me in believing that God was with them?

We need not be in the least disconcerted by the fact that the Kaiser also believes that God is with him. As we defy the Kaiser in other things, let us defy him in this also. Was Luther's faith in God upset by the knowledge that the Catholic princes and prelates who confronted him at Worms also claimed the Divine support? Does the martyr at the stake forswear God because the inquisitor lights the fire in God's name?

I fully admit that great theoretical difficulties attend the assertion that "God is with us in the war." But vastly greater difficulties will have to be encountered by those who affirm that God is not with us. And to this may be added a consideration of some practical importance. If the whole British nation were to adopt the view of Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Flower, that God is not with us, it is certain that Germany would win; in which event Mr. Flower would be ordered (in the delicate phraseology of the theologian Lezius) to content himself with the three privileges accorded to the Poles; while Mr. Armstrong's plans for ten years hence would never be carried into effect.—Yours, &c.,

IS GOD WITH US IN WAR?

SIR,—Is it not true that God is always with us when we cleave unto the right, as near as we can see it? Could he be God except it were so? If this be granted, it is manifest, God will be equally with either of the opponents, who, taking different views, cleave equally as nearly as each may to what seems right to each. The good which God effects is not the resultant triumph of the mightier; but first, the ennoblement of those who had been worthy of their first nobility, and secondly, a benefit which both partake of though unconceived beforehand by either of the twain. Those who owe much thought to the religious influence of a Prince of Peace and to the older thought from which his was descended, have learned to cherish visions of a blissful age when wars shall be no more. But it is folly, and impiety as well, to forget the real present in visions of the ideal future. The necessity for war is ideal, but present. The alternative is martyr-non-resistance. Who can doubt that many a victim before ignorant power has been divinely called to suffer martyrdom? Who can believe that every victim of an unjust power is called to suffer it? The latter is the position of a people innocent and unprovoked threatened with damage or destruction by a people bellicose. Yet the very fact that visions of the blissful age when wars shall be no more are sent from God, teaching that war is unideal, gives us our mission to scatter, by warfare, peoples that delight in war. "There was war in heaven." Yet the same fact teaches the harder lesson, in profiting by which there lies the proof of true fidelity, the conduct of the mission must be, not vengeful, but judicial. In proportion as we defend ourselves, and other peoples in the same plight with us, with justice, mercy and humility, God will be with us. And if the contention of some of us is true, that we have indeed that mission to scatter the people that delight in war, God will be with us more; but only if we fulfil it on that same principle of justice, mercy and humility.—Yours, &c.,

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

SIR,—I agree in one point, and in one point only, with your correspondent Mr. Short, namely, that in this unprecedented stress of war we have to "take short views," in the sense of concentrating attention on the problem of getting the required number of men in time to be of use, and that some of the general arguments for and against compulsory military training in time of peace are for the moment out of place. But the particular arguments urged by him in favour of compulsion are rather weakened than strengthened by this change of standpoint. His complaint is that under the present voluntary system the burden of defence is not equally shared. He is thus taking his stand on the very principle which happens to be the foundation of the case against conscription. If he had thrown over that principle on the plea of extreme urgency, and insisted that we must commandeered men, as we have already commandeered horses and vans, wherever we can find them, leaving the adjustment of unequal sacrifices to be made after the war, if at all, he would have been rather more difficult to answer. One could only have argued that, upon the facts, the stage at which necessity has no law had not yet been reached. But to talk of equalising burdens by a law of (so-called) universal compulsion is as though one were to equalise the burden of transport by strapping packages of equal weight on to an elephant, a cart horse, and a Shetland pony. Equality of sacrifice, if it is to be real, must be measured in terms of capacity and sensibility, and there are few more cruel forms of inequality than the lumping together, for the business of killing or being killed, of human beings who may have nothing whatever in common beyond the fact of being physically sound males within certain age limits. The other day two French priests, who had been assisting the incumbent of the Catholic Church at Richmond, were suddenly recalled to join the ranks of their countrymen as private soldiers. What comparison can there be between the feelings of such men and those of the peasant conscript who told the Tsar of Russia that the greatest favour he could ask was to be sent again to the front in spite of his wounds, because "it was so dull at home, and so interesting to march through a new town every day."?

This kind of inequality is inherent in the very nature of compulsory service, and there is no possible way of redressing it. On the other hand, under the system of voluntary enlistment, the equalisation of the burden of defence is capable of being (I am far from saying that it actually is) carried to a very high degree of precision, through the agency of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Tax-paying, or rather the drudgery of earning the wherewithal to pay taxes, and military service in a bloody war, are both more or less distasteful to most men, but in very different degrees; and if it is left to each individual of military age to choose whether he will be a taxpayer or a tax-receiver, the taxes being raised up to the figure which will suffice to buy the required number of fit recruits in the open market, the choice will be determined largely by relative aptitude for civil or military employment, and thus we get the nearest practicable approximation to your correspondent's ideal: "the maximum of efficiency with the minimum of unpleasantness."

As to efficiency, the official record of the performances of our voluntarily enlisted army, just published at the time of writing, is surely significant. "There is no doubt whatever," we are told, "that our men have established a personal ascendancy over the Germans"—that is, over the model conscript army of Europe—"and that they are conscious of the fact that with anything like even numbers the result would not be doubtful." No similar superiority has so far been shown by, or claimed for, the conscript army of our brave allies. Unless we are arrogant enough to assert that Germans and Frenchmen, taken in the mass, are intrinsically inferior for fighting purposes to the British, the simplest explanation is that Sir John French's troops are picked, in a sense in which the enormous forced levies of the other belligerents are not, and cannot be. Compulsion cannot be applied selectively without flagrant injustice, nor can discipline be enforced by threat of dismissal, where it is likely to be the very thing that the offender desires. In every mass of conscripts there is almost certain to be a percentage, sufficient to lower the tone of the whole, of men whose heart is not in their work. Similar dry rot may no doubt appear among voluntary troops, but is much more easily preventable, provided that we do not insist on cheapness and quantity at the expense of quality.

Mr. Short writes as though our voluntary system were a sham, because "compulsion of many sorts drives men into the army and navy." This is neither more nor less true than to say that compulsion drives men into the factory or the counting-house, into the medical or the scholastic profession, or (so far as it is paid) into the ministry of religion. Except the comparatively few who have inherited wealth or are maintained out of charity, or live by robbery, every man has to live by rendering some service for which some fellow man, or some collection of his fellow men, thinks it worth while to pay. If a youth chooses one of the fighting services, it may be because there is no other career open to him, or it may be because it affords more scope than civil employment for the kind of effort that he least dislikes or most enjoys. To assume that the motive for enlisting must be either sheer economic necessity or such "mere love of fighting" as would deserve the epithet "horrible," is surely to confound the spirit of the shepherd's dog with that of the wolf. The fair and charitable presumption is that the recruit, whether commissioned officer or private, without proposing to go into the merits of each particular quarrel in which his country may be engaged, joins with a vague but fairly well founded notion that the Union Jack stands generally for freedom and justice, and therefore that soldiering is, for an Englishman, here and now, quite as honest and useful a trade as any other.

That the rank and file of the regular army should be drawn mainly from the poorer classes was natural and right when the mode of fighting was such as to demand nothing from the private soldier but brute courage and mechanical obedience, qualities that are purchaseable at a low price because the demand for them in other employments is small. It is less natural now that the weapons used, and the prevalent tactics, necessitate greater individual intelligence and self-reliance. It does seem as though there were room for further improvement in the rate of pay and other conditions of service, especially when such a sudden and unprecedented demand has to be met. We who are not fighting ourselves ought to insist on paying the full value of the services of those who can and do fight, and not to squeeze out of them by taunts and entreaties, presenting white feathers, and so forth, more than their fair share of the common effort. Reform in this direction would be far more truly democratic than the sham equality of so-called universal compulsion. In conclusion, I must respectfully protest against the false antithesis of "national" and "voluntary."

Every service is national which is paid for and controlled by the State. Our present army is both national and voluntary.—Yours, &c.,

ROLAND K. WILSON.

London, September 10, 1914.

[Mr. Short's plea for Compulsory Service appeared on September 5. We regret that pressure on our space has compelled us to hold over Sir Roland K. Wilson's important reply till our present issue.—ED. of INQ.]

REFUGEES AND WAR DISTRESS.

SIR,—During the last ten days or more a number of letters and messages have reached me at Essex Hall inquiring about Belgian Refugees, with offers of hospitality and in some cases of work. Nearly all my correspondents would prefer Protestants or persons not connected with any organised religious community. I have made their desires known to those in charge of the work of finding homes for women and children, but there does not seem to be much prospect of obtaining any Belgian refugees other than Roman Catholics. I have asked the Rev. James Hocart, of Brussels, to make it known that any refugees associated with the Liberal religious movement in Belgium should report themselves at Essex Hall. Some Austrian, Hungarian, and German people, innocent as any of us of responsibility for this terrible war, have had their anxiety and suffering relieved through the hospitality and kindness of Unitarians. It is humiliating to find so many people ready to accept and to make the most sweeping statements and hasty generalisations respecting every "alien enemy" in our midst. That our souls may be kept free from the stain of such cruel intolerance and blind passion should surely be the daily prayer of all religious people.

There is now at Essex Hall a good supply of material cut out and ready for making up into useful garments. Any congregation, mission, or Sunday school in the metropolitan area in need of such material should make application to Mrs. Bowie or to Mrs. Spedding. This work may be done by the members of the sewing society, or paid for as those locally concerned deem wise and good. Several groups and individuals have done some work; and it is hoped that as the winter approaches, a stock will be accumulated for the use of men, women, and children in distress owing to the war, who are in need of clothing. Parcels have already been forwarded from Essex Hall for Belgian refugees and others in distress. The Unitarian vans will probably be used by the Red Cross Society, or in some other helpful way which opportunity may present.—Yours, &c.,

W. COPELAND BOWIE.

Essex Hall, London, September 23, 1914.

THE WOMEN'S LEAGUE AND THE WAR.

SIR,—Since Miss Withall thinks that Mrs. Drummond's excellent letter leaves the "economic question" of the League's policy out of account, may I be allowed a few words on this side of the subject. Apparently Miss Withall and many others think voluntary work harmful, as involving the taking of work, and therefore wages, from those who are in need. Let us, then, be quite consistent. Let all those who happen to have an income in excess of their own personal needs see to it, that they do nothing themselves which others could perform for money. They must not dress themselves, for a lady's maid or a valet may be needing a situation, nor must they walk when cabmen and taxi-drivers find it hard to get fares. All typewriting and letter writing must be done by a secretary, and it would be far better for them to pay some one else to teach in the Sunday school than attempt the task themselves. They should not attempt the work of organising societies, for this should be done by paid officials. This appears to me the logical conclusion of much we read to-day. Is it really the better way? All work for which we cannot pay should be left undone, and if anyone possess enough money to pay for all personal and other service, they are apparently condemned to die of absolute inaction!—Yours, &c.,

CAROLINE ASPLAND JONES.

Endsleigh Palace Hotel, N.W.,

September 23.

Mr. G. G. Armstrong asks us to state that he sent us a correction of one sentence in his letter last week, which unfortunately came into our hands too late for insertion. The sentence, "It is beyond dispute, I fear, that atrocities have been committed even graver than the atrocities which report invariably attributes to both sides in a war," should read as follows: "I fear that some of the atrocity charges against Germans are true, though it has to be remembered that atrocities as grave are invariably attributed to both sides in every war."

FOR THE CHILDREN.

RECRUITS WANTED.

ALL England is talking of patriotism now, and I am sure every boy and girl wants to be a "patriot." We just love to hear of fine heroic deeds, don't we?—and of the courage and endurance of our soldiers and seamen. It is fine to hear of men willingly facing suffering and death to protect their own land, and to be every bit as willing to give up their lives for others who have been cruelly down-trodden. Day by day you will be reading or hearing stories which will make you thrill with pride because you are English. But why are you feeling so proud? You are not fighting, you are not giving up your life to protect your country. Perhaps your fathers, uncles, and brothers are at the front, and, of course, you can't help being awfully pleased when you hear how brave they are, because you love them, and it is so nice to feel we can make heroes of members of our family. On the other hand, you would feel sad and ashamed if you heard them spoken of as cowards. But even if no one you know is fighting for England's honour and liberty, you've still got that same pride in being English. I wonder if you can dimly see what it means. If you can't, never mind; but try to understand as you grow older that we are all linked together in such a strange way that no one can do any wrong or good without its affecting every one of us. And so, you see, that must make us very, very careful as to what we say and do.

Is it right to go to war, and, if not, why are we fighting? Well, the strange and horrible thing is that at the present moment we find it is the only way we can save England's honour, as I daresay your parents or friends will explain to you, but all the time we know it is a bad way. Indeed, not only in England, but in other countries too, grown-up people who love and believe in God as the Father of all his children on earth, and who want to become like Jesus, are feeling more and more what a wicked thing war is, how cruel it is to kill each other in the way we are doing, and what misery it means to everybody. It is not only very wrong, but it is so stupid too, for we plunge our own country as well as that of others into so much suffering. And think of all the mothers and children—not only in our own country, but in Germany, France, Russia, and Belgium—whose hearts at the present moment are terribly sad and anxious as they think of their dear ones at the war, and miss them so much in their homes. Those of you who read THE INQUIRER, and are in comfortable surroundings, are not likely to know what a very hard time thousands of poor children—especially in parts of Lancashire—are having now.

Most of the soldiers' and seamen's families have very little to live on, and in addition to these there are also many fathers now, who are not sailors or soldiers, who are worse off, and there are mothers, too, who have been thrown out of work, and these cannot earn enough money to give their children proper food and clothing. Already little ones with white pinched faces are pulling at their anxious mothers' skirts, begging for "bitties" (bread and butter), for they are hungry, and have had so little to eat. And things will grow worse as the winter creeps on, for they will be short of fire and clothing too.

Now, as long as we live, we must never stop fighting for our countries' honour and freedom, but in the future we hope to fight for it in quite a different way to what we are doing at present. And we must begin at once to form battalions for this new army. It ought to be a tremendous one, because we are going to ask boys and girls, men and women, all to join. We are going to enlist as soldiers of Jesus Christ, and on one of our banners we will have these words:—

And may the nation see
That men should brothers be,
And form one family
The wide world o'er.

We must get into training at once, because the fight is going to be a difficult one. We can try and copy all that is fine in the conduct and spirit of our brave soldiers on the field, but we shall no longer be allowed under Christ's banner to go forth to kill and destroy people. As young recruits in his service we must begin by learning perfect obedience to his commands, to restrain our tempers, and think of others before ourselves, and, remembering that we are all God's family, try our best to love those whom we now call our enemies. That will be the hardest of all, but it is Christ's command to us. And he has plenty of work for us to do. He wants to make us all fine strong men and women, and then he will ask us to give our lives to him in helping to turn the ugly and wicked things out of the world, in bringing comfort to the sick and sad, in helping the poor, and in trying to make God's kingdom upon earth more like his glorious kingdom in Heaven. Don't you think that's a grand thing to try for? Perhaps you will say to me: But if people fight us, we must fight them, if only in self-defence. We won't go into that now, but there is one thing certain, and that is that, in both private and national quarrels, we should not be the first to fight, or allow ourselves to be easily provoked. If we check a quarrelsome spirit in ourselves, we can do an enormous amount to bring about peace in the world. I should like to tell you a little fable I came across the other day, which is worth remembering. This is it: Two foxes lived together in the depth of a forest. They never had a cross word with each other. At last one of them said in very polite fox language, "Let us try to get up a quarrel." "Very well," said the other. "Just as you please; but how shall we do it?" "Oh, it's easy enough," said the first, "two-legged people quarrel, and I don't see why we should not too." So they tried all sorts of ways, but could not get up a quarrel, because they were so used to gentle, peaceful words that one or other of them was always giving way, and the quarrel never came off. Finally, the fox that had first spoken about the matter brought two stones into their little den. Laying them down before his companion, he said: "There, now, you say that these stones are yours, and I'll say they are mine; then we can get up a quarrel, and scratch and fight each other just as the two-legged people do. All ready now. I'll begin. These stones are mine!" "Very well," answered the other fox, very gently, "you are quite welcome to them." "But we shall never get up a quarrel at all, at this rate," said the first fox, jumping up and licking his lips. "You old simpleton, don't you know that it takes two to make a quarrel?"

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

WHAT SOME LEADING AMERICANS THINK ABOUT THE WAR.

THE following extracts from private correspondence with Americans has been sent us by a contributor whose name is well known to the readers of THE INQUIRER. The names of the writers are necessarily withheld. We have seen the originals from which the extracts are taken:—

(1) (From a great thinker):—"I write this brief and wholly unworthy and inefficient word to tell you how much I sympathise, as friend, as colleague, as father, and as brother, with you and yours, with your country, and with all whom you love, at this troubled moment, when the bandit of Berlin is cursing the human race with his long-prepared and now suddenly outbursting diabolism. Of him I have no right to predict the fortune. My views about the problem of evil permit no such predictions. I can only hope that the devil will soon fly away with him, and deliver his land (which I love) from the disgrace of him (and thus "interpret" him). But of you all who must just now meet this sad problem, I have indeed a right to hope that the deliverance from this spoiler, the victory over this unspeakable wretch, may come soon, and gloriously, and as we your brethren, and as all who love the truth, the community of mankind, and the unity and triumph of the spirit desire it to come. We are with you in this trouble, we who are, as I trust, true Americans. For myself, I think of your beautiful family, of your house that is so dear to me, of all the hearts in — and in your family and in that of Mrs. —, and I remember how a sword must pierce so many such hearts ere long. My own heart aches for you; but I also hope that you may all be strengthened and victorious."

(2) (From a leading New Testament scholar):—"When I last wrote I had not received your letter with its reference to England's firm and conscientious stand. I want now to add a line—perhaps needlessly—to say how unanimous is the sentiment here of approval of your course as laid before the world in Grey's White Paper. For Germany, too, no less than for all Christendom, the hour of the downfall of the oligarchy of 'blood and iron' peace (!) by domination and desolation, the 'gospel of the mailed fist,' and the doctrine that Might makes Right, will be an hour of deliverance. England's cost in securing it will probably not be the greatest, but great enough to be heroic, and undertaken by deliberate free choice, because honour and good faith meant something to her."

(3) (From the editor of a well-known magazine):—"How infinitely I feel for you and your people at this time. The unanimity of opinion here is very striking. I cannot recall any time when the minds of all men were so unanimous and so fixed in one idea that England is fighting a good fight, and that her cool heroism cannot be in vain. The only discordant notes are the natural outcries of various German professors and Congressmen from German districts. The vast bulk of the population believes that France and England represent the forces which alone make for lasting peace, and, if the hideous war must be fought, we feel it is a grievous misfortune that the Slav should find the Saxon his natural ally, and that those millions of painstaking, hard-working, civilised Germans should be dragged to war by the Kaiser's chariot."

(4) (From the ex-President of a great University):—"All educated Americans feel the profoundest sympathy with the high purpose and the present sacrifices of the British people, and anticipate for the Allies ultimate success in their defence of liberty and law."

THE UNITED STATES AND PEACE.

A NATIONAL DAY OF PRAYER.

PRESIDENT WILSON has issued a proclamation calling for a day of prayer, Sunday, October 4, to Almighty God that He overrule the counsel of men and vouchsafe peace to the warring nations of Europe.

The proclamation, written by the President himself, the first and only one of its kind ever issued from the White House, is as follows:—

By the President of the United States of America

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS great nations of the world have taken up arms against one another, and war now draws millions of men into battle whom the counsel of statesmen have not been able to save from the terrible sacrifice,

AND WHEREAS in this, as in all things, it is our privilege and duty to seek counsel and succour of Almighty God, humbling ourselves before Him, confessing our weakness and our lack of any wisdom equal to these things,

AND WHEREAS it is the especial wish and longing of the people of the United States, in prayer and counsel and all friendliness, to serve the cause of peace;

THEREFORE, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do designate Sunday, the 4th day of October next, a day of prayer and supplication and do request all God-fearing persons to repair on that day to their places of worship there to unite their petitions to Almighty God that, overruling the counsel of men, setting straight the things they cannot govern or alter, taking pity on the nations now in the throes of conflict, in His mercy and goodness showing a way where men can see none, He vouchsafe His children healing peace again, and restore once more that concord among men and nations without which there can be neither happiness nor true friendship nor any wholesome fruit of toil or thought in the world; praying also to this end that He forgive us our sins, our ignorance of His holy will, our wilfulness and many errors, and lead us in the paths of obedience to places of vision and to thoughts and counsels that purge and make wise.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this eighth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundredth and thirty-ninth.

WOODROW WILSON.

WE are requested to state that the Rev. H. H. Johnson, secretary of the National Conference Union for Social Service, is now residing in Evesham. All correspondence in answer to the letter which appeared in our columns last week, or on other business connected with the Union, should be sent to him at 29, Greenhill, Evesham.

SIR. H. GREENWAY HOWSE.

SIR H. G. HOWSE, late President of the Royal College of Surgeons, died on the 16th inst., at his residence, Tower House, Cudham, Kent. The second son of Mr. H. E. Howse, of Bath, Sir Henry was born at Lyncombe Hall, Bath, in 1841, and was educated at University College School, London, and Guy's Hospital. He became a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1868, was appointed assistant surgeon at Guy's Hospital in 1870, and surgeon three years later. He was lecturer on anatomy at Guy's Hospital in 1871, and on surgery in 1888, and was elected to the Council of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1889. Sir Henry was author of many scientific and professional papers, which were published in the medical journals, and in the Guy's Hospital reports. He married in 1881 the youngest daughter of the Rev. T. L. Marshall, of Exeter. His knighthood was conferred upon him in 1902, after he had served two years as President of the Royal College of Surgeons.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Bolton: Bank-street Chapel.—At the services on Sunday last the following officers and men connected with the school or chapel, at present engaged with His Majesty's forces on active service, were commended to the thoughts and prayers of the congregation:—Lieut. Lovell C. Haslam (18th Hussars); Major Algernon C. Haslam, Capt. Percy C. Pilling, Harry Taylor, Edmund Naylor, Harry Bromley, Edgar Bromley (5th Battalion Loyal North Lancashires); Tom Sefton, Wilnot B. Walsh (8th Battalion Loyal North Lancashires); Major Roger G. Higgin (3rd East Lancashire Field Artillery); Lieut. Philip Crook, Fred. Habgood, Harry Bickerstaffe (Duke of Lancaster's Own Yeomanry); Edward Crook (Royal Army Medical Corps); Arthur Roberts, James Ratcliffe, Wm. Broughton, A. W. Fletcher (Public Schools' and Old Boys' Corps); Tom Broughton (King's Own Lancasters); Henry Warburton (13th Cavalry Reserves); Ernest Kay (Royal Engineers). Twenty-one names in all.

Cullompton.—The Sunday-school anniversary, united with the harvest festival, was celebrated last Sunday in delightful weather.

The new chapel lends itself excellently to suitable decoration, and the musical services were greatly enjoyed, though a permanent organ has not yet been provided. The Rev. Jeffery Worthington, who will celebrate his ministerial jubilee on October 5, preached in the morning and evening, and Mr. C. H. Morgan gave an address at a service for young people in the afternoon.

Heywood.—In consequence of the war it has been decided not to hold the proposed bazaar in connection with the Unitarian Church at present, and the donors have been informed that it is postponed indefinitely. The scheme will come up for consideration again as soon as an opportunity presents itself.

Jamaica: Kingston.—The Rev. E. Ethelred Brown writes that there is now an organised Unitarian Church in the city of Kingston, holding regular Sunday services in a fine and suitably furnished hall, situate at No. 16, Smith-lane.

Lewes.—The quiet country town of Lewes has suddenly become the centre of considerable activity owing to the fact that between 10,000 and 11,000 recruits are quartered there for the purpose of training at Seaford. Every facility has been given to the authorities in providing accommodation for such a large body of men, and special services are being held, or entertainments given in connection with the various churches and religious institutions. At Westgate Chapel Lecture Hall a concert has been given every evening, the hall being invariably crowded. Those responsible for the entertainment have been the Rev. J. M. Connell, Miss Funnell, Mrs. Worthington, Miss M. Beck, Miss Packwood, Miss Burstow, and other ladies, while Mr. C. Severs has been a very popular contributor. A reading-room has been arranged in the schoolroom (entrance in Bull-lane).

Liscard.—A very successful vocal recital in aid of the funds of the British Red Cross Society was given in the Memorial Church Hall on Wednesday, September 16, by Miss Rossetta Key, of Boston, U.S.A., assisted by Miss Ruth L. Pearson, Mr. Sydney H. Lunt, and Mr. H. Talbot Pearson, on the violin, 'cello, and piano.

Liverpool.—The Revs. Charles Craddock, Stanley A. Mellor, J. Collins Odgers, and Robert F. Rattray have addressed the following letter to the congregations of the Ancient Chapel, Hope-street Church, and Ullet-road Church:—"At a time when nations are engaged in war, it is surely felt that peculiar demands are made on everyone. In such an hour the faith and fervour of religion have to be turned directly into channels of service and sacrifice. There are calls for service at home as well as in the actual fighting line, and to such calls, with admirable promptness in the present emergency, response is being made. But, in such a crisis, eager practical activity does not constitute the whole task of religion. It is of the first importance, of most urgent need that the faith and inward power of the spiritual life should be maintained, and lifted to the highest possible level—in prayer, devotion, worship, and the cultivation of all spiritual gifts. In these days of trial, our service of prayer and devotion is surely as necessary as our practical activity, our endeavour to lift up our souls to God as important as our offer of help wherever help is needed. We feel, indeed, that the finest service we can render for our country and the world is to cherish and to make manifest in rich, abundant life the fruits of the spirit. For this supreme service we cannot too soon or too often seek preparation. Therefore, as ministers of the Gospel to whose charge has been committed the care of a portion of the religious life of this city, we appeal to our people to be, with us, instant in prayer, fervent in supplication, that in all things we, and all our fellows, may preserve, in the time of trial and in the time of victory, a lofty, generous, and noble spirit of idealism. As a humble means to this end, we propose to increase our religious exercises by holding a weekly united service of prayer and supplication in our three city churches in turn, and we earnestly hope that you will do your utmost to participate with us in this endeavour." The first service was held on Thursday, September 24, at 8 p.m., in Hope-street Church.

Manchester: Moss Side.—We are asked to state that owing to the unsettlement caused by the war the appointment of the Rev. T. M. Salmon to the Unitarian Free Church is in the first instance to be only for three months.

Nottingham.—We have received an excellent little pamphlet "How to Save in War Time," by M. B., which has been prepared for free distribution among the poorer members of the High Pavement Chapel and Sunday school. It contains directions for the preparation of inexpensive and nourishing meals and hints on household economies. Copies may be had, price one penny, for distribution among poor friends and neighbours elsewhere. Apply to the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, Elmhurst, Thorncliffe-road, Nottingham.

Sheffield.—The Rev. John W. Lee, of Whitley Bay, formerly Baptist minister, and for the past four years secretary of the North Eastern district branch of the Workers' Educational Association, having received a certificate of recognition from the Northern Advisory Board, has been unanimously appointed assistant minister to the Rev. C. J. Street, of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, and minister-in-charge of the Attercliffe Unitarian Church. He begins his new duties on October 18.

Sidmouth.—The Rev. T. Bowen Evans, M.A., who is spending the winter at Sidmouth, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Old Meeting, Sidmouth, during the next six months.

Stockport.—After being closed eight weeks to enable the vestry to have the Stockport Unitarian Church, the schoolroom, and subsidiary rooms thoroughly overhauled and decorated, special services were held on the occasion of the re-opening of the church on Sunday last. The Rev. H. E. Perry preached to large congregations. The organ has been thoroughly overhauled and renovated. The appearance of the interior of the church has undergone a notable change and improvement. The central block of pews, which formerly extended across the front half of the church, has been bisected, so that the centre aisle now extends uninterruptedly from the entrance to the church to the chancel. Electric light has also been installed.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

PENAL REFORM IN WAR TIME.

The Penal Reform League publishes its quarterly Record later than usual, and, it is admitted, not without anxious thought and some misgiving. Lord Sydenham, writing to the Times on August 7, said: "All associations and leagues formed to advance causes which, for the time, have ceased to exist as practical objects must abandon their activities, and seek so far as possible to utilise their organisations to meet national needs." We are reminded, however, in the manifesto issued by the Society of Friends that in time of war all men of goodwill may prepare for peace, and the Penal Reform League believes that as it is working for a cause which truly expresses a national need, its activities ought to be continued. "Probably few recognise," says the Record, "how deep down the intelligent propaganda of penal reform reaches towards the foundations of true peace, which can have no firm basis save in the bedrock of justice which we seek. It strikes at the roots both of the war that is called war, and of the war that is called peace. It is well known that part of the aftermath of war is an increase of crime. Is it not, therefore, a public duty to prepare for that aftermath by working for the minimising of the causes of crime, and for better ways of dealing with crime? Penal reform is not quite out of place in war time. It is not quite one of the 'causes which—for the time—have ceased to exist.' We must not entirely banish it from our minds."

"WHAT THEY FOUGHT EACH OTHER FOR."

"As a humble follower of Mr. Norman Angell," Mr. G. M. Trevelyan writes in a recent essay, "I regret that the well-meaning poet who sang long ago of 'old Kaspar' was not historically better informed. To choose Blenheim as an example of a useless waste of blood and treasure was unfortunate, for it was one of the few battles thoroughly worth fighting. 'What they fought each other for!' Why, to save us all from belonging to the French king, who had at that moment got Spain, Italy, Belgium, and half Germany in his pocket. To prevent Western Europe from sinking under a Czarism inspired by the Jesuits. To make the 'Sun King's' system of despotism and religious persecution look so weak and silly beside English freedom that all the philosophers and wits of the new century would make mock of it. Who would have listened to Voltaire and Rousseau, or even to Montesquieu, if Blenheim had gone the other way, and the Grand Monarch had been gathered in glory to the grave? We are always telling ourselves 'How England saved Europe' from Napoleon—truly enough, though incidentally we handed her over to taskmasters only a degree less abominable. But we hear very little of 'how England saved Europe' from Louis XIV. How many Englishmen have ever visited Blenheim? It is as good a field as Waterloo, though a little further off in time and space, and it still lies undisfigured by monuments, its villages and fields still as old Kaspar knew them, between the wooded hills above and the reedy islands of the slow-moving Danube, into which Tallard's horse were driven headlong on that day of deliverance to mankind."

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON SOCIAL WORK AND SERVICE.

At an Executive Committee of the Congress, held on August 19, 1914, the following resolution was passed:—"That the Executive Committee of the sixth International Congress on Social Work and Service, which was to assemble in London on May 31, 1915, regret that in view of the European war they are compelled to announce that it is impossible that the Congress will be held on that date. That an intimation be sent to the press, the Comité International, the foreign Governments and Government Departments which were to have been represented, to subscribers and members, to reporters and contributors of papers so far as may be practicable, announcing the above decision, and adding that the arrangements of the Congress, which were in a forward state of preparation, will be suspended at the stage which they have now reached and will be resumed if, and when, opportunity for such resumption presents itself, and that due intimation will be given of any further decision at which the Executive Committee may arrive."

INDIAN SOLDIERS AND THEIR FOOD.

We are reminded of the difficulties which Indian soldiers must sometimes experience in the matter of diet when fighting with Western armies by a letter which Mr. S. M. Mitra has sent to the press. "According to both the Hindu and Moslem religions," he says, "certain animal foods are prohibited; so to be absolutely on the safe side the delicacies which kind-hearted people here at home might like to send to the Hindu and Moslem soldiers should be those to which no objection could be taken on religious grounds. I have no doubt that the British commissariat officer in charge is supplying them with the two articles which are indispensable to make their food palatable, i.e., ghee (clarified butter) and curry powder. But in addition to these the Indian native soldier would greatly value sugar candy (if possible the Indian misri), candied cocoanut, areca nut (supari) cut in thin slices, cinnamon, and cloves."

DIET IN WAR TIME.

It is just as well to know, on the authority of Dr. M. Hindhede, Director of the Danish State Laboratory for Nutritive Research, that we could easily and well live on bread and butter alone, but the varied menus set out in his book, "What to Eat and Why," show that he realises how monotonous and unsatisfying such a diet would be. A "vegetarian tendency" he recommends because it is such a vast saving in expense, and the homely potato he regards as the best article of food he is acquainted with. "Nobody," says Dr. Hindhede, "has so thoroughly tested the value of potatoes as I have. For ten months I have had human test subjects living entirely on potatoes and margarine. Their health and strength during this period was not only maintained, but improved. . . . Other roots are closely allied to potatoes. Carrots can provide a good many tasty dishes which I strongly recommend." As to the supply of potatoes, "Home Counties" reminds us in the World's Work that we have about a million and a half hundredweights from Holland and from France, a million from the Channel Islands, half a million from Germany, and a million from the rest of the world. But these are all early potatoes. Our main supply is a home product.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE are still some people even in our own country who think that too much has been made of the violation of the neutrality of Belgium. We have even heard it maintained, though not a shred of evidence is offered for the statement, that we should have regarded any action on the part of France which involved the invasion of Belgian territory with equanimity if not with approval. There is also the allegation of the German Press that French and British troops were in Belgium before the declaration of war. All this tissue of suspicion and untruth is torn to bits by an official statement by the Belgian Minister of War. He denies that a single French or English soldier had set foot on Belgian territory before the outbreak of the war, and adds the following significant remark :—

“For long past Great Britain knew that the Belgian Army would oppose by force a ‘preventive’ disembarkation of British troops in Belgium. The Belgian Government did not hesitate at the time of the Agadir crisis to warn foreign Ambassadors, in terms which could not be misunderstood, of its formal intention to compel respect for the neutrality of Belgium by every means at its disposal, and against attempts upon it from any and every quarter.”

It is most satisfactory to learn that the problem of the Belgian refugees has been dealt with in a practical and generous spirit. Hostels, large and small, have been opened where the people can live in friendly groups, and a great deal of private hospitality has been provided for those who will be happy and comfortable by themselves among new friends in a strange land. But there is an immense problem in Belgium itself which demands all the practical thought and generous help which we can give to it. Far and wide the country has been laid waste, and thousands of people are living in homeless poverty amid scenes of horror, for which we must go back to the worst days of the Thirty Years’ War to find a parallel. The whole of the productive industry has been stopped, and the winter is at hand. We must be roused to help on a scale which will be really effective before hunger and cold claim their victims by the thousand.

OUR attempt last week to describe what the Cathedral of Rheims means to the French nation has received eloquent confirmation from the pen of M. Emile Hovelacque, Inspecteur-Général de l’Instruction Publique. In a letter which appeared in the Times on Tuesday, he writes as follows :—

“You in England at all times have loved the noblest of our cathedrals. Yet I do not think that even you can realise all it means to us Frenchmen, all we lose beyond the common loss. It was the cradle of our kings, the high altar of our race, a sanctuary and a shrine dear from every memory, sacred in every thought, loved as our own flesh and blood, a link with our remotest past, the ever-speaking witness of the permanence through change of the ideals, aspirations, dreams of our country; the very face and presentment of our land, whose smile, high in courage, tender in kindness, in all human gentleness most lovingly shone down on us from the kindred lips and eyes of knights and kings and saints and angels carved by our forefathers 700 years ago in the semblance of the men and women around them.”

* * *

“The race,” he continues, “is unchanged, and the spirit that raised that pile, that wrought the miracle of our cathedrals and the soul of Joan of Arc, is living yet. . . But what that incarnation was to us! The very symbol of that spirit, its visible presence, an inspiration and a light before our feet. Our loss is not a loss of beauty alone, though in all our wide possessions of beauty that medieval poem of stone rose supreme; it is the loss of the master testimony to the nobility of our race. And that is why no lover of beauty alone can fathom the depth of our bereavement. The whole world thrills with horror and indignation at the wanton destruction of one of the holy places of the earth; but our pain who shall measure? What healing is there for our wounds?”

* * *

THE battle of the theologians on the subject of the war has been continued this week by the issue of a declaration by a body of British divines including the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, Professor Burkitt, Dean Henson, Canon Scott Holland, the Dean of St. Paul’s, Dr. Forsyth, the Rev. R. J. Campbell, the Rev. F. B. Meyer, Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, Dr. Selbie and Dr. George Adam Smith. It is intended to be a formal reply to the recent appeal by German theologians “to the Evangelical Christians abroad.” After setting forth the British case largely in the language of the White Book, the declaration comes to the following emphatic conclusion:—

"There must be no mistake about our own position. Eagerly desirous of peace, foremost to the best of our power in furthering it, keen especially to promote the close fellowship of Germany and England, we have nevertheless been driven to declare that, dear to us as peace is, the principles of truth and honour are yet more dear.

"To have acted otherwise than we have acted would have meant deliberate unfaithfulness to an engagement by which we had solemnly bound ourselves, and a refusal of our responsibilities and duties in regard to the maintenance of the public law of Europe. We have taken our stand for international good faith, for the safeguarding of smaller nationalities, and for the upholding of the essential conditions of brotherhood among the nations of the world."

THERE is one sentence in the Declaration which calls for a few words of comment. "We can only suppose," it says, "incredible as it seems, that those honourable and gifted men who signed the German appeal were unaware of the obligations by which we were bound." Our British theologians evidently want to suggest that the misunderstanding is due chiefly to lack of information. They assume the possession of the same moral standards in national affairs, and a reverence similar to our own for the public conscience. But in taking that for granted they are misconceiving the whole situation. It is a sensitive public conscience over the whole field of its foreign and colonial policy which has to be created in Germany, and not least in the minds of its cultivated men, and until it exists there must be a deep cleavage between us upon many of the things which matter most in life. Common intellectual pursuits are a poor basis for friendship unless the foundation has first of all been well and truly laid in common standards of righteousness and high ideals of public service. Anglo-German friendship will have to make a fresh start after the war. It will be a stronger and better thing than it has been in the past if there is less pious sentiment about it, and more attention to the need of a policy of unselfish action. Let us meet together to do something, and above all to bring the fearless witness of an enlightened Christian conscience to bear upon the defence of small nations and the protection of native races. Let us vie with one another in our vigilance against the exploitation of the weak by the strong, and our support of noble causes which do not concern our own interests. Without that we may continue to pay one another compliments, but there can be no strong union of soul.

WE are only strengthened in this conviction by reading a letter from Professor Eucken to Dr. C. W. Wendte, which has appeared in the Christian Register. National friendship must be based upon something much deeper than "intellectual work together." As the letter will be of deep and painful interest to many of our readers we venture to transfer it to our own columns. It was written from Jena on August 17:—

"Our plans for travel have been destroyed by the world war. We had arranged for our journey to Japan, and had secured passage on the Siberian Railway for the beginning of September, but now comes suddenly the great overturn and transforms Europe into an armed camp. But there is something great and uplifting in the unity, firmness, and assurance of victory which Germany displays in this state of affairs. Certainly never in its history was Germany so united and so great. Our two sons also have gone to the war, and the youngest is probably already in the midst of battle. All men competent for military service present themselves. Everyone presses forward to take up arms. The feeling of embitterment is strongest against England. It will hereafter always be counted our worst enemy, and our intellectual work together will be ended for an incalculable time. The more, however, do we hope for a close and friendly relation with America."

PROFESSOR EUCKEN has been a valued contributor to our columns. We may also speak of him as an old friend, for it is 28 years since the present writer was first welcomed in his home at Jena. At the present moment the difference between us is deep and radical, and admits of no compromise. We believe that the fatal aloofness from public affairs which he shares with most of the scholars of Germany has led him into a rash defence of official wrong-doing, when he ought to have kept silence if he could not condemn. We must also plead guilty to rather less deference to the opinions of philosophers in matters of practical religion and moral judgment than is customary in some circles. We are a little amused sometimes at the seriousness with which the philosopher takes himself, and the atmosphere of exaggerated homage from small coteries of admirers in which he seems content to live. But all this does not mean that we are going to indulge in any bitterness of spirit, or to dishonour the warm human ties of the past. We feel deeply for our old friend in his family anxieties. We know how he will suffer in the dark days which seem to be so near at hand, and we shall not forget. But on the matter which divides us our judgment is clear, and we cannot allow any sentiment of human friendship to weaken it. If these words should ever reach him we hope that he will have enough philosophical detachment to try to understand them, and will at any rate accept them as sincere.

* * *

AMID the havoc of war there has been an unearthly beauty about the behaviour of the religious orders in Belgium and Northern France. There are numerous testimonies to the calmness and the disciplined strength of these men and women. Their freedom from temporal cares and their sure and certain hope of the life everlasting make them the tenderest and most constant servants of human need in circumstances where all other help seems to fail. Here is one story of womanly faithfulness. The special correspondent of the Times, writing from Nancy on September 26, tells how on August 22 the town of Gerbéville was defended all day by a small company of chasseurs à pied against a German attack. "Little by little they were driven back, and at 8 in the evening the Germans entered the town, which was evacuated by all the chasseurs but five or six, who got separated from the rest and took refuge in a cellar with some of the inhabitants. Before they left their commanding officer begged Sœur Julie, a religieuse of the Order of S. Joseph, who was in the town, to go with them, but she refused to leave her wounded, about 20 French soldiers and villagers. She stayed at her post to the end, and was still there when I visited the town this week. Twice she saw it burnt, and twice bombarded, and for part of the fortnight after it was taken helped to nurse the German wounded who were brought into it."

WE cannot refrain from giving another story of heroism, which the Press Bureau has recovered from a German source. It must be remembered that the language of studied insult is due to the blundering hand of German officialdom, but it cannot conceal the moral splendour of the tale.

"A traitor has just been shot, a little French lad (Ein Französling) belonging to one of those gymnastic societies which wear tricolour ribbons (i.e., the Eclaireurs or Boy-Scouts), a poor young fellow who, in his infatuation, wanted to be a hero. The German column was passing along a wooded defile and he was caught and asked whether the French were about. He refused to give information. Fifty yards further on there was fire from the cover of a wood. The prisoner was asked in French if he had known that the enemy was in the forest, and did not deny it. He went with firm step to a telegraph post and stood up against it, with the green vineyard at his back, and received the volley of the firing party with a proud smile on his face."

This story is worthy of a place in a new Book of Golden Deeds. Let it be told to every company of Boy-Scouts in the land, and then let them thank God for their noble French comrade.

THE BONDS OF EMPIRE.

THE British Empire at the present moment is a pattern of brotherhood unexampled in the history of the world. What is it that has brought this strange thing to pass? For strange it is in the sight of many people. It was part of the calculation of the German politicians and publicists that this little group of islands in the North Sea would not only be rent by internal dissensions, but would also be left isolated and without help in the hour of need. It was a very natural inference from their belief that the only things which count in politics are force and self-interest. What could be more natural in their eyes than that South Africa should welcome a day of revenge, and India rise in rebellion against the accursed yoke, and the daughter lands of Canada, Australia and New Zealand disown the puny and degenerate mother who bore them? And it might all have happened except for one small reason which had been forgotten. It is God and not the KAISER who rules as King for ever. This means that we live in a spiritual universe, and that even in political allegiance there is something stronger than self-interest. Many people have marvelled at the fragile ties which bind the British Empire into one. They have discussed in days of peace the course of its inevitable decay. The whole system was so defenceless, so weakened by local independence, so lacking in central control. But deep in our hearts we knew that no other kind of Empire was possible for free men; and so we staked everything upon the conviction that trust must inspire affection and even-handed justice create the firmest ties of loyalty. Never before has moral idealism in public affairs been justified on such an ample and splendid scale. Before a word of appeal had been sent across the seas, the word came from every part of the Empire, with an ardour of generous feeling that has astonished the world, "It is a common cause. We will give lavishly of our help." If we have ever been foolish enough to doubt it, we know now that our civilisation rests upon spiritual foundations, for the fact has been proved before our very eyes.

We had no doubt some right to expect that Canada, Australia, and New Zealand would behave in this way. There are the ties of race and history. There is the affection which is born anew in every generation of children for the Motherland. In spite of their independence and our own respect for their liberties we can think of them as still part of ourselves. But these instincts of a common patriotism are shared equally by the Boer farmers of South Africa and the native States of India. Just where the shrewd observer would expect us to be spoiled and betrayed our confidence has been most fully justified. At this moment we shall not forget the upright and far-seeing statesman who gave South Africa her constitution, or the brave soldiers and able administrators who have represented our character and ideals so worthily in India. We have reason to be proud of the fruit of their labours.

Every human life in the triumphs and disasters of its own experience bears witness to the reality of moral forces and the folly of ignoring them. There is hardly a page of history which does not convey the same lesson. But it has seldom been taught so impressively before. All over the world these millions of men are banded together, not for purposes of aggression or because their material possessions are in danger, but first and last to defend the riches of the soul. It is the complete justification of our trust in liberty, of our belief in honourable dealing even when it is to our own hurt, of our lofty pride in the spirit and tradition of the British race. Even people who are hostile to us and suspicious of our designs would not deny us some gift for governing. But they seldom understand the reason for the large measure of success which we achieve in this difficult task. They accuse us of Machiavellian designs and political finesse which are quite alien to our nature. Our strength, such as it is, lies not in the intellect but in the conscience. We have made many and grievous blunders. We have often been indifferent where we should have been keen and alert. But on the whole, and over a wide area of the world's surface, British civilisation has stood for belief in the sanctity of the pledged word, for hatred of cruelty, for even-handed justice and a genuine desire to protect the weak. Perhaps we have been slow of understanding or intolerant of opposition, but we have not set ourselves to cow or to exploit men for our own purposes. We have lived our lives and done our work in the conviction that if we, on our side, treat them decently they will behave decently in return. And now the answer which has come to us is not only strength to our arms, it is also a glowing confirmation of our deepest moral convictions.

All this has come home to a multitude of people with the force of a divine revelation. The voice of God has spoken to them in this rally of the Colonies and Dependencies to the Motherland. They believe in the reality of the spiritual bonds of Empire as they never did before. And they are conscious at the same time that their own citizenship has gained in value and dignity. They know that the world possesses few things so well worth defending as this type of civilisation, of which they are the heirs and the trustees. This is not the language of grandiloquence or vain-glory. We are using the words of truth and soberness in the attempt to describe an experience which confirms, with overwhelming force, many things which we understood dimly or held with placid indifference in more tranquil days. We are aware that there is a form of cosmopolitan sentiment which regards all religions and all civilisations as almost equally desirable or equally cursed with imperfection, as though the world were a chaotic jumble of experiments in living, without higher or lower standards of behaviour or any distinctive element of divine election and control. But we have never been of that opinion, which is condemned by history and the plainest facts of our own moral experience. The British Empire is not only the most significant experiment in civilisation of which we have any record; in spite of the worst faults which its critics can lay to its charge, it is also by far the noblest. If it were weakened or submerged the sum of evil and unhappiness in the world would be largely increased. We hold this to be literally true, because we are not thinking of the vastness of its territory or the wealth of its commerce, but of the moral treasure which it carries in its heart and of the spiritual bonds which are the secret of its strength.

It is hard for us to realise the bigness of this upheaval of our customary ways of thinking and living. Day by day the brave deeds are being done which will thrill the hearts of remote generations. Hour by hour we live amid the fiery emotions, devastating and creative, from which religion and poetry and all the pieties and loyalties of our common days will arise in newness of life. In this answer of soul to soul, which has come to us from the ends of the earth, God himself is making a moral revelation, such as once and again in the course of centuries he flashes upon the lives of men from the dark pages of history. If we are worthy to receive it, it will purge us of the dross of selfishness and make us simple and great enough to give ourselves in joyful surrender, to fight or to serve in the common cause.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

———

THOU camest to serve, not to rule. Know that thou wast called to suffer and to labour, not to be idle, and spend thy time in talk. Here therefore men are proved as gold in the furnace. Here no man can stand, unless he be willing to humble himself with his whole heart for the love of God.—THOMAS À KEMPIS.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE TO HER NURSES.

My every-day thought is, "How will God provide for the introduction of real Christianity among all of us nurses and among our patients?" My every-day prayer (and I know that the prayer of many of you is the same) is that He will give us the means and show us how to use them. We ask you to pray for us, who have to arrange for you, as we pray for you, who have to nurse the patients; and I know you do. The very vastness of the work raises one's thoughts to God, as the only One by whom it can be done. That is the solid comfort—He knows. He loves us all and our patients infinitely more than we can. He is, we trust, sending us to them; He will bless honest endeavours to do His work among them. Without this belief and support, it seems to me, when we look at the greatness of the work, and how far, far we fall short of it, instead of being conceited, we should not have courage to work at all.

We think of the Pharisees, when we read the terrible denunciation of them by our Master, as a small, peculiar, antiquated sect of 2,000 years ago. Are they not rather the least peculiar, the most widely-spread of every time? I am sure I often ask myself, sadly enough, "Am I a Pharisee?" In this sense: Am I, or am I not, doing this with a single eye to God's work, to serving Him and my neighbour, even though my "neighbour" is as hostile to me as the Jew was to the Samaritan? Or am I doing it because I identify my selfish self with the work, and in so doing serve myself and not God? If so, then I am a Pharisee. . . . Zeal by itself does not make a good nurse: it makes a Pharisee. Christ is so strong upon this point of not being conceited, of not nursing to show what "fine fellows" we are as nurses, that he actually says it is conceited of us to let one of our hands know what the other does. What will he say if He sees one of us doing all her work to let not only her other hand but other people know she does it? . . . Keep the usefulness, and let the conceit go.

THOU, O Spirit, that dost prefer, before all temples, the upright heart and pure, instruct me; for Thou knowest. What in me is dark, illumine; what is low, raise and support. Look down, O Lord, from thy heavenly throne, illuminate the darkness of our night with thy celestial brightness, and from the sons of Light banish the deeds of darkness. Amen.

O GOD, give us grace and strength to forbear and persevere. Give us courage and gaiety and the quiet mind. Spare to us our friends, soften to us our enemies. Bless us, if it may be, in all our innocent endeavours; if it may not, give us the strength to encounter that which is to come, that we be brave in peril, constant in tribulation, temperate in wrath, and in all changes of fortune, and down to the gates of death, loyal and loving one to another. Amen.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

THE following pronouncement on the European situation by President Emeritus Eliot, of Harvard, has been sent to us by a well-known American correspondent as a representative statement of the prevailing sentiment in America. It appeared originally in the New York Times :—

The American people without distinction of party are highly content with the action of their National Administration on all the grave problems presented to the Government by the sudden outbreak of long-prepared war in Europe—a war which already involves five great States and two small ones. They heartily approve of the action of the Administration on mediation, neutrality, aid to Americans in Europe, discouragement of speculation in foods, and, with the exception of extreme protectionists, admission to American registry of foreign-built ships; although the legislation on the last subject, which has already passed Congress, is manifestly inadequate.

Our people cannot see that the war will necessarily be short, and they cannot imagine how it can last long. They realise that history gives no example of such a general interruption of trade and all other international intercourse as has already taken place, or of such a stoppage of the production and distribution of the necessities of life as this war threatens. They shudder at the floods of human woe which are about to overwhelm Europe.

Hence, thinking Americans cannot help reflecting on the causes of this monstrous outbreak of primitive savagery—part of them come down from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and part developed in the nineteenth—and wondering what good for mankind, if any, can possibly come out of the present cataclysm.

The whole people of the United States, without regard to racial origin, are of one mind in hoping that mankind may gain out of this prodigious physical combat, which uses for purposes of destruction and death all the new forces of nineteenth-century applied science, some new liberties and new securities in the pursuit of happiness; but at this moment they can cherish only a remote hope of such an issue. The military force which Austria-Hungary and Germany are now using on a prodigious scale, and with long-studied skill, can only be met by similar military force, and this resisting force is summoned more slowly than that of Austria-Hungary and Germany; although the ultimate battalions will be heavier. In this portentous physical contest the American people have no part; their geographical position, their historical development, and their political ideals combine to make them for the present mere spectators; although their interests—commercial, industrial, and political—are deeply involved. For the moment, the best thing our Government can do is to utilise all existing neutrality rights, and, if possible, to strengthen or develop those rights, for out of this war ought to come more neutral States in Europe, and greater security for neutralised territory.

The chances of getting some gains for mankind out of this gigantic struggle will be somewhat increased if the American people, and all other neutral peoples, arrive through public discussion at some clear understanding of the causes and the possible and desirable issues of the war, and the sooner this public discussion begins, and the more thoroughly it is pursued, the sounder will probably be the tendencies of public sentiment outside of the contending nations, and the conclusions which the peace negotiations will ultimately reach.

When one begins, however, to reflect on the probable causes of the sudden lapse of the most civilised parts of Europe into worse than primitive savagery, he comes at once on two old and widespread evils in Europe from which America has been exempt for at least 150 years. The first is secret diplomacy with power to make issues and determine events, and the second is autocratic national executives, who can swing the whole physical force of the nation to this side or that without consulting the people or their representatives.

The actual catastrophe proves that secret negotiations, like those habitually conducted on behalf of the "concert of Europe," and alliances between selected nations, the terms of which are secret, or at any rate not publicly stated, cannot avert in the long run outrageous war, but can only produce postponements of war, or short truces. Free institutions, like those of the United States, take the public into confidence, because all important movements of the Government must rest on popular desires, needs, and volitions. Autocratic institutions have no such necessity for publicity. This Government secrecy as to motives, plans, and purposes must often be maintained by disregarding truth, fair-dealing, and honourable obligations, in order that, when the appeal to force comes, one Government may secure the advantage of taking the other by surprise. Duplicity during peace and the breaking of treaties during war come to be regarded as obvious military necessities.

The second great evil, under which certain large nations of Europe—notably Russia, Germany, and Austria-Hungary—have long suffered, and still suffer, is the permanent national executive, independent of popular control through representative bodies, holding strong views about rights of birth and religious sanctions of its authority, and really controlling the national forces through some small council and a strong bureaucracy. So long as executives of this sort endure, so long will civilisation be liable to such explosions as have taken place this August, though not always on so vast a scale.

Americans now see these things more clearly than European lovers of liberty, because Americans are detached from the actual conflicts by the Atlantic, and because Americans have had no real contact with the feudal or the imperial system for nearly 300 years. Pilgrim and Puritan, Covenanter and Quaker, Lutheran and Catholic alike left the feudal system and autocratic governments behind them when they crossed the Atlantic. Americans, therefore, cannot help hoping that two results of the present war will be: (1) The abolition of secret diplomacy and secret understandings, and the substitution therefor of treaties publicly discussed and sanctioned, and (2) The creation of national executives—Emperors, Sultans, Kings, or Presidents—which cannot use the national forces in fight until a thoroughly informed national assembly, acting with deliberation, has agreed to that use.

The American student of history since the middle of the seventeenth century sees clearly two strong, though apparently opposite tendencies in Europe: First the tendency to the creation and maintenance of small states such as those which the Peace of Westphalia (1648) recognised and for two centuries secured in a fairly independent existence, and, secondly, a tendency from the middle of the nineteenth century towards larger national units, created by combining several kindred States under one executive. This second tendency was illustrated strongly in the case of both Germany and Italy, although the Prussian domination in Germany has no parallel in Italy. Somewhat earlier in the nineteenth century the doctrine of the neutralisation of the territories of small States was established as firmly as solemn treaties could do it. The larger national units had a more or less federative quality, the components yielding some of their functions to a central power, but retaining numerous independent functions. This tendency to limited unification is one which Americans easily understand and appreciate. We believe in the federative principle, and must therefore hope that out of the present European horror will come a new development of that principle, and new security for small States which are capable of guaranteeing to their citizens "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"—a security which no citizen of any European country seems to-day to possess.

Some of the underlying causes of the horrible catastrophe the American people are now watching from afar are commercial and economic. Imperial Germany's desire for colonies in other continents—such as Great Britain and France secured earlier as a result of keen commercial ambitions—is intense. Prussia's seizure of Schleswig in 1864-5 had the commercial motive; and it is with visions of ports on the North Sea that Germany justifies her present occupation of Belgium. The Russians have for generations desired to extend their national territory southward to the Ægean and the Bosphorus, and eastward to good harbours on the Pacific. Later they pushed into Mongolia and Manchuria, but were resisted successfully by Japan. Austria-Hungary has long been seeking ports on the Adriatic, and lately seized without warrant Herzegovina and Bosnia to promote her approach toward the Ægean, and is now trying to seize Serbia with the same ends in view. With similar motives Italy lately descended on Tripoli, without any excuse except this intense desire for colonies—profitable or unprofitable. On the other hand, the American people, looking to the future as well as to the past, object to acquisitions of new territory by force of arms; and since the twentieth century opened they have twice illustrated in their own practice—first in Cuba, and then in Mexico—this democratic objection. They believe that extensions of national territory should be brought about only with the indubitable consent of the majority of the people most nearly concerned. They also believe that commerce should always be a means of promoting good-will, and not ill-will, among men, and that all legitimate and useful extensions of the commerce of a manufacturing and commercial nation may be procured through the policy of the "open door"—which means nothing more than that all nations should be allowed to compete on equal terms for the trade of any foreign people, whether backward or advanced in civilisation. No American Administration has accepted a "concession" of land in China. They also believe that peaceable extensions of territory and trade will afford adequate relief from the economic pressure on a population too large for the territory it occupies, and that there is no need of forcible seizure of territory to secure relief. It is inevitable, therefore, that the American people should hope that one outcome of the present war should be—no enlargement of a national territory by force or without the free consent of the population to be annexed, and no colonisation except by peaceable commercial and industrial methods.

One of the most interesting and far-reaching effects of the present outbreak of savagery is likely to be the conviction it carries to the minds of thinking people that the whole process of competitive armaments, the enlistment of the entire male population in national armies, and the incessant planning of campaigns against neighbours, is not a trustworthy method for preserving peace. It now appears that the military preparations of the last fifty years in Europe have resulted in the most terrific war of all time, and that a fierce ultimate outbreak is the only probable result of the system. For the future of civilisation this is a lesson of high value. It teaches that if modern civilisation is to be preserved, national executives—whether imperial or republican—must not have at their disposal immense armaments and drilled armies held ready in the leash; that armaments must be limited, an international Supreme Court established, national armies changed to the Swiss form, and an international force adequate to deal with any nation that may suddenly become lawless agreed upon by treaty and held always in readiness. The occasional use of force will continue to be necessary, even in the civilised world; but it must be made not an aggressive, but a protective force, and used as such—just as protective force has to be used sometimes in families, schools, cities, and Commonwealths.

At present Americans do not close their eyes to the plain fact that the brute force which Germany and Austria-Hungary are now using can only be overcome by brute force of the same sort in larger measure. It is only when negotiations for peace begin that the great lesson of the futility of huge preparations for fighting to preserve peace can be given effect. Is it too much to expect that the whole civilised world will take to heart the lessons of this terrible catastrophe and co-operate to prevent the recurrence of such losses and woes? Should Germany and Austria-Hungary succeed in their present undertakings, the whole civilised world would be obliged to bear continuously, and to an ever-increasing amount, the burdens of great armaments, and would live in constant fear of sudden invasion, now here, now there—a terrible fear, against which neither treaties nor professions of peaceable intentions would offer the least security.

It must be admitted, however, that the whole military organisation, which has long been compulsory on the nations of Continental Europe, is inconsistent in the highest degree with American ideals of individual liberty and social progress. Democracies can fight with ardour, and sometimes with success, when the whole people is moved by a common sentiment or passion; but the structure and discipline of a modern army like that of Germany, Austria-Hungary, or Russia has a despotic or autocratic quality which is inconsistent with the fundamental principles of democratic society. To make war in countries like France, Great Britain, and the United States requires the widespread, simultaneous stirring of the passions of the people on behalf of their own ideals. This stirring requires publicity before and after the declaration of war and public discussion; and the delays which discussion causes are securities for peace. Out of the present struggle should come a check on militarism—a strong revulsion against the use of force as a means of settling international disputes.

It must also be admitted that it is impossible for the American people to sympathise with the tone of the imperial and royal addresses which, in summoning the people to war, use such phrases as "My monarchy," "My loyal people," or "My loyal subjects"; for there is implied in such phrases a dynastic or personal ownership of peoples which shocks the average American. Americans inevitably think that the right way for a ruler to begin an exhortation to the people he rules is President Wilson's way—"My fellow countrymen."

It follows from the very existence of these American instincts and hopes that, although the people of the United States mean to maintain faithfully a legal neutrality, they are not, and cannot be, neutral or indifferent as to the ultimate outcome of this titanic struggle. It already seems to them that England, France, and Russia are fighting for freedom and civilisation. It does not follow that thinking Americans will forget the immense services which Germany has rendered to civilisation during the last hundred years, or desire that her power to serve letters, science, art, and education should be in the least abridged in the outcome of this war upon which she has entered so rashly and selfishly, and in so barbarous a spirit. Most educated Americans hope and believe that by defeating the German barbarousness the Allies will only promote the noble German civilisation.

The presence of Russia in the combination against Germany and Austria-Hungary seems to the average American an abnormal phenomenon; because Russia is itself a military monarchy with marked territorial ambitions; and its civilisation is at a more elementary stage than that of France or England; but he resists present apprehension on this score by recalling that Russia submitted to the "Concert of Europe" when her victorious armies were within seventeen miles of Constantinople, that she emancipated her serfs, proposed the Hague Conference, initiated the "Duma," and has lately offered—perhaps as war measures only—autonomy to her Poles and equal rights of citizenship to her Jews. He also cannot help believing that a nation which has produced such a literature as Russia has produced during the last fifty years must hold within its multitudinous population a large minority which is seething with high aspirations and a fine idealism.

For the clarification of the public mind on the issues involved, it is important that the limits of American neutrality should be discussed and understood. The action of the Government must be neutral in the best sense; but American sympathies and hopes cannot possibly be neutral, for the whole history and present state of American liberty forbids. For the present, thinking Americans can only try to appreciate the scope and real issues of this formidable convulsion, and so be ready to seize every opportunity that may present itself to further the cause of human freedom, and of peace at last.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ATTITUDE OF AMERICA.

SIR,—Here in the United States we are still in the condition in which you were in the few days before the violation of the neutrality of Belgium, when you felt that there was a possibility of Great Britain avoiding war. We stand watching a tragedy that seems incredible. The great war, with all its attending misery, seems a horrible unreality. For the last two days I have been on the train travelling over the fifteen hundred miles between Boston and St. Paul on the Upper Mississippi. It is the early autumn, and from the hills of New England to the prairies of the West everything was suggestive of mellow fruitfulness. As I looked out, hour after hour, on the accustomed scenes of fruitful industry it seemed impossible to conceive of the vast destruction that at the very moment was going on in France and Belgium.

Yet everyone on the train was reading the newspapers with their grim story of battle. To you in England this war is no longer a horrible unreality; it is a horrible reality. How nobly you have as a nation accepted the duty of the hour all the world knows. Never have I known such unanimity of sentiment among the people of this country as in the feeling toward Great Britain in this crisis. It is more than the sentiment of kinsmen. We feel that the British Government did all that could be done to keep the peace, and that it now is engaged in a great struggle to end that system of aggressive militarism that has for the last generation been the curse of the world. The Government of the United States is endeavouring to preserve neutrality, but this does not mean that the people are indifferent to the vast issues involved. That which to a lover of peace is most cheering is the serious way in which the war news is received. The sporting instinct is not aroused. It is not a question as to which side wins in a great battle. As well ask who wins in an earthquake or a pestilence. The awful fact is that all the world must be a loser unless out of the great tribulation all the world learns a new lesson. To-day there is battle; to-morrow victors and vanquished must set themselves to the hard work of paying the vast debts incurred. But what of the day after to-morrow? Shall the nations then begin feverishly to prepare for the next and more dreadful conflict? God forbid.

The President of the United States has called upon the people to meet together in their houses of worship to pray for peace and to plan for a peace that shall be lasting. The cynic may smile, the militarist party may look upon it as a mere cant, but it expresses the genuine emotion of the American people. The suddenness with which this war has come has proved that it is vain for any one nation to disarm while others are ready to leap upon it. But the time has come to appeal to all nations to cease from the mad competition in which they have been engaged. To the nations of the world the cry comes: "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?"

We were just about to celebrate the hundred years of peace between Great Britain and the United States. The war makes governmental action at this time difficult. But is it not the time for the people of the two countries to take account of the great achievement? The significant thing about this century of peace lies in the fact that it represents the attitude of two great nations toward "a scrap of paper." For over three thousand miles of boundary the United States and Canada are defenceless against each other. No forts threaten or protect. On the great Lakes cities like Toronto, Chicago and Buffalo take no measures to resist attack. The peaceful merchant ships go on their way unmolested, but no warship is allowed to sail upon this American Mediterranean. At the World's Fair in Chicago wooden warships were built on piles in Lake Michigan to satisfy the curiosity of hundreds of thousands of people who had read about these monsters of the deep but had never seen them. The scrap of paper which has saved all the waste of armaments hardly had the dignity of a formal treaty. It was simply an agreement between two friendly nations not to make fools of themselves. If Canada and the United States should wish to fight they find themselves in a state of unpreparedness. It is in the extension of such agreements that we see hope for the future. It also seems evident that the day after to-morrow the nations must take measures to provide for an international force adequate to preserve the peace against any one nation which defies the ethical standards of civilised mankind.

But to-day, when the nations are at war, our loving sympathy is with the innumerable individuals who are doomed to unmerited suffering. In whatever army they are fighting, the blame of the war is not theirs, only its misery. I was touched by the allusion in THE INQUIRER to our Unitarian brethren in Hungary. This is the time for their fellow believers in Great Britain to assure them of the personal regard which no national conflicts can make less. The friends in Great Britain do not need to be assured in this their hour of trial of the love and admiration with which their kindred in the United States follow them in their heroic "war against war."—Yours, &c.,

RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE WAR.

SIR,—In his letter in your current issue Mr. Carl Heath makes the astounding statement that for the terrible evil now desolating Europe "all the great Powers are equally responsible." That anyone—outside Germany—who has read the White Book and knows the meaning of words should make such a statement almost makes one despair of ever reaching general agreement as to the simplest rules of evidence or the most elementary data of ethics. It means that for a given result the man, on the one hand, who, with the greatest skill and untiring patience, has done everything that was possible to avoid it, and the man, on the other, who, with far less skill indeed, but with equal persistency, active and passive, has done everything possible to bring it about, "are equally responsible." It means that the gallant recruits, to whom in spirit I raise my hat every time I meet them, as saviours of their country and heroes for righteousness and liberty, should more truly be regarded as expiatory offerings for their sin and ours—perhaps the most momentous in the whole history of man. It means that black and white, up and down, good and evil, and all the other pairs of words, which we have hitherto understood as mutually exclusive, are to be reduced to a common mush, which, just because it may mean anything, actually does mean nothing at all. It means that that famous "Heaven-and-Hell-Perpetual-Amalgamation Society" which Carlyle in his grim humour suggested is already in the first stage of becoming.

I observe that Mr. Heath, by the address from which he writes, seems to suggest that the National Peace Council is "equally responsible" for his reading of the present situation. If so, I imagine that a good many would-be peacemakers who have been glad to be associated with the Council will be compelled to find some other way of reaching their end.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES HARWOOD.

September 28, 1914.

SIR,—Your striking phrase in last week's issue as to "the policy of keeping patriotism on a low diet," and your general attitude as regards the present war appeal to many, the more so as the utterances of your critics reveal both confusion of thought and an inability to see the issues broadly. In the same issue, for example, Mr. Carl Heath has written a letter calculated to confuse the minds of the timid and wavering. He begins with the highly disputable statement as to the "frightful evil in Europe for which all the great Powers are equally responsible," a pontifical assignment of blame for which he does not condescend to give reasons. He then goes on to argue, on the strength of some quotations from Lord Roberts, that the "Prussian" spirit is rife among all nations. Assuming these quotations rightly to represent his lordship's views, what is the legitimate inference? Merely the perfectly obvious fact that there are fire-eaters in every country. What is charged against the German nation is that it has allowed itself to be dominated by a military caste, to whom aggression seems a good thing. Can such a charge be fairly made against this country? If not, quotations from individuals are irrelevant.

Mr. Heath concludes with the amiable prophecy that we run the risk of suffering "the fate which overtakes all Pharisees." It is lamentable to think that some use such unmoral and unethical language. Would Mr. Heath desire us to check all heroic impulses, because no one of us is perfect? Would he try to interfere with a man protecting a woman from gross cruelty on the ground of the imperfection of his moral character? The "Pharisee" in such an event would be the interferer. It is easy in the recesses of a study to belittle motives and to carp at action, but at a decisive moment the choice is simple, and must be made quickly. We had, as a nation, to decide between opposing Germany or breaking our pledges. Rightly, I think, we selected the former alternative. Would Mr. Heath have chosen the latter?—Yours, &c.,

F. W. MIALL.

RHEIMS CATHEDRAL.

SIR,—In your notes of last week it is said that "we cannot compile a list of the French cathedrals in order of merit"; but we can do so in order of date, and it is in this very point that the supremacy of Rheims consists. It was built at the moment of climax in Gothic architecture, and marks its perfect achievement: on the one side, the earlier cathedrals at Paris and Chartres still show signs of the transition from the Romanesque, and are in some ways experimental; on the other, that of Amiens is over-perfect, and betrays the point at which the Gothic builders were led astray by the mere technical skill in construction, which ended in the tour de force of Beauvais and the mechanical correctness of Cologne—

Faultily faultless, icily null.

Perhaps no single Gothic building holds the unique position of the Parthenon among Greek temples, but it is here that such a pre-eminence among cathedrals might most successfully be claimed: in fact, to all who know and admire, the very sight of the word "Rheims" on a timetable, or an advertisement, gives that thrill of association which is called up by other magic words like "Athens," or "Constantinople."

The photographs and detailed accounts now available, with the official report of a Commission of Inquiry from Bordeaux, allow us to estimate the condition of the building more correctly than was possible from the first messages written under the terrible impression of the blazing roofs and exploding shells, when the cathedral was described as "no more than a heap of ruins," and the idea arose, which the writer of your notes evidently shared, that it was completely open to the sky, and reduced to the state, for instance, of Tintern Abbey. Happily, what actually happened was far less disastrous than this.

The cathedral was bombarded from a fort five miles to the north-west: shells set fire to some scaffolding, which, unfortunately, surrounded the north-west tower for restoration purposes, and to the whole of the outer roof, constructed of timber covered with lead. All the wood-work was, of course, destroyed, but below the roof, as in all French (and many English) cathedrals, there comes the arched stone "vaulting," visible from the interior, and in no way connected with the outer roof construction. This vaulting still stands; in fact, it could not fall in unless the walls themselves had fallen outwards. A great deal of damage was inflicted on the sculpture and carving of the north side, but, as I know from photographs which I took on the roof in 1896, this part of the building had then just been "restored" with all the relentlessness of the French nineteenth century Revivalists, and hardly any of the decorative detail was genuinely medieval. The east and south sides of the cathedral faced away from the fort, and are absolutely intact, even to the delicate pierced tracery of the pinnacles and parapet walls, and by greater good fortune the exquisite west towers, with their forest of slender shafts, are still unharmed. The most serious loss occurs on the west front itself, where, in exposed parts of the great porches, some of the statues are badly damaged.

It must be remembered that Rheims Cathedral was not constructed with the economy of material found in a modern shop-front: it is a gigantic mass of solid masonry, which nothing short of tons of dynamite could literally "destroy." In the interior the vaulting, as I have explained, is still intact and carries the debris of the burnt roofs above it. Shells must have penetrated through one or more of the windows on the north side, and set fire to the straw which had been laid on the floor of the nave, thus causing a "local" fire which destroyed the choir fittings and other modern woodwork in the cathedral, but apparently did not extend as far as the organ, which is placed high up on the end wall of the north transept (and, therefore, on the exposed side), but, according to a statement by the Archbishop, has escaped without damage.

The interior is characterised by a magnificent austerity in contrast with the richness of the exterior: during the eighteenth century it was stripped bare of all its medieval woodwork, screens, choirstalls, and altars, and, worse still, all the stained glass was removed from the windows of the aisles. It depends for its effect not on the decorative accessories which so often make the charm of our own cathedrals, but on sheer splendour of architectural construction, a quality which, so long as it stands at all, cannot be taken from it either by hostile fire, or friendly, but misguided restoration. What we have to lament here is the loss of more of the wonderful stained glass, perhaps the richest in colour of all the medieval windows, which in many places must have been broken or melted by the fire; but it seems that the destruction has not extended to the east or south sides, and that part of the west "rose" window survives.

We cannot acquit the Germans of the charge of deliberately firing on the cathedral; but let us at least be thankful that the ruin of the building was not after all achieved. It is true that no restoration can replace what is lost; but all cathedrals are perpetually suffering from restoration, and if we in our time have been able to feel the majesty of Rheims in spite of much modern replacement of medieval decay, we may hope that future ages may still have that privilege even after this last and hardest blow.—Yours &c.,

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

SIR,—There are very many people who feel at this time, like the Rev. Walter Short, that the present crisis in our national affairs has brought us up against new factors in life that render the adoption of a form of compulsory military service a necessity. Some, like Mr. Short, feel led to this conclusion on the moral ground that we should not call upon others to face dangers in the interest of the whole community that every member of the community is not compelled to share with them. Others feel that the menace of Prussian militarism is one that can only be met by the adoption of similar measures. And there are yet others who have always desired conscription, and see in the present state of affairs a plausible argument that they hope will enable them to gain their ends.

Of these three schools I am most in sympathy with Mr. Short, and the considerations he advances have been constantly in my mind since war broke out. But full consideration has led me to realise that these questionings of Mr. Short and myself proceed from a strain of sentimentalism that will not stand against a dash of the cold water of common sense. Coal-mining, railway working, and many other forms of our ordinary industrial life are full of dangers: a comparison of the statistics of casualties arising from coal-mining and train-shunting with those arising from the soldier's calling would, I am sure, give interesting results. Now coal-mining and shunting are equally as essential to our civilisation as fighting—yet I have never found myself feeling that I should learn to hew coal or shunt trains. Is the reason for this to be found in the fact that in the one case we think only of the grime, and in the other only of the glory? And would the world be any the better off (save, perhaps, in the extension of sympathy) by compulsory railway service or compulsory mining service? It is only the force of tradition that makes us set the profession of arms apart as one having in it more of self-sacrifice than the work of millions of our toilers who stand throughout their lives at the post of danger, facing death hourly, that the community may live.

To the second of the groups I have referred to I would reply that we do not cultivate stings because we are stung by wasps. The thing that we are fighting against in this war is Prussian militarism—the theory that the State is an Army finding its raison d'être in war and war alone; that men exist to fight and women to bear conscripts; that the strong are above morality and the weak beneath consideration. This abominable conception of life is what we have got to fight, and to stamp out for ever from the face of the earth. It is this militarist gospel of might that has brought about the present state of affairs, and this war must not end without that spirit being broken in all lands—in England no less than in Germany. To adopt conscription would be to substitute English militarism for Prussian militarism—and I guarantee that the new brand would be as rank and pernicious as the old. It is the virtue of the voluntary system that no Administration can plunge us into war unless it has a case that will command itself to the will, if not to the conscience, of the community. Now even a coward will become a bully if he finds a big enough stick in his hand, and conscription would place in the hands of a British Administration a power for aggressive warfare that the voluntary system withholds.

As regards the third school, I believe that the first great electoral battle after this horrible war is over will be on the question of conscription. Then will be the time for all lovers of freedom to close their ranks. We shall need all our passion for liberty, all our logic and all our conviction, to fight against the insidious enemy in our midst. We shall have to convince him that we are not willing to place ourselves beneath the iron heel of militarism; that when we went to war with Germany it was because her methods were hateful to everything we hold dear, and not because we were desirous of travelling in her paths. Zaborism is a plant not to be grown in England.—Yours, &c.,

"YOUR CAUSE IS OURS."

SIR,—With reference to the article entitled "Facing the Facts" in your issue of the 19th inst., the following incident may interest your readers as illustrating the way in which England's championship of oppressed peoples is being recognised. A friend brought a gentleman to see me this week who is by birth an Armenian; he and his family owe their lives to the American missionaries who gave them shelter during the terrible massacre in 1896. This gentleman has been in England some years and is a naturalised British subject. He has recently joined the English army, and hopes soon to go to the front. As he said to me, "Your cause is ours." Surely it is not too much to hope that when the war is over and the time of reckoning comes, all sorely-oppressed peoples, including Armenians, shall reap the reward of ages of patient long-suffering in the dawn of a lasting day of justice.—Yours, &c.,

TERRITORIALS IN NORTHAMPTON.

SIR,—I shall be glad if my brother ministers in Cheshire and Wales will send me the names of their young men who are billeted in Northampton. Several have attended my services and made themselves known to me, but I gather from communications I have received that there are many more of whom I have not heard. I desire the information in order that the ladies of our congregation, who are specially organised to render various services during the war, may particularly attend to the comfort of the men during their residence in the town.—Yours, &c.,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

PRINCE GAUTAMA AND THE SWAN.

Do you know the beautiful story of Prince Gautama, of India, and the wounded swan? Prince Gautama is known to some four hundred and seventy millions of people in China, Ceylon, Japan and other countries as the Lord Buddha, and in India itself, although the religion he taught no longer prevails there as it once did, his name is deeply venerated, one sect, the Jainas, numbering over a million people, being particularly faithful to his teaching. Prince Gautama, we are told, was a modest, gentle, and tender-hearted youth, though of "fearless blood," and a bold horseman. No trouble had he ever known at the time of which I am speaking. He lived a merry life with his playmates in the palace of the great King, his father, and knew nothing of the outside world in which people did not have quite such a good time as little princes, but were obliged to work very hard for their daily bread, and bear with sickness and poverty. Yet often as he rode to the chase he would pause, "letting the deer pass free," checked by a feeling of sadness and compassion which he did not understand. It was quite evident to all that he was more thoughtful and pitiful than the ordinary run of boys.

One day he was with his cousin, Devadatta, when a flock of wild swans flew past them. Devadatta drew his bow, and brought down one of the beautiful birds. The sight of its blood-stained wings moved Prince Gautama as nothing had ever done before. Sitting down beside it he took the wounded creature into his lap, tenderly smoothing its snowy plumage and trying to still its wildly beating heart with caressing hands. In a little while he was able to draw forth the arrow, and lay cool leaves on the wound it had made. While he was doing this one of Devadatta's servants came to look for the swan to give it to his master, but the young prince refused to let it go. "If the bird were dead," he said, "he might have it; but it lives." This answer was not to his cousin's liking. "Living or dead," he replied, "I fetched the bird down, and therefore it is mine."

"But no," said Gautama, pressing the swan's neck against his cheek:

The bird is mine,
The first of myriad things which shall be mine,

By right of mercy and love's lordliness.
For now I know, by what within me stirs,
That I shall teach compassion unto men.

The matter did not end there, but was referred to a council of wise men who debated the point whether the swan really belonged to Devadatta or the Prince. At last someone described as an unknown priest rose up and said:

If life be aught, the saviour of a life Owns more the living thing than he can own

Who sought to slay—the slayer spoils and wastes,

The cherisher sustains; give him the bird.

This judgment was approved by all, and the swan was restored to the Prince, who gladly tended it until it was healed of its wound and could be set free to rejoin its mates. So the Lord Buddha, we are told, "began his works of mercy."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE REV. A. MACDOUGALL.

WE regret to announce the death of the Rev. Alexander Macdougall, at his residence, Gorsefield, Felixstowe, at the age of 83. Mr. Macdougall was of a very retiring disposition, and has not been very much in the public eye, but he was one of those men of whom any ministry might be proud. With a deeply emotional and artistic nature he was at the same time a fearless and independent thinker. He was educated at Glasgow University and Carmarthen College. He became minister of Ditchling in 1852; his experience there was a very pleasant one, and resulted in his marriage (in 1860) to Fanny Duke, niece of Mr. Edwards, one of the supporters of the chapel. On seeking a wider field of usefulness, he met with much disappointment owing to his accepting the results of science and criticism as applied to the Bible. Views which appeared "advanced" at the time were not favourable to his advancement, and he was not prepared to suppress them. He then burnt his book (in the form of his "Ditchling Sermons") and sought other work. However, in 1859, Mr. Samuel Courtauld heard of him and appointed him minister of High Garrett. Here he remained 27 years, doing duty at Halstead also for a part of the time. At Mr. Courtauld's death he became minister at Diss (in 1887), but resigned in 1894 owing to failing health, and has since lived in retirement at Felixstowe, enduring many years' suffering with heroic fortitude.

Although he had not the superficial accomplishments of the popular preacher, his record speaks for itself as showing that he had those sterling qualities which win the love and esteem of men. His life, although apparently uneventful, was, nevertheless, intellectually an active one, and was not without its romance. He has given us the story of his life in the book called "The Autobiography of Allan Lorne," published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, in 1900. In it we recognise Mr. Courtauld as Sir Samuel de Courcelles; and perhaps "the Reverend Jacob Sturge" might be identified by the curious. He was always a diligent student, and kept himself well informed on questions of science and philosophy. He anticipated the trouble with Germany, and, unfortunately, living near the Harwich forts, he saw much of the reality of war. Mr. and Mrs. Macdougall celebrated their golden wedding four years ago. The latter still survives. The funeral took place at Ditchling on Thursday. It was his wish that he should be buried at a place endeared to him by so many associations.

BELGIAN REFUGEES AT HAMPSTEAD.

A HOSTEL has been opened in the Church Hall adjoining Rosslyn-hill Chapel for Belgian refugees, and excellent provision has been made for their comfort by the committee responsible for the arrangements, and Mrs. E. F. Grundy, the honorary secretary. There are, at present, six men and a boy of twelve, two women, a girl of sixteen, and four children all under five. Some of the men sleep in the schoolroom attached to the neighbouring Presbyterian Church, where, in addition to this, a series of weekly soirees for the entertainment of the visitors is about to be started. The rest occupy compartments curtained off (two of them on the platform), which have been furnished by various members of the congregation. The centre of the hall is used as a common room or parlour, and here the inmates of the hostel spend their time in reading, sewing, chip-carving, or chatting round the cheery fire. The work is fairly apportioned, the women doing the cooking and lighter domestic duties, the men cleaning the floors and washing up. Food is plain but plentiful, a great deal of it being provided by local tradesmen who take it in turns to send in whatever is required. The difficulty is, of course, how to provide these people with occupations which shall fill up their days profitably, and yet not rob our own workers of employment which they are constantly in danger of losing at the present time. The refugees themselves are looking forward to an early return to Belgium, but it is hardly likely that they will be able to get back for a considerable time, and advantage has been taken of the offer of the use of a workshop where the men can take up carpentering with the help of an intelligent young fellow who has hitherto been engaged as a carpenter in some motor works in Brussels. Another sympathiser has promised to give English lessons, and basket-making will probably be started later on. A bright looking girl of sixteen, who is too young and healthy to worry much about her country's woes, is being instructed in the use of a sewing machine, and the children go every day to a large convent school in the neighbourhood. Most of the refugees at present living in the hostel come from Liège, and one of them, the young carpenter above mentioned, speaks quite good English. The men were not required for the Belgian army, as they were untrained (military service is not universal in Belgium), and there was no time to remedy this deficiency. They natually did not wish to be compelled by the Germans to fight for them, so they joined the stream of refugees who were making their way to England by way of Ostend.

THE Rev. Dr. John Hunter preached at Mill-hill Chapel, Leeds, on Sunday morning, September 27, when the beautiful building was filled by an earnest congregation. Correspondents should note that Dr. Hunter's permanent address is now 8, Prince Arthur-road, Hampstead, N.W.

THE important statement by President Eliot on the attitude of the American people to the War, which appears in our present issue, will be published in pamphlet form by the Lindsey Press, Essex Hall, next week. Copies, one penny each, may be ordered from any bookseller or from the publisher direct.

WE are sorry to see the announcement that it has been decided to suspend the publication of the Religious Freeman, edited by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, until the close of the War. The October issue, the last for the present, is a special Peace and War number. Copies may be ordered from 70, Lord-street, Liverpool.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Belfast, Mountpottinger.—The Rev. Joseph Worthington has, at his own request, been released from the oversight of this congregation in order to take charge of Heywood, Lancashire. His resignation is to take effect on October 31 next. He leaves Ireland taking with him the best wishes of his Presbyterian and other friends.

Birmingham.—The Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman has been publicly welcomed to the ministry of the Hurst-street Domestic Mission as successor to the late Rev. W. J. Clarke. Among those taking part were Miss Councillor Martineau, the Revs. Gertrud von Petzold, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, T. Graham, and J. C. Sneath, and Mr. A. Hudson, secretary of Mr. Whiteman's former congregation at Chatham.

Lewes.—The series of concerts for recruits which have been held nightly in the Lecture Hall of Westgate Chapel, was brought to a close on Monday evening last, when there was again a crowded audience. In the midst of the proceedings Private Hoey rose and moved a hearty vote of thanks to the Rev. J. M. Connell and all who had helped in arranging the concerts, which, he said, had throughout maintained a very high standard of excellence and had been thoroughly enjoyed by the men. The motion was carried with musical honours. Mr. Connell, in responding, said that he and those who had worked with him felt it to be a great pleasure and privilege to arrange the concerts, and referred to the discoveries they had made of remarkable musical talent among the recruits themselves, who had contributed to the programme on each of the fourteen evenings except the first. At the close of the sacred concert on Sunday evening Alderman Every gave an address on the history of Lewes, which interested the men very greatly. The recruits have now nearly all left the town for the camp at Seaford and elsewhere.

London: Stepney.—Last Sunday there was a large gathering of members and friends of College Chapel and Sunday-school to bid farewell to Mr. Wm. Randall Marshall, who has given up his lay-ministry owing to pressure of other work. Miss Tagart, on behalf of the congregation and Sunday-school, presented Mr. Marshall with a handsome marble clock with a suitable inscription. She expressed the great regret that all felt at losing Mr. Marshall's services. Mr. Marshall, in replying, said he hoped still to be linked to the chapel though his official position had ceased. He referred to the Rev. R. Spears, the founder of this congregation, and the long line of excellent ministers who had followed him. He hoped that their noble traditions might long be maintained.

Manchester: Failsworth.—On Saturday, September 26, a presentation of an album containing an address was made to Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, who has been connected for over 50 years with Dob Lane Chapel and schools. His portrait, which is to hang on the walls of the school, was also unveiled by Mr. Samuel Etchells. The address was given to Mr. Robinson by the chairman on behalf of the joint institutions. It alluded to his earnest labours in the building of the new school, his helpful work for many years as Sunday-school superintendent, his zeal for education as shown in the most valuable assistance which he gave to the establishment of the day school in 1875, and evening classes in 1888, his devoted services on the Chapel Committee, and in many other offices, and to the fact that since his removal from the district in 1898 to Pendleton he had kept up his active interest in the affairs of Dob-lane. In responding Mr. Robinson made many interesting references to the work of the past, traced the development of the school and its allied institutions, and made an impressive appeal to those of the younger generation to carry on the noble work committed to their care.

Norwich.—The induction service of the Rev. Lawrence Redfern at the Octagon Chapel, on Thursday, September 24, was conducted by the Rev. Lawrence Scott, of Denton, in the absence of the Rev. R. Stuart Redfern through illness. The charge to the minister was given by the Rev. Principal Mellone, and the charge to the congregation by the Rev. H. McLachlan. The service was well attended, and eight or nine local ministers of the Free Churches were amongst those present. The Rev. S. H. Mellone, in the course of his charge, reminded Mr. Redfern of the great traditions of the Octagon Chapel, and went on to speak of the relationship of the minister and his people in regard to the responsibility for the life of the church. That responsibility, he said, rested on minister and people jointly. It was by co-operation that success would be achieved. The Rev. H. McLachlan pointed out that their minister had not been imposed upon the congregation by any patron or by the decision of some conference, but he had been chosen entirely by themselves. The Rev. Lawrence Redfern said that for the third time in succession the people of the Octagon Chapel had taken for their minister a student fresh from college, of necessity inexperienced, but, he hoped, with a full sense of the responsibility involved. Around the history of that chapel there clustered the most sacred memories. That fellowship had been inspired and guided by a long line of men who had laboured here for the spread of a Liberal faith in times much more difficult than their own, when the judgment of the world was not always kind; they were the faithful guardians of a great tradition which they had handed on ennobled and enriched. At the evening meeting, which was largely attended, Mr. G. A. King presided, and short speeches were delivered by the ministers who took part in the service, as well as by several ministers of other denominations in the city.

Sheffield.—No fewer than 48 responses to the call of the country into active service in connection with the war have been made from our three Sheffield churches, viz., 29 from Upper Chapel, 6 from Upperthorpe, and 13 from Attercliffe. The names of 42 of these appear in the October number of the Sheffield Unitarian Monthly Record; the others will appear in the next issue, by which time there will probably be more to add.

Victoria, B.C.—The Rev. H. E. B. Speight, till lately junior minister at Essex Church, London, has received a cordial welcome upon settling as minister of the First Unitarian Church, Victoria, B.C. In a letter just received he describes the people as keen and enthusiastic. Mr. Speight's address is 1620, Fernwood-road, Victoria, B.C.

Harvest Thanksgivings.—We have received numerous accounts of Harvest Thanksgiving services for which we regret that we cannot find room at the present time.

WE understand that in consequence of the war the general observance of Health Week, which was to have been held in November, has been indefinitely postponed, but it is hoped that the arrangements for lessons and addresses in schools and prize essays for children will be carried out.

Provincial Assembly of London, and the South Eastern Counties.

The 26th Annual Meeting of the Assembly will be held at Essex Church, Kensington, on Tuesday, October 6, 1914, when the proceedings will be as follows:—

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE National Relief Fund has reached the total of three million pounds. The Prince of Wales has entrusted the Press of the country with the pleasant task of conveying his thanks to the donors. He has also requested us to publish the following personal statement about the administration of the Fund:—

"I have delegated the responsibility of administering the Fund to the Executive Committee which I have appointed on the advice of the Prime Minister, and I count upon the Committee to see that assistance in emergency cases is adequate and given with as little delay as circumstances permit. I trust that the portion of the Fund which is to be applied in relief of civil distress may, as far as possible, flow into productive channels, such as assisting schemes for male and female employment and perhaps industrial training. For it is repugnant to me, as it must be to the recipients, that assistance should be distributed only in the form of doles. What men most want is work, and what the young people need is training."

THE battle in the north of France, which is coming to be known as "the longest battle in history," is still without definite issue as we go to press. Forces and brains seem to be fairly evenly matched, though we have no doubt which side has the best ground for confidence. The truth is being driven home that we must be prepared, as the military experts have warned us from the first, for a war not of weeks, but of months and possibly of years. This grim fact will not in the least weaken our resolution or make us less confident in the final issue. We shall keep clearly before us that we are fighting not for ourselves or our own aggrandisement but for the first principles of civilisation and the spiritual loyalties of the soul. This is a motive which will only nerve us to loftier courage and sacrifice in days of darkness and suffering. It is the braggart word and the lawless exercise of power which have little staying power. They can never throw themselves back upon the hidden reserves of religious faith.

It is difficult to think of the war as it affects ourselves while Belgium is not delivered from the curse of the invader. Already she has won for herself a name of undying splendour, and her best men know that the more terribly she suffers the deeper is our respect and the more we are confirmed in loyalty to her cause. But this is of little comfort to her peasantry, who are suffering with a dumb agony, which is one of the most terrible things in modern history. We are doing what we can to help, and we intend to do vastly more when it is possible. Meanwhile our kindness to the refugees should be as intelligent as possible. We ought to find them work, even if it means that rations will be a little shorter for our own people. It is not only that idleness soon becomes demoralising to an industrious people. We are thinking chiefly of providing some natural way of escape, through the healthy interests of daily toil from the terrible memories of devastation and death which must be with them day and night. The urgency of this problem of suitable employment is increased by the number of men among the refugees.

In an article in the Daily Chronicle Viscount Bryce has justified our traditional respect for small nationalities on the ground of enlightened policy as well as from instincts of humanity.

"The small States, whose absorption is now threatened," he says, "have been potent and useful—perhaps the most potent and useful—factors in the advance of civilisation. It is in them and by them that most of what is most precious in religion, in philosophy, in literature, in science, and in art has been produced. . . . The world is already too uniform, and is becoming more uniform every day. A few leading languages, a few forms of civilisation, a few types of character are spreading out from the seven or eight greatest States and extinguishing the weaker languages, forms, and types. . . . Although the great States are stronger and more populous, their peoples are not necessarily more gifted, and the extinction of the minor languages and types would be a misfortune for the world's future development."

VISCOUNT BRYCE concludes his article with the following fine tribute to the spiritual treasure of civilisation:—

"It is only vulgar minds that mistake bigness for greatness, for greatness is of the soul, not of the body. In the judgment which history will hereafter pass upon the forty centuries of recorded progress towards civilisation that now lie behind us, what are the tests it will apply to determine the true greatness of a people? Not population, not territory, not wealth, not military power. Rather will history ask: What examples of lofty character and unselfish devotion to honour and duty has a people given? What has it done to increase the volume of knowledge? What thoughts and what ideals of permanent value and unexhausted fertility has it bequeathed to mankind? What works has it produced in poetry, music, and the other arts to be an unfailing source of enjoyment to posterity? The small peoples need not fear the application of such tests."

THERE are no doubt a good many people who think we might have managed the difficult business of friendship with Germany in recent years more skilfully, but there can be few if any careful students of public affairs in our own country who do not believe that our Government has worked hard for peace. In his speech at Cardiff last week the Prime Minister disclosed the extreme difficulty of the situation owing to the German demand for a one-sided friendship, which should pledge us to neutrality in every contingency. The whole passage is so important for a right understanding of the psychology of Anglo-German relations that we give it in full:—

"In the year 1912 we laid down in terms carefully approved by the Cabinet, and which I will textually quote, what our relations with Germany ought in our view to be. We said, and we communicated this to the German Government—'Britain declares that she will neither make nor join in any unprovoked attack upon Germany. Aggression upon Germany is not the subject and forms no part of any treaty, understanding, or combination to which Britain is now a party, nor will she become a party to anything that has such an object.' There is nothing ambiguous or equivocal about that.

"But that was not enough for German statesmanship. They wanted us to go further. They asked us to pledge ourselves absolutely to neutrality in the event of Germany being engaged in war, and this, mind you, at a time when Germany was enormously increasing both her aggressive and defensive resources, and especially upon the sea. They asked us, to put it quite plainly, for a free hand, so far as we were concerned, when they selected the opportunity to overbear, to dominate the European world. To such a demand but one answer was possible, and that was the answer we gave."

It is in no carping spirit that we desire to call attention once again to the seriousness of the problem of the public-house at the present moment. This has been called a "teetotal war" even by The Times. Many other countries have taken drastic steps to check the dangers of intemperance, and Lord Kitchener's opinion in regard to the duty of our own soldiers is well known. There ought to be a prohibition against serving any man in uniform, and at the same time the hours during which licensed premises may be open should be reduced to a minimum. Every month will mean a greater shortage of money in the country, and it is our first duty to guard against waste and demoralisation. The patriotic course would be for the licensed trade to take the matter into its own hands and voluntarily to adopt a policy of no drink for soldiers, Sunday closing, and a restriction of hours, say from 12 noon to 9 p.m. on weekdays. If, however, this is too much to expect and the licensing magistrates continue to turn a blind eye to the evil, the whole matter ought to be dealt with by Parliament at the earliest possible moment.

"EDUCATION as usual" is to be the motto of the universities during the present session, but it will be under circumstances of great difficulty. Large numbers of junior teachers and students have volunteered, and until the war is over they will be employed in guarding civilisation instead of enriching it. This is the first duty, and no reasonable man would complain if the percentage of those who remain were even smaller than it is. But so far as possible the ordinary work of the country must go on. The children of to-day will be the citizens of tomorrow, and they must be equipped in mind and character to use our inheritance of far-flung freedom worthily, when its defences have been made secure and it is placed as a consecrated gift in their hands.

* * *

THE Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford in the course of an address to Convocation on Tuesday paid a tribute, admirable both in feeling and expression, to their intellectual fellowship with Germany which has been so rudely broken. "Mr. Cecil Rhodes," he said, "included the Germans in his scholarships scheme, and most colleges probably had received German Rhodes scholars. Of late years Germans outside the Rhodes Trust had come in increasing numbers to Oxford. Hardly any college probably had been without them. They had welcomed them and loved them. They had passed easily into the inmost circle of their friendship. They had never believed, and they did not believe now, that these men were spies and that all their frank and direct intercourse with them was unreal. . . . All this had been going on for some years. If it could have gone on a few years longer the catastrophe might have been averted. There might have been so many private friendships that the state of public war might have been impossible, but this was not to be."

THE complimentary dinner to commemorate the 80th birthday of Sir Edward Russell, the Editor of the Liverpool Daily

Post, has been postponed at his own request. He feels that at the present moment it would not be fitting to carry out a demonstration of personal esteem and affection, priceless as it would be to him. All the more we desire to associate ourselves with the widespread tribute of gratitude for his long and distinguished services to English journalism. Sir Edward Russell has been something much bigger than a mere newspaper man. He has also been a great citizen, and all his work in the social and political field has been enriched by the resources of a widely cultivated mind, by generous sympathies and a noble tolerance. He is the Nestor of the anonymous guides of public opinion, who are more powerful than the writers of many books. He can desire no higher tribute than the grateful admiration which the public is always ready to bestow upon the man who wields great power justly.

THE Editor of the Hibbert Journal has a gift for being on the spot. In the October number he has revealed his skill in mobilising the intellectual forces of the country to meet a crisis. The first seven articles deal with the deeper issues of the war from different points of view. They provide us with remarkable evidence of spiritual unity. Lord Roberts, the Bishop of Carlisle, the Editor himself, Sir Henry Jones, Professor Gilbert Murray, Mr. T. W. Rolleston and Professor G. Dawes Hicks treat the problem from the point of view of their own temperament and training, but there is in none of them any note of hesitation about the moral issue upon which we have been forced to take our side. Perhaps in the next number Dr. Jacks will increase our obligations by procuring a study of the German spirit by a writer who is familiar with the social and commercial life of Germany outside the small circles of literary and philosophical culture. We must get rid of the habit of looking at other countries chiefly through learned spectacles, if we want really to understand them. We doubt whether the scholar and the thinker, in the technical sense of the word, count for more in the great world of German industry and finance than they do on the London Stock Exchange or in the cotton mills of Lancashire. At present, because it is the scholar who has the gift of interpreting the small fragment of Germany with which he is familiar the whole picture is out of perspective, and we fear often terribly misleading.

 As some complaints have reached the Publisher of difficulty in procuring "The Inquirer" from local Newsagents since the outbreak of the War, he will be obliged if readers will report such cases to him without delay at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

THE RENEWAL OF FAITH.

FAITH is not an intellectual venture; it is an act of moral confidence, in which all the powers of loving and trusting are consecrated to the service of GOD. Behind all our explanations lies the vital experience which we are trying to explain, the actual living relationship between the soul and the Divine Life of love and goodness, of holiness and peace, in whom it lives and moves and has its being. It is this kind of faith, neither unreasoning nor unreasonable, but taking men in unbounded loyalty and strong assurance of victory far beyond the things that are seen and temporal, faith that is not a thought about GOD, but the actual answer of the awakened soul to GOD, which it is the first virtue of the Christian to possess.

But it is just this note of confidence which has grown faint in the religion of modern men. They hope to dissolve their difficulties by the alchemy of thought instead of going to meet them bravely with the sword of the spirit. Continually they are overtaken by moods of diffidence and hesitation, when they should be buckling on their armour for decisive action on the side of GOD. All the schools, conservative and liberal alike, have come to an end of profitable thinking about Christianity, until we possess ourselves of a rich treasure of new Christian experience. The commentary upon the Gospels which our age needs above all others is the commentary of life. If men want to know something of the power of the spirit and the faith which removes mountains, they will find them in richer measure in the heroism of mean streets, or the strong man's surrender of himself to a noble cause, than in the placid lecture rooms of a University. Religion has always been re-born, not in the minds of learned men in days of peace and contentment, but in the heart of the common people in days of disaster, when the mountain-tops have been shrouded in gloom, and GOD has spoken to them out of the cloud and the thick darkness.

And this is the day of our visitation; of a mighty revealing of the Most High. Already the voice of the caviller is dumb, and our hearts are being sifted as wheat, and all our principles are being tried in the fire, and only the simple and the brave shall stand in the day of His appearing. Day by day a new Bible of the race is being written, in words of flame and deeds of heroism and daring, and deaths whose agony shall bring redemption from wrong and healing for the nations. Much will perish in this time of trial, many pleasant dreams and feeble sophistries will be carried down in the flood and be no more seen; but we shall come out of it, if we may learn from all the experiences of the past, a hardier and more God-fearing people, simpler in our tastes, sterner in our virtues, richer in the fruits of the Spirit. If any of us want to study the latest commentary on the eternal Gospel, it is here, not in cunning words of human wisdom, but in letters of fire, in the sufferings and victories of human souls. And the end shall be the confidence of faith in things unseen and eternal, for it is through fellowship and sacrifice that men pass into the hiding-places of power where GOD abides for ever.

Are there any of us who will refuse to welcome, though it may be with fear and trembling, this day of sifting and judgment of Christian thought and principle? Already many of us have felt ourselves thrown back upon the things in which we can place all our confidence. We know the high places of faith where GOD talks with us day by day, and all the clever novelties of a season lie mouldering and forgotten in the valleys below. The minister of religion, if he is at all worthy of his calling, sees quite clearly that he must think less about his own sheltered happiness or his opportunities of mental cultivation and leisure for study. It is not his calling to be a University lecturer on religious topics, or to act as an instructor of human ignorance in certain departments of knowledge. Of course, he must be learned so far as time and industry can make him so. His mind should be well disciplined, well exercised, well filled, so that he may use it as a keen and efficient instrument for the highest purposes. But a learned ministry is of little use if it does not minister and, by its word and example, quicken the lives of men, the humblest, the poorest, the most ignorant, with faith in the living GOD. It must always wear its learning lightly as a flower in deference to the greater things, justice, mercy, and faith. Religion in many quarters will have to be less literary and more human, if it is to live and conquer in the world. We want less deference to the authority of theologians and more faithful following of the martyrs and the saints. In the coming days just in proportion as life becomes more earnest and simple, firmer in its grip upon essential things, more conscious of its need of religion, men will care less for clever theories about GOD and man, and good and evil; they will ask for the vital affirmations of faith upon which we are prepared to stake everything now and for ever.

Once again Christianity has flung its great defiance against the vain splendours of the world, its greed of wealth, its pride of intellect, its lust for power, its visions of domination. "The things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." Honour, justice, loving-kindness, unselfish devotion—these shall prevail. The problem of faith is not that of believing that this is so, but of confidence strong enough to make a real and lasting difference to life. If we are faithful we shall be better lovers, better helpers, better fighters for the good, in all our works and ways the holy and happy servants of the Almighty and most loving GOD.

THE MELTING POT.

O LET us throw the gangrened coin of hate,
The tarnished currency of secret toils,
The faded gold of crown-surmounted spoils
Quick in the Melting-Pot before too late!
Whilst the great cauldron, stirred by grave, veiled Fate,
With molten metals forged in Hades boils,
Let us cast in fair wonder-working oils
That forms of beauty we may thence await!
The oil of Magnanimity be one,
Turning the vanquished's hate to silvern love;
And next, the wholesome oil of Honesty,
That subterranean wiles be past and done;
Last, Oil of Brotherhood, we wait from thee
The fire-tried gold of God's own streets above.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

WHERE your treasure is, there shall your heart be also.—Matt. vi. 21.

It is in the blunt hand and the dead heart, in the diseased habit, in the hardened conscience, that men become vulgar; they are for ever vulgar precisely in proportion as they are incapable of sympathy, of quick understanding, of all that, in deep insistence on the common, but most accurate term, may be called the "tact" or "touch-faculty" of body and soul: that tact which the Mimosa has in trees, which the pure woman has above all creatures, fineness and fulness of sensation beyond reason—the guide and sanctifier of reason itself. Reason can but determine what is true; it is the God-given passion of humanity which alone can recognise what God has made good.

JOHN RUSKIN.

IN the fear and love of God our Father, let us do good unto all men.

Opening our mind's eyes to things unseen, let us carry through things temporal, thoughts eternal.

Let our strength in soberness be strong for duty, and our weakness in humility suffice for patience.

Let our life be in Thy sight, when we stretch forth our hands unto Thee; and when out of the deep our soul crieth, hear us, O Lord.

Let no angry sound break the silence of our prayer, nor desire nor hatred stand in the shadow of Thy fear.

Grant us, O Lord, fellowship with Thee and Thy servants, in faith without shame, and love without pretence; in fulfilling Thy commandments soberly, and bearing every spiritual fruit.

Thou who hast prepared for them that love Thee things which it enters not into the heart of man to conceive, grant us in Thyself more than we can ask or think.

Grant us a share in Thy Spirit of holiness, and cleanse every stain.

Be to us a healer of all sickness and unsoundness, and in our spiritual life food, and in our conscience peace.

O Thou that alone makest all contradictions clear, in Thy light let us see light.

Illuminate our minds with practice of humility, and confirm them with growth of faith.

Make us firm in endurance, with liveliness of thanksgiving, and confidence of prayer.

Let us grow up to fulness of wisdom in the bond of love, till we all come to mutual affection, and are perfect on earth, as our Father in heaven is perfect.

Here then, O Sovereign Lord, remembering all Thy mercies and all our unworthiness, and desiring to be at one with Thee again, we offer up ourselves to Thy holy service, and desire Thy blessed thought to be fulfilled in us.

We pray that not unworthily, but in good conscience, we may become a temple of the breath of Thy holiness.

Save us from all doing or suffering evil, from the sting of evil conscience and from every inordinate passion.

Make our thoughts the lively echoes of Thy commandments, and take our hearts for Thy kingdom.

Lord God, let Thy thought be fulfilled in mankind, and breathe on Thy children perpetual peace.

From the "Psalms and Litanies" of Rowland Williams.

LET me be diligent in thy service, O Lord, day by day. Let all labour be my delight which is for thee, and all rest weary me which is not in thee; and may every undertaking be begun, continued, and ended in thee, to the glory of thy holy name. Amen.

O GOD of patience and consolation, be merciful unto our infirmities, and make us ever ready to consider the necessities of those around us; and when we are tempted by selfishness or pride, bestow thy grace, that we may with gentleness make allowance for the frailty of others. Amen.

THE RELIGIOUS SPIRIT THAT BEFITS THIS CRISIS.

BY JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

THEREIN is the only conceivable justification of war—that it is the most awful expression which a people can give of their willingness to suffer to the last in the protection of the right—an expression, therefore, that never should be given unless it is certain to be redeemed, and to enter upon war in any other spirit than this, lower than this in sentiment, or short of it in resolution, is unquestionably at once the extreme both of iniquity and of poltroonery. No war can be defended for an instant, unless a people can stand before God and say, and out of fellowship with His own spirit of holiness and of goodness, "We have no choice in this matter, and we must endure unto the end."

It is no superstition, then, but in the very spirit and truth of worship, that in the great necessities of duty, or what they deem such, in giving the most concentrated utterance to the national conscience and the national will, a people should seek to stand together in God's presence, and call to mind under what responsibilities they are acting, and under whose rule they are. And as no war is so detestable as a war of which religion is the pretext, those who profess in this matter to have no motive of ambition or of self, to speak and act in God's name, to interpose between nations only as avengers of wrong and protectors of the weak, are especially bound not to defile the Holy Name they use, to pause reverently before they clothe themselves with the awful powers of the ministers of His judgments upon earth and take the sword of Justice in their hands, to purify their passions, to exalt their purposes, to look into their inmost thoughts, whether in simple reliance upon God's sympathy with the right, they are able to ask His blessing out of hearts cleansed from all other motives.

The passage from a state of peace to a state of war is the most momentous act of a nation's existence, in the purpose it implies, and in the consequences it challenges. In what spirit does it challenge them? Is it a spirit of stern and sorrowful determination, but of serene and steadfast faith—not a spirit of humiliation—for, unless we feel that God is calling us to a high duty, we have no business with this matter at all. Is it in a spirit that remembers that the battle is not always either to the strong or to the just, and that it is the habit of God, by long trials and crucifixions, to test the earnestness of those who stand before the world as the allies of His holiness and love? It cannot be denied that, in itself considered, there is something grand and solemn in the idea of a whole nation in the assumption of such offices setting apart a day for meditation, fixing their thoughts at one and the same moment upon a crisis of high and terrible duty, asking God to elevate them to the occasion, and to strip them of every passion and prompting which He would discard from His alliance. What now, in this crisis, are the considerations which a people must be prepared to bring into God's presence, and to justify their own souls thereon, before they can ask His blessing, or expect that He will finally sustain them, when they profess to act in His name?

The first condition of our national spiritual deliverance in this crisis is in our solemn persuasion of the righteousness of this war, and of its inevitableness now, unless something more precious than blood and treasure is to be sacrificed and lost. I set aside now all theoretic and abstract questions about the justifiableness or the unjustifiableness of war. Whatever may be the speculative truth upon that point, the pressing question of practical duty is not determined by that, but by the moral facts of the case. I am concerned now only with what the conscience of the nation deliberately approves, and, whether speculatively right or wrong, the true stand to take is upon the acknowledged principle that even a mistaken conscience binds. Is the conscience of the nation satisfied of the righteousness of this war, and has it come to that decision with adequate solemnity, and in clear sight of all the unutterable possibilities of woe which it dares into existence? Is it a war into which we think God calls us? Is it a war undertaken in His behalf, and from which we cannot hold back, because we dare not leave His Providence without our witness? Is its only object to restrain what He hates—oppression, injustice, persecution, falsehood? It is of the last importance, both to our absolution now and to our power of long endurance through a trial of which none can see the end, that all our present acts and impulses have their roots in this conviction of righteousness. Of course, any thorough conviction of the righteousness of this war must be based upon an accurate knowledge of the circumstances in which it originates, and such knowledge is unquestionably necessary to sustain the sentiment of the country. It would be quite out of place to enter upon any political statement here, but the outline of facts which has been presented to the conscience of the nation, and upon which its moral judgment has been delivered and its purpose taken, ought to be held in clear mastery by all who venture to name the great names of Righteousness and God in connection with the war they have encouraged, or who would guard against the deep and solemn sentiment in which it began being evaporated in the grosser passions it may excite.

* * This passage with its extraordinary appropriateness to present events is taken from a sermon on "The Religious Spirit that befits this Crisis," by John Hamilton Thom, preached in Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool, April 23, 1854, on the Sunday before the day appointed for National Humiliation.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE WAR.

SIR,—I should need to ask too much of your space if I attempted to answer to the long list of sins which the Rev. James Harwood attributes to me, but as a matter of fact he has not read my letter with any degree of accuracy and consequently his charges are somewhat beside the mark. I did not say that all the Great Powers are equally responsible for "the terrible evil now desolating Europe." There can, I suppose, be little doubt that the Prussian military clique is responsible for the immediate outbreak of war. I said that the Powers are equally responsible for "a frightful evil in Europe—the organisation of Europe in hostile camps, huge armaments, secret foreign policy and a crushing industrialism." These are the root causes of war, and they constitute the evil which, pace Mr. Asquith in a most admirable passage in his speech at Dublin, we must in the future "repudiate" if we would establish out of the wreck of the war "the public right of Europe." These evils express the spirit which has been, and is, rampant in the ruling classes of all Europe. All Europe is responsible for the conditions which have given Prussian militarism its opportunity. This is no "pontifical assignment of blame without reason given," as Mr. Miall declares, but is surely a simple statement of fact. I read and re-read with the greatest care and anxiety the White Paper, as many must have done. The deduction seemed to me to be that in the weeks of crisis Sir Edward Grey did everything possible in the circumstances to avoid war. That he failed to prevent it was mainly, I believe, because he and the other responsible statesmen of Europe who worked for peace were enmeshed in a system which Mr. Lloyd George told us last January, in his picturesque way, was "organised insanity," bound to lead to disaster. I honour Sir Edward Grey for his efforts, but I am more than thankful to Mr. Asquith because he has not hesitated to call for the abolition of this vicious system.

Mr. Miall talks of our having, as a nation, to decide, &c., but he surely knows that war was decided for us before even Parliament was informed of the causes. Senator La Fontaine, of the Belgian Parliament, said the other day, "Had the dispatches in the White Paper been published as they came and went there might have been no war." I believe there is much truth in that remark. Let me finally urge Mr. Miall, instead of posing me with a series of irrelevant questions, to reconsider my plea for an effort to maintain, even in the present terrible circumstances, some vestige of the "international mind," so that when the war draws to an end and the Allies are successful, we may avoid the fate of Germany when she issued victorious from the struggle with French imperialism. Such a plea is neither unpatriotic, nor unmoral, nor unchristian. Mr. Harwood justly blames me for allowing the name of the National Peace Council to appear as part of my address. My letter could not, I think, be thought to be official, but obviously the Council's name should not have appeared.—Yours, &c.,

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

SIR,—Have not your correspondents missed the point of my letter, viz., that compulsory service being inevitable, it would be well to discuss the matter in a practical way? Instead of having to deal with proposals, I am thrown back upon principles. To put it shortly, readers of THE INQUIRER have not been provided with alternative suggestions for Lord Kitchener when he comes to impose compulsory service. We are told of Zabernism. I wanted to hear of the Swiss system, of what is happening in New Zealand, of a wider application of Boy Scouting. From the standpoints of discipline and decorum, universal military training for home defence is worthy of consideration. Sir Roland K. Wilson does me the courtesy to discuss "Compulsory Military Service" at some length. I will try to briefly deal with his arguments. Noblesse oblige is my reply to his first paragraph, where the suggestion should remain at home, while the peasant obtains change of scene on the battlefield. If a man is too superior to associate in the defence of his country with others of less refinement, he is unworthy of the amenities of that country. This is the time to demonstrate the Wordsworthian saying that in England is one breath, and not to talk of "human beings who may have nothing whatever in common beyond the fact of being physically sound males within certain age limits."

Touching the matter of recruiting an army by financial measures (presuming patriotic service can be bought), there is a prior consideration, viz., national policy. If this policy be one of extreme peace, amounting to non-resistance, the army will assume the dimensions of a police force. If the policy be one of self-defence, a just estimate of the possible attacking force must be made. We know now, what some of us refused to believe before the war, that England can be attacked by land, i.e., in France. "Paris, then London!" is the sword hanging over our heads at the present moment. That an English expeditionary force of 170,000 was swept back from Mons shows that for defensive purposes England needs a much bigger army. It would have to be much bigger still if France and Russia adopted the suggestion of a voluntary army, serving from motives of pay. Forgive me if I add to my previous indictment—some of us are prepared to shelter behind Continental conscripts, while decrying compulsory service here. Further, has Sir Roland thought of the effect upon the general labour market of paying soldiers at a rate sufficient to recruit an army adequate to the situation? As to efficiency, the "personal ascendancy" of our men over the German is not due to the fact that they are volunteers as opposed to conscripts, but because of their traditions and training. We now know that the conscripts on both sides have their hearts in their work. I believe a conscript soldier with national ideals is likely to prove a better fighter (given equality of training and leadership) than the man who joins the army because he cannot obtain civil employment. But Sir Robert refuses to make a distinction between civil and military employment, arguing that necessity is a common factor. But surely there is congenial occupation, and a necessity that goes hand in hand with natural desires. My point is clinched by the fact that in proportion as trade is good, recruiting is bad. When trade ebbs, recruiting flows. Besides, is it not a fact that in peace time people look askance at the soldier? Would Sir Roland describe our army at Mons as national merely because it was paid for and controlled by the State? As employed in the present discussion "national" refers to quantity rather than quality. English spirit was happily present at Mons, but England's might was not adequately represented.

If my rejoinders to Mr. Geo. J. Allen's kind letter appear curt, my reason is lack of space and not want of appreciation. His classification of military work with coal-mining and train-shunting is likely to provide ground for the German sneer that our soldiers are mercenaries. Waterloo and Waterloo Station differ not in degree but in kind. Because Germany, who explicitly states her Empire was born in war, mistakes might for right, does it follow that we who are at war on sentimental grounds would descend to Prussianism? We have not abused our naval power, and at this stage in our national development we shall not use the sword aggressively. I think I cannot do better than refer Mr. Allen in the matter of the conscriptionists to Lord Roberts' article in the current number of the Hibbert Journal. My inherent regard for justice and fair play prompted the suggestion that where all stand to lose, all should be prepared to defend. Our present system is vulnerable on two sides:—(1) Economic pressure is the chief recruiting officer. (2) Standing aside ourselves we: (a) employ native troops from India; (b) expect our Allies to enforce conscription.—Yours, &c.,

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH AND THE WAR.

SIR,—All through these last fateful weeks, since this terrible war broke upon us, I have been looking for some definite pronouncement of the Churches in answer to the many vital questions which the exceptional circumstances raise. Especially during the past week or two, when there has been a breathing space, and the press has been so full of interesting documents, including an address from the German theologians, and the testimony of many groups of thinking men, authors, professors and others as to the justice of this war, and suggestions as to what should follow when hostilities cease, I thought the voice of the Churches as a whole would be heard; but I fail to hear it. There are in many of the Church papers good articles and letters on the issues involved, and answers to the German theologians, and from the first there have been sectional professions of faith, including a very fine one from the Society of Friends; but some of us, perhaps unwarrantably, ask for something more.

I am not a young enthusiast who expects life's problems to be solved at once. I have looked out on this "unintelligible world" for more than eighty years. I remember well the enthusiasms and subsequent disappointments of the Crimean War, and the horrors of the Indian Mutiny, and the deliberations and long series of hopes, fears and blunders of the South African War. I look back upon the dream of Universal Peace which at one time gladdened our hearts and the recent fears which the growing armaments have caused. We tried to believe that they made for peace, but a terrible awakening was in store for us during these lovely summer days. Not only is this war bigger than the world has ever seen, but the development of civilisation has brought us all more in touch with it, and caused such an upheaval of life's "use and wont" as one never remembers before. Is it any wonder that some of us old people are staggered, and ask what it all means? This must be my apology for expressing a feeling which I know must be stirring in the hearts of many while this tragedy of the nations is being enacted.

I do not question the earnestness of Christians of all denominations who are working in so many ways in the service of our troops and in trying to ameliorate the sufferings attendant on the war. Is this all they can do? What answer can they give to the English and German writers who have been preaching the philosophy and religion of physical force? Mr. Harold Wyatt says, "Efficiency in war is God's test of the nation's soul." Writing of the advance of mankind through war, he compares it to what Matthew Arnold called "a something not ourselves that makes for righteousness." The late Professor Cramb wrote, "In Europe this conflict between Christ and Napoleon for the mastery over the minds of men is the most significant spiritual conflict of the twentieth century." "Corsica," he tells us, "has conquered Galilee." General von Bernhardi says that "might is at once the supreme right, and the dispute as to what is right is decided by the arbitrament of war." The knowledge, therefore, that war depends on biological laws leads to the conclusion that every attempt to exclude it from international relations must be demonstrably untenable. We read such arguments, backed up as they are in many cases by seemingly religious and moral ideas, and we ask, "Is it then conquest, 'the will to power' or righteousness that exalteth a nation?" From these writers we turn our eyes to what this war has done in bringing out impulses of unity, brotherhood and of self-sacrifice, and we are almost inclined to believe these prophets must be right. We want to know whether, indeed, there is no other way of rousing and uniting a nation and bringing out the nobler qualities but by the devastation of war. If the Churches of the world, many of whom have made claims for centuries to be ordained to interpret the ways of God to man, can give no answer, where are some of us who are giving our noblest and dearest to be sacrificed for the nations to look for light and leading? And the answer must be given with no uncertain sound. We must know where we stand, whether we are working with God or against Him. What explanation can the Churches make to the heathen among whom they work as to the spectacle of six so-called Christian nations destroying one another? To our Indian subjects who are coming so loyally to our help, when they return, diminished, exhausted and possibly disgusted, what hope have the Churches to give of finding a better way in the future?

I know that besides those who have publicly given suggestions there are groups of earnest men, who, on social and ethical lines, are thinking out this problem of finding a better way afterwards. But surely the spiritual side should have due weight, and one would be glad to hear of similar efforts among religious people. Some may say that, with the doubtful issue of affairs, it is too early to be forming any theories as to action at the termination of the war; but it is a matter of principles, and these principles must guide us whichever way the fortunes of the war may turn. Therefore, we want public opinion educated now. I see that the Autumn Congresses are being given up. Would it not be better that they should be united rather than abandoned, and a great conference of all the Churches be held to consider the larger questions which the present eventful time is bringing to the front? This crisis has been the means of drawing out the wonderful imaginative and executive power of all classes. It is the great opportunity of the Churches; that they may have both the will and the wisdom to use it is my sincere prayer.—Yours, &c.,

THE INFLUENCE OF NON-COMBATANTS.

SIR,—Every man who enlists to-day is offering his life in exchange for an immortality we may all honour and which many will find it in their hearts to envy. But not for one moment is it to be admitted that those who for any reason cannot, or ought not, to fight on the field have a less crucial part to play in the making of history. It is the temper of a people which wins the ultimate victory, and we in these protected islands have a unique opportunity of preserving that coolness of judgment for want of which heroic blood has again and again bathed the earth in vain. It depends mainly upon us at home whether this war is a mere holocaust of blood and flames calling for more blood and flames for numberless generations to come, or whether it is the awful birth-throes of a nobler earth. It is our soldiers' task to meet, to crush, and to paralyse our foes upon the field. It is ours to respect, to love, and to rescue them as a nation and a race. Neither the barbarism of the German soldier, nor the blundering crimes of his officers, nor the insane policies of his statesmen must make us forget the greatness of Germany at her greatest and truest.

After this war (if it goes as we hope and intend) the heart of Europe, from the Baltic to the Danube, will hold nearly one hundred millions of the German peoples, bereaved, impoverished, disheartened and alas! dishonoured before the world. In the heart of every little German lad and lass will be nursed an immortal passion to rebuild the monument of German fame. No mere force of arms can permanently prevent its rising again in the form of a perennial menace to the rest of Europe. Only the genius of sympathy which has hitherto given England all her most characteristic triumphs can hope to turn its growth into a form which shall give added splendour to the land of Luther and of Beethoven. In the former case we have lived to see the greatest days of Europe for ever, or for centuries to come. In the latter case we are but upon the threshold of the European epoch of our planet's history. In any case, posterity will judge us not by our professions to be fighting for "Christ" or "Cæsar," but by whether we rely for final success upon the weapons of the one or of the other. Alfred first waked the spirit which has welded the peoples of this island and its Empire by a sword that sought to bless both friend and foe. Our own day has given a constitution to the conquered Boer republics, and, in the words of General Botha, Britain has "ever since regarded them as a free people and a sister state"—so that the most obstinate of our sometime foes now come forward to organise victory for our flag.

It is often vastly nobler to fight than to stand aside. But it is never nobler to hate than to love, to fear the evil more than we trust the good in men or nations. And however imperative it is to refuse to bow to evil force, the mere refusal is idle if it is not yoked with a set determination to evoke the better will. This is our task at home to-day, and in Europe when our arms have spoken their last. Let none think it ignominious. Let none think it light.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH WICKSTEED.

THE CHRISTIANITY OF PEACE.

SIR,—May I venture to appeal to you to put a little more emphasis on the Christianity of peace, rather than the Christianity of the present war, as far as we are concerned. The entire Press at such times as these spends its energy on vindicating our position in the war—a position which from a point of view of political honesty requires no vindicating. If this country can be educated up to a standard of Christianity which regards war with abhorrence—if it can be brought to realise that Christ would not have taken life at any price, that our spirituality is of infinitely more value than our national pride or our individual liberty, the influence of this sentiment would be bound to be felt abroad, even in the furthest portions of the world, and we might feel then that we had indeed given something to History, something even more worthy than a vast and justly-ruled empire, something more everlasting even than the name British of which we are so proud, something which borders on that great name—Christian.—Yours, &c.,

THE SPREAD OF INFORMATION.

SIR,—On the principle that everyone can help, may I suggest to business men, and indeed to all who have friends and correspondents in neutral countries, that when writing the opportunity should be taken to call attention to the English position in regard to the origin of the war and its conduct. In response, important information may be obtained that may be of service to the State. Again, very useful work could be done by sending to such correspondents English newspapers, daily or weekly, and in particular those containing the official reports of the Press Bureau, or despatches from General French or his staff. These might well be supplemented by some of the valuable pamphlet literature on the war. Especially is it desirable to circulate the wonderful penny Blue Book that has just been issued.—Yours, &c.,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE WHITE FEATHER.

THE following Band of Mercy address was given at Horsham recently :—

As I was walking down West-street a few days ago, I saw something lying on the pavement, which I stooped and picked up. It was a pretty little white feather, and I wondered how it came there and whether it had a story to tell. Then my mind wandered back, a long, long way; and I remembered how, when a child, I had heard of the first time a White Feather was used as an emblem, and what it was a sign of. We, in Horsham, ought to know something about William Penn, for, like George Fox, he has walked our streets and visited some of the houses we know, and it was at the Friends' Meeting House just below that, according to the custom of Quakers, he had permission from the Monthly Meeting to be married. He lived in the reign of Charles the Second, and the King owed his father a large sum of money, as much as £16,000. In payment of this he granted him some land in America, and in 1682, when he was 38 years old, he sailed across the Atlantic and up the Delaware River with about a hundred friends, mostly from Sussex, quite likely some from Horsham and the neighbourhood of Billingshurst (for he had a nice home at Warminghurst, which is near there, and used to preach at a little chapel which is still standing, called Blue Idol). He called the name of his land Penn-sylvania, the last part of it meaning that it had many trees growing upon it. Although the land had been granted to him, as we have seen, he still thought it was fair to pay the Indians for it, and this had been done before he came to America. The Indian Council fires were burning as the barge came up the river, and the trees wore all the beautiful colours of autumn. William Penn was a fine looking man in the very prime of life; he was dressed just like his companions except that he had a netted blue scarf round his waist. The Indian chief said they were ready to hear the new governor, who began his address by saying :—

"The Great Spirit rules in the Heavens and the Earth. He knows the innermost thoughts of men. He knows that we have come with a hearty desire to live with you in peace. We use no hostile weapons against our enemies; good faith and good will towards men are our defences. We believe you will deal kindly and justly by us, as we will deal kindly and justly by you. We meet on the broad pathway of good faith and good will; no advantage shall be taken on either side, but all shall be openness and love."

Then he read them the treaty which told them :—

"We will be brethren, my people and your people, as the children of one Father. All the paths shall be open to the Christian and the Indian. The doors of the Christian shall be open to the Indian, and the wigwam of the Indian shall be open to the Christian."

The final pledge was :—

"We will transmit this league between us to our children. It shall be made stronger and stronger, and be kept bright and clean, without rust or spot, between our children and our children's children, while the rivers run, and while the sun, moon and stars endure."

The Indians on their side answered :—
"We will live in love with William Penn and his children as long as the moon and the stars endure."

The tree underneath which this pledge was taken stood until the year 1810. Other trees round it were cut down for firewood during the Revolution, but a special sentinel was placed under this one so that it should not be hurt. The treaty was kept for more than seventy years, and though six Indian nations were around the Pennsylvanians, peace was maintained during all that time; others of the early settlers had much trouble, and great damage was often done. Penn's followers adopted as their badge a white feather, and when the Indians saw this they knew it belonged to people who were Friends, not only in word but in deed.

Although these early Quakers refused to fight we must not think they were cowards. In the year 1662 over 4,000 of them are said to have been imprisoned for their religion, and in many ways they showed their bravery. So if any of you hear of the White Feather being given in contempt, tell your friends this true story of the first people who used it, and say you take it to mean, that love of justice and fair play and kind dealing which we like to think English people, most of them, believe in.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

'SOUTHERN PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY. ANNUAL MEETING.

THE twenty-sixth annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties was held on Tuesday, October 6, at Essex Church, Kensington. Owing to the difficulties created by the war, it had been found necessary to postpone the visit to Ilford, which was to have taken place this year, and to curtail the programme; but there was a good attendance of members and delegates at the business meeting in Lindsey Hall in the afternoon, when the chair was taken by the President, Mr. Edgar Worthington. Before entering upon the matters down for discussion, the President said he felt sure he would be permitted to mention the one thing that filled their thoughts at the present time, the great crisis through which the nation is passing, the like of which no living Englishman has ever known before. They all had their part to play in helping their fellow-men to break down the tyranny which was menacing their freedom and bring about a peace which would have lasting fruits. Their sympathy and encouragement would go out to those who, having the advantages of youth and activity, were now fighting their battles. It was a time for great searching of heart in order that they might discover what they could do to help each other, though they could not be in the fighting line.

The Report surveyed the general work of the Assembly during the past year, special reference being made to the new movement at Westcliff, which, it is hoped, will have practical results in the erection of a new church before long. In his annual statement the Rev. W. H. Drummond covered a large area of the work of the Assembly, and referred to the opportunities which his visits to the outlying congregations afford of keeping in touch with local needs and strengthening the bonds of fellowship between the churches. "One of the most significant events among the country churches of the Assembly during the past year," he said, "has been the renovation of the Ancient Meeting House at Lewes. No scheme of restoration could have been carried through with more generosity and loving care and genuine refinement of taste. I need not go into the details here, but I should like to call special attention to the beauty of the chapel. It is a place rich in devotional feeling. Everyone upon entering it must feel at once that it is dedicated to the spirit of worship, and no one who has had the pleasure of officiating in it since the restoration can have failed to notice a new richness of tone in the service; in other words, the surroundings, instead of hindering the sentiments of devotion, or being merely neutral, are distinctly helpful and encouraging. Now it is just this encouragement of a reverent and devotional spirit which is greatly needed in many places, and which it is very difficult to preserve where there is no continuity of ministry, and no regular observance of certain forms of religious utterance, which unite the worshippers Sunday by Sunday by links of common religious habit. I feel myself the need more and more of a settled order of worship among our small congregations, to which the preacher would accommodate himself instead of the worshippers having to accept an unfamiliar attitude both of thought and devotion every Sunday." The report concluded with hearty acknowledgments to the Lay Preachers' Union and the Pioneer Preachers for much generous help in places where there is no settled minister.

The President, in moving the adoption of the Report, urged them to go forward as a union of free Christians for the work and worship of God, with "religion not a creed, but a life" for their motto. The essence of their movement should be a fuller spiritual life.

Dr. Drummond, of Oxford, in seconding the adoption of the Report, said that from the foundation of that Society he had always felt a deep interest in it, and he had watched closely the useful and, he hoped, elevating work which had been carried on. It seems to me, he continued, that its fundamental idea is that of fellowship. I have often felt that in our small denomination and isolated congregations there is a want of the deep feeling of united life, and I am quite sure that this want is calculated to impair the depth and power of our religious life. I entirely believe that the devout and earnest life is very active and fervent amongst us, but there has been a certain degree of religious reticence springing very largely, not from want of feeling, but the depth of feeling, which we have sometimes carried to an extreme. It is difficult to maintain a high and pure faith alone. It is because we find it difficult that we meet together Sunday by Sunday for worship. We long for a wider fellowship, and to know that the boundaries of a larger life extend far beyond the boundaries of our smaller life. We have a very striking example just now of the way in which one profound feeling seems to sweep away all the difficulties and failures, including in a vast, pure, and deep emotion the lesser emotions which rise in our every-day life. Now the duty of our churches in such a crisis is, I think, in the first place to take advantage of this larger sense of fellowship, and to try and raise it into a pure religious sphere so that out of this great national movement may spring some deeper and wider religious movement when quiet times once more return to us. It is also their duty to keep down all bitter passion. The papers harrow us every day, and sometimes stir us to deep wrath, but it is the duty of our churches to elevate us above all unrighteous anger, and to cultivate in us the forgiving spirit, and give us that charitable insight into the temptations and failures and weaknesses of others which shall make us remember that we also may be tempted and may fall. In this way a great responsibility is laid upon us, and for my part, as I go to my place of worship Sunday after Sunday, I long to be lifted out of the atmosphere of the week and to lose myself in a region where all is peace, and pity, and forgiveness. It is only in such a spirit that we can hope when peace comes that it may be a lasting peace, that our enmities may be turned into friendships, that other nations may lay aside their bitterness and hostility, that brotherly hands may be clasped all round the world, and the reign of Christ at last begin.

The Revs. E. Lockett, A. H. Biggs, and J. M. Connell spoke in support of the motion, and the Report was adopted. The Rev. H. Gow moved the election of officers and committee for the ensuing year, with the Rev. Joseph Wood as President, and Mr. Worthington as hon. treasurer, and the Rev. Gordon Cooper as hon. secretary. A welcome extended to the representatives of kindred societies was acknowledged in short speeches by Mr. Ion Pritchard for the Sunday School Association, Miss Alleyne for the Liberal Christian League, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Rev. J. Harwood for the National Conference. The Rev. A. Farquharson was appointed preacher and the Rev. A. H. Biggs supporter for next year. The meeting was brought to a close by the singing of the National Anthem. The members and delegates were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Worthington for tea at 1, St. John's gardens, and at 7 o'clock a service was held at Essex Church, conducted by the Rev. A. Farquharson, the preacher being the Rev. W. H. Drummond.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

DR. MELLONE ON THE TWO GERMANIES.

THE opening meeting of the new Session was held in the College, Summerville, Victoria Park, Manchester, on Tuesday afternoon, the 6th inst. There was a very good attendance. In the absence of the President, Mr. R. D. Holt, M.P., the chair was taken by Mr. F. W. Monks, J.P., chairman of Committee, who after a few words of welcome to the new students spoke of the gratification felt by the Committee in the continued increase in the membership of the College, the residence being now full. The Principal (Dr. Mellone) expressed the pleasure with which he was able to state that, in place of the three who had left the College in the summer and were now engaged in the regular work of the ministry, they welcomed six new students, raising the number on the roll to fourteen—thirteen in residence and one special student. After speaking of the absence of the student elected by the Hungarian Unitarian Church to the scholarship recently founded by Miss E. Sharpe, Dr. Mellone said that when at some future date a student from that country entered the College, he hoped he would come as a citizen of a free and independent nation. The new session opened under circumstances which were not normal. We were at war with a nation which claimed to have made imperishable contributions to the mental and spiritual heritage of mankind. For that claim there was a sound basis, as he, in common with every lecturer in the country, must acknowledge. There were two contrasted elements in German national life. There was the Germany of the Prussian military autocracy—arrogant and ambitious, knowing no law but brute force, acknowledging no right but power to crush and destroy. Then there was the Germany of mental and spiritual freedom, to whose leadership in music, philosophy, and theology we were all indebted. These two elements were inextricably entangled together. Men whose names were honoured in every realm of human scholarship and investigation had sold their souls in slavery to a vast machine embodying an utterly non-moral will, a hideous idol of blood and iron, ready to trample under its heel nations, cities, and peoples of a set plan and purpose, as well as to fling its own sons in thousands to certain death. This was the thing with which we were at war, a thing to be crushed and destroyed unless Europe was to be held in a narrow and brutal domination.

Unhappily men in other nations had become blinded to this distinction, and attempts were being made in our own country to discredit scientific and historical results in the realms of German scholarship by pointing to the brutality reigning in the world of German reaction. Out of the war he hoped would come a disentangling of these two elements, and the preservation for mankind of that nobler Germany whose contributions to human progress all the world was ready to acknowledge before the passion of war had dwarfed its judgment.

The Chairman then called on the Warden, the Rev. H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D., to deliver the opening address, which took the form of a most interesting survey of the history of the College, with special reference to the first decade (1854-64). The audience heard with satisfaction from the Chairman that the address formed part of a complete history of the College, shortly to be published.

EDUCATION AND THE WAR.

LIKE all movements educational, the University Tutorial Classes for Working People—those little groups of eager students that meet weekly during the winter to study Economics, History, Sociology and Literature—are not unaffected by the war. A projected increase in the number of classes is rendered for the time being impossible. From the thirty London classes many students—including about half a dozen secretaries of classes—have undertaken military service. From one class of 24 students at least five have enlisted. Classes at places like Enfield and Woolwich will naturally have to try to live through a difficult time. All the classes may be affected by the unemployment and uncertainty that will prevail. The movement, however, as a whole, goes on. With very few exceptions the classes continue, and will be found near the centre at Holborn and Fleet-street, &c., and at the outposts of London like Finchley, Croydon, Southall, Wandsworth, Ilford. In addition, new three-year courses are starting at Morley College (Waterloo-road), at Sutton, West Ham and Wimbledon. It is believed that upon those who are not permitted to share personally in the present European conflict a responsibility rests to keep going all our worthy educational agencies—in particular those aiming at the building up of a sound educated democracy—so that when the war is over that democracy will be more able than ever to take its part in solving the tremendous problems that will arise.

Within comparatively easy reach of almost every serious student in London one of these classes is to be found, and in most of the classes there are some vacancies for genuine students. The session is just beginning, and the classes are studying Economics, Economic History, General History, European History, Sociology, Biology, Political Science and Literature. The fees are nominal, there are no examinations, and the sole object of the classes is to get knowledge in the spirit of comradeship. All further information will gladly be sent by the Organising Secretary of Tutorial Classes, University of London, South Kensington.

THE PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, CARMARTHEN.

Divinity Students and the Art of Teaching.

THE Managers of the Presbyterian Board recently entered into negotiations with the authorities of the South Wales Training College for Teachers at Carmarthen, and have been able to arrange with Principal A. W. Parry, B.A., B.Sc., of that Institution, to deliver to their students a course of lectures and demonstrations on the Practical Art of Teaching as adapted specially to the needs of a Sunday school. The course, which begins this month, will extend over two sessions, covering both the theory and practice of teaching as at present understood, and will be of a thoroughly practical character. Some 35 students for the ministry will be able to take advantage of this course. An incidental, but not unimportant, result of this new departure will be that students of the two institutions, the Presbyterian Theological College and the Training College for Teachers, will meet together as fellow-students in the same class rooms. To Principal Parry and the authorities of the Training College the Board desire to express their appreciation of the cordial assistance which they have received. This course will form an addition to the work already done at the College.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

THE annual meetings of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union were held at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, on Saturday, October 3, the President, the Rev. J. Harwood, in the chair.

In connection with the war two resolutions were unanimously carried. The first was proposed by the chairman, and read as follows:—

“That this meeting, while deploring the terrible war in which the country finds itself involved, declares its firm conviction that our participation therein is at once righteous and inevitable, and trusts that for the sake of the smaller nations, for the protection of our own country so wantonly threatened now and for many years past, and for the suppression of Prussian militarism, which oppressed Europe with its curse, the war will not be concluded until the peace of the world can be re-established on enduring foundations.”

Mr. Grosvenor Talbot moved a second resolution, as follows:—

“We members of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, abhorring war as an unchristian and wrong method of settling international disputes, deplore its outbreak among the nations of Europe; we believe that this war is, fundamentally, the result of national ambitions, jealousies and antipathies, and confess, with humiliation, that the Church has failed to create a better spirit, and to build up a true unity and brotherhood among its adherent States; we are convinced that the representatives of our Government in the present crisis used every expedient to preserve the peace of Europe, and we recognise that they could not with honour and safety submit to Germany's violation of treaties, on whose sanctity any possibility of permanent peace between the peoples must ever rest. Believing, moreover, as we do in a Kingdom of Heaven, which shall include the nations, we affirm our conviction that in the future the efforts of Government and of Church should be directed to establishing a unity of all the Great Powers of Europe, in which quarrels will be adjudged on grounds of equity and righteousness. To this end we assert ourselves the foes of militarism, and affirm the vital necessity of strengthening and spreading the faith and ideals of Christianity, and of extending the power of enlightened democracy as the most potent factor towards international peace.”

A DECLARATION has been issued by the Free Church League for Woman Suffrage, by which the signatories bind themselves (1) To pray or will, once a day, that war may soon end. (2) To refuse to believe evil reports of an enemy unless substantiated. (3) To talk and think of a settlement as a sequel to the war that will prevent war. (4) And it affirms belief that a great safeguard of peace would be the influence of women in the Councils of the State. Copies of this Declaration to be had (postage included) from 3d. for six, at the F.C.L.W.S. Office, 13, Bream's-buildings, Chancery-lane, E.C.

OUR readers will learn with interest and pleasure that the messages sent through the Austrian Ambassador by the Rev. Fred. Hankinson from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, as well as from himself, to the families of Hungarians who are stranded in England, were safely delivered. Professor Boros, under date of September 23, writes tendering warm thanks to the Unitarians of England for the generous care which has been bestowed. The Consistory of the Unitarian Churches in Hungary, on the motion of Bishop Ferencz, unanimously adopted a resolution expressing its appreciation and gratitude. It may be added that the Unitarian College at Kolozsvár is now being used as a hospital for soldiers wounded in the war.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—As the result of two special efforts at Richmond-hill Church, substantial amounts have been collected for and sent to the National Relief Fund and the local Red Cross Society.

Chatham.—It may be remembered that the Rev. Geo. S. Hitchcock, M.A., D.D., S.S.D., chaplain of St. Anne's College, Sanderstead, was suspended three months ago by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Southwark for declining to submit his newspaper correspondence to censorship. Last Sunday evening the Unitarian congregation of Chatham, having heard that Dr. Hitchcock now occupies the Free Church position, unanimously invited him to undertake the ministry of their church. It is interesting to note that it was the same pulpit which he left to become a Roman Catholic more than eleven years ago.

Clifton.—The 50th anniversary of the opening of Oakfield-road Church was celebrated on Saturday evening, October 3, Mr. P. J. Worsley presiding. Addresses were given by the Rev. Principal Carpenter, first minister of the congregation, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and the Revs. R. H. U. Bloor (Exeter), Herbert Morgan (Tyndale), Lewis Johnson (David Thomas Memorial), and A. N. Blatchford (Lewins Mead). On behalf of the congregation the minister, Dr. Beckh presented Mr. P. J. Worsley with an illuminated address in commemoration of his devoted support of the church since its foundation. Last Sunday Dr. J. E. Carpenter preached morning and evening.

Leeds: Mill Hill Chapel.—This congregation is doing its share in assisting the Belgian refugees, of whom some 400 have arrived in Leeds. A committee, headed by Miss Brown, has been formed, and is receiving money for the maintenance of a number of the refugees, for whom a house, furnished by gifts from the congregation, has been taken in one of the suburbs. A cottage, which will be furnished in like manner, has also been taken for the accommodation of a smaller number. Mrs. Currer Briggs, one of our members, is the hon. treasurer for the Lord Mayor's fund for the refugees.

Liverpool.—A meeting of the British Women's League was held by the invitation of Lady Bowring in Hope-street Church Hall, on Thursday, October 1, about 150 being present. In referring to the national crisis, Lady Bowring said that it was cheering to find that the cords of brotherhood had been pulled more tightly together, and that rich and poor alike were playing their part and giving their services in the building up of the Empire. Mrs. Hall gave an account of the work in connection with the administration of relief to the wives of soldiers and sailors, referring specially to the organisation supervised by Miss Eleanor Rathbone, C.C., and to the individual and personal work undertaken by many of their members. Miss J. Willmer, of Birkenhead, described what had been done by a group of women who had sent 10,000 garments to headquarters. A workshop had also been opened in Birkenhead for women thrown out of employment, which was giving occupation to 28 women and girls.

Maidstone.—In view of the sudden death of Major Daynes, J.P., recently reported, and the consequent financial loss to the congregation now followed by the war trouble, it has been decided for a time to defer proceeding with the new church building, for which a most desirable site has been bought. Meanwhile the old chapel has been repainted, and with the return of the minister, Mr. Farquharson, from his holiday the winter work is in full activity. Last Sunday evening the chapel was again crowded, with chairs in the aisles.

Manchester.—Meetings were held at the Upper Brook-street Free Church on Saturday and Sunday, October 3 and 4, in commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the opening of the present building, and the 125th anniversary of the foundation of the congregation. At the conversazione on Saturday evening letters of pleasant reminiscences and kind wishes were read from several friends, including Sir Henry Roscoe, Sir Charles Swann, and the Rev. C. J. Street. Short speeches were made by Mr. H. Marsden, jun. (warden), the Rev. E. W. Sealy, M.A. (minister), Mr. D. A. Little, the Rev. Henry Gow, Mr. Jas. Shepherd, Mr. H. Marsden, sen., and the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas. Mrs. Farrington, whose husband was minister from 1872 to 1889, was a welcome guest. On the following Sunday the Rev. Henry Gow conducted the anniversary services. The war was not forgotten or ignored, but the decision not to abandon the meetings on account of the war can now claim the sanction of many grateful hearts.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association.—The anniversary services were held at the Church of the Divine Unity on Sunday, September 27, the preacher being the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Bury, Lancs. On the following day the annual meetings were held, the chair being occupied by the President, Ald. Sir J. Baxter Ellis, J.P. The report was read by the Secretary, the Rev. Alfred Hall. Sir Joseph Baxter Ellis was re-elected president. In the evening a public meeting was held, at which addresses were given by the President, the Revs. Priestley Evans, Alfred Hall, W. H. Lambelle, A. Scruton, and Messrs. C. E. Mercer, and W. Stephenson.

Sheffield.—The annual united soirée of the district congregations was held in Channing Hall, on Thursday, 1st inst., and was a very successful function. Mr. Arnold Bagshaw gave an organ recital in Upper Chapel before the evening meeting, at which Mr. W. G. Turner presided. Addresses were given by Rev. E. I. Fripp (Leicester), Mr. W. H. Lloyd (Doncaster), Mr. C. Smithson (Worksop), Rev. K. Bond (Chesterfield), Mrs. Laycock (Women's League), Mr. W. E. Nicholson (Barnsley), and the Rev. Sydney H. Street (temporarily at Attercliffe). Mrs. W. R. Stevenson, Mrs. King, Miss Elliott, and Mr. Claude Doppin gave an excellent musical programme. The proceeds amounted to £16 16s. 7d., and were given to the church at Barnsley towards its building fund.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meetings were held at Hen-dy-Cwrdd, Cefn-coed, on Monday, September 28, when a large number of ministers and delegates were present, most of the affiliated churches being represented. Satisfactory reports were submitted by the treasurer (Mr. Gomer Ll. Thomas), and the executive committee. The hon. secretary reported that an appeal to the affiliated churches for subscriptions on behalf of the National Conference Sustentation Fund had resulted in promises of over £137 being made. The Home Missionary Committee's report as to new work at Aber-tillery and Tredegar was very encouraging. At the latter place Sunday evening services have been held regularly since the visit of the Unitarian van in July last.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE fall of Antwerp seems to bring the war appreciably nearer to our own shores. For Germany it is simply another black entry in her book of shamefulness. She entered Belgium as a brigand, and it is as a ruthless brigand that she has behaved ever since. It is an object lesson to the world of the demoralisation which follows in the train of a cynical violation of treaties. Small neutral countries must always be weak in a military sense. They exist and prosper in reliance upon the honour of stronger neighbours, who have sworn to protect them. They also act in many cases as buffer states between jealous Powers, and create a sphere of common interest, which it is agreed must never be disturbed by any attempt to win over the neutral country to our own side. Their existence is the best illustration which we have possessed hitherto of the international mind.

CONSIDERATIONS of this kind throw the principles which are in conflict into very clear relief. The whole trend of civilisation has been in the direction of giving strength and extension to the international mind. The honourable agreements of commerce, the Hague conventions, recognition of treaties as something more than scraps of paper, the cordial fellowship in things of the mind among men of different race, all these have woven a network of mutual understanding, and enlarged the area of common thought and action. It is this invisible moral fabric which Germany is engaged in tearing to bits. It is to resist her brutal attack upon our common civilisation that we have put our armies into the field. We are fighting the battle of the international mind, the moral instrument which alone can mitigate the fierceness of national rivalries and save us from the curse of war without end. When the conflict is over we shall have to repair the rents which have been made in its delicate texture, and the small neutral countries must be restored to a position of honour and security.

* * *

THE darkness of London is in everybody's mouth. We have grown so familiar with the glare of electric lights in all the chief thoroughfares that we had almost forgotten the days of dim gas lamps and carriages lit by candles. But the seasoned Londoner remembers and does not object to this temporary revival of the days of his childhood. How noble the great buildings look as they climb into the night sky, or the dark waters of the river, once again reflecting the stars. No doubt to some people there is an element of inconvenience, it may even be of fear. But the discipline is good for us. Life cannot go on at its normal pace. We are at war, and we ought to remember how near it is to our own shores.

THE Home Office Report, which was issued last week, should do much to allay the German spy fever among us. It is a very sensible document, neither exaggerating nor minimising the danger of the German system of espionage, and setting forth in plain terms the steps which have been taken to combat it. Many busybodies in the Press have taken for granted that they knew all about dangers which the Home Office was too stupid to find out for itself, and many lurid stories about hidden stores of arms and bombs have been in circulation. We are now informed on the highest authority that the spy organisation, which had been established before the war, has been broken up, that there is good reason to believe that it has not been re-established, and that no store of effective arms—still less any bombs or instruments of destruction—have so far been discovered. There is, moreover, the assurance, which can only have been needed by people to whom suspicion has become a form of chronic distemper, that the police have not gone to sleep after their initial success, but are still making every effort to watch and detect any attempt to convey information to the enemy.

THE Belgian delegates, who have just returned from their mission to the United States, are satisfied that their visit has produced an excellent effect. Nothing in the way of a formal pronouncement was to be expected, but public opinion has been stirred, and President Wilson received them with cordial sympathy, and in his reply, while observing strict neutrality on all political issues, used expressions of warm admiration of the Belgian people. The delegates are satisfied that the German campaign of detraction in the United States, organised by an unscrupulous Press bureau, has overdone itself and is bringing about its own nemesis.

THE reply of President Wilson to the telegram sent to him a month ago by the German Emperor is reported to be in the following terms :—

“ I have received your Majesty's important communication and read it with the greatest interest. I feel much honoured that you should have applied to me for an impartial judgment as representative of a really disinterested nation which sincerely wishes to learn the truth. You will, I am sure, not expect me to say more. I pray to God that this war may soon be ended. A day of settlement will come, when I am convinced the nations of Europe will unite to end their differences. Whoever has been in the wrong will learn the sequel, and the responsibility will fall on the guilty.

"The nations of the whole world are unanimous in thinking that the final settlement must involve complete agreement. It would be unwise and too early for a single nation disinterested in the present war, it would even be irreconcilable with its neutrality, to form or express an opinion.

"I am speaking so openly because I know that you expect and wish that I should speak as a friend to a friend, and because I am convinced that my reservation of judgment till the termination of the war, when all events and circumstances can be reviewed as a whole, must recommend itself to you as the true expression of sincere neutrality."

We are not surprised that the English admirers of Nietzsche—they are fortunately a very small sect—have been at some pains to dissociate him from recent happenings in Germany. It is quite true that in the Nietzschean repertory of contempt there are many hard sayings about Germany and the German spirit. Few of the aristocratic scornors of common men are prepared to accept the unlovely applications of their own doctrine. But it is just by their application to ordinary life that their ethical principles must be tested. If the Gospel of the Superman cannot bear contact with the vulgar world without breeding moral monstrosities it is a false gospel. In one man the worship of the superman takes the form of lofty exclusiveness, in another that of scornful pride, in a third that of the mailed fist. They are only temperamental varieties of the same creed, and the man who gave it its chief vogue, employing all the resources of a rich and lurid rhetoric in its service, is responsible for his own truculent offspring, even though he may have cursed them before they were born.

MR. HARDY, in the columns of the Manchester Guardian, holds his own serenely against the specialist critics who have rebuked him for some plain words about the evil influence of Nietzsche. After quoting the following words by Nietzsche himself:—"Ye shall love peace as a means to new wars, and the short peace better than the long. . . . I do not counsel you to conclude peace but to conquer. . . . Beware of pity,"—he continues:—

"He used to seem to me (I have not looked into his works for years) to be an incoherent rhapsodist who jumps from Machiavelli to Isaiah as the mood seizes him, and whom it is impossible to take seriously as a mentor. I may have been wrong, but he impressed me in the long run, owing to the preternatural absence of any overt sign of levity in him, with a curious suspicion (no doubt groundless) of his being a first-class Swiftian humourist in disguise. I need hardly add that with many of his sayings I have always heartily agreed; but I feel that few men who have lived long enough to see the real colour of life, and who have suffered, can believe in Nietzsche as a thinker."

MR. A. CLUTTON BROCK, in a letter which appeared in the Times Literary Supplement last week, also supports the contention of a moral relationship between Nietzsche's Superman and that of the Prussian.

"Christianity," he says, "appeals to experience and practice, while Nietzsche gives us a theory based upon observed facts. So does the Prussian; he has observed Prussian and other people, and as a result he believes that Prussians are superior to the others, and that because of this superiority it is their duty to dominate the world. It would also be the duty of Nietzsche's Superman to dominate the world for the same reason. The only difference is that his superman is imaginary and the Prussian is real. Nietzsche was ever so much finer than the Prussian, for he was not content with himself, whereas the Prussian is; but from the Christian point of view he and the Prussians are heretics of the same kind, and the Prussians are only drunken helots of his heresy. We may admire Nietzsche without admiring the Prussians, but we have a right to say that they prove what becomes of his doctrine when it is held by stupid men. It makes them more stupid. Whereas we believe that the Christian doctrine, when it is held by stupid men, makes them wiser; that, in fact, it is impossible to produce a drunken helot of it."

THE first of the "Deansgate Lectures" for the present season was given by the Dean of Durham on Tuesday. Taking as his subject "The Issue of Kikuyu," he deprecated the policy of endless competition which was involved in the exclusive claims of the episcopacy.

Anglicanism, he said, had even better things than episcopacy to contribute to the Christianity of the future. Its liturgical tradition and its tolerant theology were perhaps its best possessions, and he himself would be disposed to add its sense of national religion. It ought to be made a condition of all negotiations between the churches that the form of church organisation was secondary and not essential. That was certainly the doctrine of the Anglican Church, as stated in the Thirty-nine Articles, and as certified by the tenour of its history as a reformed church. The lamentable failure of the Lutheran Church in Germany to rise above the merely national point of view was not unconnected with the strange lack of fraternal relations which had marked the churches of the Reformation from the first. For the existing isolation the Church of England was not wholly guiltless. In the new Europe that was to come there would be need for every healing and unifying agent to bind up the wounds. Of all such agents the Christian Church should be the most active; but the Church which lost its sense of proportion and pushed in the forefront the exclusive functions of its own ministry could not perform the part of peacemaker.

THE Irish Literary Society celebrated the centenary of the birth of Thomas Davis on Wednesday evening, when remarkable tributes were paid to his memory by Dr. Sophie Bryant, who presided, and Mr. T. W. Rolleston. Thomas Davis belonged to a group of Irish patriots who have hitherto received far too little attention from the English mind. He was not a nationalist of narrow aims, but a political prophet of far-reaching vision. His watchwords were nationality, unity, and liberty, and in his burning love for his own country, combined with a sense of its place in the confederation of nations, he had much in common with Mazzini. He died of fever in Dublin in 1845, in his 31st year, leaving an imperishable memory to his friends. His centenary should send many readers to his biography by Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, and to the volume of selections from his prose and verse, edited by Mr. T. W. Rolleston, which is to appear in "Every Irishman's Library." In both they will find much to help and inspire the patriot mind at the present moment.

LAST week we were able to report that the policy of providing adequate instruction in the art of teaching for divinity students, which we have often advocated, has been adopted by the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen. It is an example which we hope will be widely followed. The practical needs of the ordinary minister in school and parish require far more attention than they usually receive during his years of special education. The ministry is a teaching profession. Most men who enter it are bad teachers, and they remain bad teachers all their lives. This state of things is as discreditable as it is unnecessary. Probably the dull ineffectiveness of the ordinary theological college, with its endless supply of lectures and the lack of any adequate scheme of stimulating education for the work of life, has a good deal to do with the shortage in the supply of able candidates for the ministry.

* * *

JUST as we go to press we receive the welcome intelligence that the public-houses in London are only to be open from 10 a.m. to 10 p.m. This is an instalment of the policy which we recommended last week, but it is the duty of public opinion to press vigorously for more.

THE TASK OF THE PEACEMAKER.

WE published a letter last week pleading with us to remember the Christianity of peace. We hope that our correspondent will believe us when we say that we keep the subject continually in mind. Where, perhaps, we differ is in regard to the measures which we ought to adopt in order to fulfil the task of the peacemaker in the noblest possible way. Upon this matter a few remarks may not be out of place.

But first of all let us dwell for a moment upon the ideal of peace, and the duty to promote peace, which all Christians accept. We believe that it is the divine Will for us that men and nations should dwell together in brotherly accord. We believe that the appeal to the sword for the purposes of conquest and domination is an evil and accursed thing. We believe that the hot passions of cruelty and hatred, of malice and revenge, which inflame the heedless votaries of war, are deadly poison to the soul. We believe in peace, not the sentimental affection for ease and quietness, but the fruit of difficult self-control, of the due observance of the claims of justice and honour even when it is to our own hurt, of suffering borne unselfishly for a good cause. To this peacefulness the Christian must be always loyal in his own heart. He must also give his strength to the task of creating reverence for it in the lives of other men. Through the co-operative effort of Christian hearts and wills it can be made one of the effective moral forces of the world. It is not merely a hatred of war; it is a conquering affection for something that is better than war. Our abhorrence of war may be a very feeble contribution to the cause of peace, unless it is quite plain that the abhorrence is that of a robust character and a practical mind.

For this reason it appears to us that heated language about the evil of war is of singularly little use at the present time. It is employed sometimes as an argument for stopping the struggle at the earliest possible moment or for distributing blame equally among all the combatants. In this way the moral issues of the conflict may be obscured, and some people of good intentions may be led to squander their energies upon dreams of a patched-up agreement when they ought to be working for an enduring peace. If the peacemaker runs some risk of being dismissed as a hopeless crank, let him at least ask himself whether he has shown practical sagacity in speech and action before he rails against the war-fever of the public. As a matter of fact our people are not the victims of war-fever at all. They are painfully interested and excited. They are full of grim determination. They are eager to defend their own country. They are hot with anger against the wrongs of Belgium. But they do not love war. They do not believe in war as an end in itself. They have simply accepted it as better than acquiescence in public outrage against justice and freedom. We must discredit the name of war, was the advice of VICTOR HUGO. It has never been so widely discredited before. It is a golden opportunity for the peacemaker, if he has patience and resource, and acts not as a sad spectator of the struggle, hardly touching it with the tips of his fingers, but as a valiant defender of public right and a loyal friend of his country's cause. May we venture to describe in a few words some of the essential virtues of the peacemaker at the present time.

He must, in the first place, never allow his hatred of war to make him blind to moral distinctions. He must face the facts as they are and not as he would like them to be, because it is facts as they are which determine his duty. In the case of a war into which nations have drifted blindly through ignorance or misunderstanding the blame may be equally shared, and a candid acknowledgment that it is so may lead to restored friendship. But when a war has been carefully planned for years, and the preparations have included the cultivation of animosity as well as the manufacture of guns, it is vain to suppose that peace can come either quickly or easily. It becomes a conflict between two opposing principles of civilisation, between good and evil, and the violated moral relationships can only be restored when the evil spirit has been cast out. We are engaged in a struggle which can never be settled by a policy of give and take. It is the fundamental rights of nations, not merely little bits of territory, which are involved. We cannot yield so long as the menace of Prussian militarism is unbroken. These are the essential facts which must never be absent from the mind of the peacemaker. If he ignores them and spends his time in discussing war in the abstract, public opinion will condemn him as a futile person, and against that verdict we fear there can be no appeal.

Secondly, the peacemaker must beware of the spirit of captious criticism. He must never pose as the one righteous man, whose wisdom might have saved us from all the blunders of the politicians. Let him remember that political sectarianism may easily degenerate into moral disease. Public opinion is one of the chief safeguards of our liberty, and there is no part of our policy which we wish to withdraw from its cleansing influence. But this is a very different thing from the suspicion that the great men who guide public affairs are less worthy of trust, or less capable of loving peace and ensuing it, than we ourselves should be in a similar position. Those of us who do not sign manifestos and segregate ourselves into small groups at the present time, because we believe in working with the nation and for the nation without badges and party cries, are possibly taking the best course which is open to us to make the principles of Christian peace prevail.

Of all men the peacemaker ought to be the most confident and in a sense the most happy. He has defied appearances and his hope is firmly anchored within the veil. But he has still to learn the elements of human nature, if he does not realise that he himself must be the chief argument for the faith which is in him. If he is strong and radiant, brimful of human sympathy, tolerant in judgment, generous in admiration, he will win men by the influence of his own character for the gospel of peace. But if he is the victim of depression and low spirits, absorbed in his own pathetic misery, unable to meet our loud and evil days with the glad watchwords of faith and liberty and love, who will stay to listen to him? No one wants to join hands with the ally of a defeated Deity. We have met some men recently, peacemakers almost by profession, who creep furtively about the world like accomplices in a murder. In a sense we are all guilty accomplices in whatever evil is done under the sun—that is part of the mystery of our moral freedom and our social influence. But we are here to fight the evil and to make our peace with God. We live in an imperfect world; all the greater is our need of cheerful courage and a good understanding, if we are to help the world, as much as one generation can help it, in the long struggle for perfection.

GREAT art Thou, O Lord, and highly to be praised; great is thy power, yea, and thy wisdom is infinite. And man would praise thee, because he is one of thy creatures; yea, man—though he bears about with him his mortality, the proof of his sin, the proof that thou, O God, dost resist the proud—yet would man praise thee; for thou hast created us unto thyself, and our heart finds no rest until it rests in thee.

ST. AUGUSTINE.

If even we may be nearer to barbarism than most people believe, we are also perhaps nearer to our ennoblement than most people hope.

BARONESS VON SUTTNER.

THE prayer of the patriarch, when he desired to behold the Divinity face to face, was denied; but he was able to catch a glimpse of Jehovah after He had passed by; and so it fares with our search for Him in the wrestlings of the world. It is when the hour of conflict is over that history comes to a right understanding of the strife, and is ready to exclaim, 'Lo! God is here and we knew it not.' At the foot of every page in the annals of nations may be written, 'God reigns.' Events as they pass away 'proclaim their original,' and if you will but listen reverently you may hear the receding centuries as they roll into the dim distance of departed time, perpetually chanting 'Te Deum Laudamus,' with all the choral voices of the countless congregation of the ages.

NATIONALITY.

A NATION's voice, a nation's voice—
It is a solemn thing!
It bids the bondage-sick rejoice—
'Tis stronger than a king.
'Tis like the light of many stars,
The sound of many waves,
Which brightly look through prison-bars
And sweetly sound in caves.
Yet it is noblest, godliest known
When righteous triumph swells its tone.

A nation's flag, a nation's flag—
If wickedly unrolled,
May foes in adverse battle drag
Its every fold from fold.

But in the cause of liberty,
Guard it 'gainst Earth and Hell;
Guard it till Death or Victory—
Look you, you guard it well!
No saint or king has tomb so proud
As he whose flag becomes his shroud.

A nation's right, a nation's right—
God gave it, and gave, too,
A nation's sword, a nation's might,
Danger to guard it through.
'Tis freedom from a foreign yoke,
'Tis just and equal laws,
Which deal unto the humblest folk
As in a noble's cause.
On nations fixed in right and truth
God would bestow eternal youth.

May Ireland's voice be ever heard
Amid the world's applause!
And never be her flag-staff stirred
But in an honest cause.
May freedom be her very breath,
Be Justice ever dear;
And never an ennobled death
May son of Ireland fear!
So the Lord God will ever smile,
With guardian grace, upon our isle.

THOMAS DAVIS.

[The Irish patriot, the centenary of whose birth was celebrated on Wednesday, October 14.]

INTO the hands of thy blessed protection and unspeakable mercy, O Lord, I commend this day my soul and my body, with all their faculties, powers and actions; beseeching thee to be ever with me, to direct, sanctify and govern me in the ways of thy laws and in the works of thy commandments; that through thy most mighty protection, both here and ever, I may be preserved in body and soul, to serve thee, the only true God. Amen.

BLESS us, O Lord, with thy heavenly benediction; that we may at all times rejoice in thy strength, and trust in thy loving kindness. Amen.

OUR ATTITUDE TOWARDS OUR ENEMIES.

THE October reviews and magazines have launched upon the public another flood of "War" articles and "War" discussions. Every point of view is represented. Some writers thirst for vengeance, and are wrought up to a white-heat of passion against the Germans; some would fain make excuses for our enemies, and condone their conduct. Some are bold to declare that all war is unrighteous, and that Christianity is only to be upheld by refusing to engage in it on any pretext; whilst others again assert that this is a holy crusade, a war to end war, and that we must fight with all our force for peace.

Amidst this welter of conflicting opinions, THE INQUIRER has spoken with no uncertain voice. It is a tribute, perhaps, to the strength of the friendships which it has gathered round itself that that "mush of concession," which Emerson says should never exist between true friends has been conspicuous by its absence. Certainly the letters of protest and disagreement which it has published lately have been as remarkable for their lack of bitterness and acrimony as for their force and sincerity. And the two elements, as Emerson tells us again, which go to the composition of friendship are sincerity and tenderness. Everyone sticks to his opinion still; but he has expressed his own and listened to his neighbour's with perfect courtesy. This is as it should be. All remain friends, with a friendship now cemented by that strongest of all bonds where sympathy exists, disagreement. "As iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend."

But, though we may realise to the full how far more precious sympathy is than any mere agreement, it is right as well as pleasant to dwell sometimes on points where we are all at one. One such presents itself to-day as a rallying ground for the forces of Christianity, more vital, even, than the issue of war or no war. It is this: Shall we love our enemies or hate them?

One would think from reading a certain type of article, and hearing a certain type of conversation, that we had decided to abandon Christ's teaching in this particular. We hope that no reader of THE INQUIRER can suffer this view to be expressed without being filled with indignation. If it were merely the halfpenny press and people lacking in education and refinement who offended thus, it would not be worth a protest.

But go into society drawing rooms, and you will hear scurrilous tales repeated about the Kaiser and his soldiers simply to raise a laugh. Open your expensive quarterlies and reviews, and you will find hatred flaming from every page. In the October Nineteenth Century there appears a poem by Wm. Watson beside which the denunciations of the imprecatory psalms almost take the guise of beatitudes. It is entitled "Funeral March of Kaiser Wilhelm II.," and here is a sample of its sentiments, which occupy several pages:—

Into the night
When he is spurned,
Give him outright
All he has earned.

Wrath like a flame,
Pain that sears,
Hotter than shame,
Hotter than tears;

Vengeance fell,
Hunting his ghost;
All that in hell
Tortures most.

Most of us would agree that such is not the Christian attitude towards our enemies. But what is? To pretend that they are friends is out of the question; they have been guilty of sins we abominate and loathe; they have for the time being forfeited all right to our friendship; we can never claim to be on the side of the angels again if we let their wickedness go unscourged. The problem is the old one of separating the sinner from his sin, of loving the one whilst hating the other. How this is to be done has been shown sublimely in the life of Christ, and that of some of his closest followers. They realised what we are so apt to forget, that sick souls demand infinitely more tender redemptive love and care than sick bodies. How ready we are to pity the victims of physical ills! How we vie with one another in alleviating the sufferings entailed by disease or poverty, in inventing means to arrest the spread of infection or of distress. And yet, when human beings become the prey of moral evils far more dangerous and more painful, how we turn from them in horror and indignation. We think that the shivering beggar in the street who commands our compassion and our coppers by his pitiful tale of hardship and privation forfeits all claim to them when we prove him an impostor, and see him spending our money in the nearest public-house. But, in reality, his need is infinitely greater than we thought, the part we have to play infinitely more difficult. Instead of merely relieving his physical necessities, there is an immortal soul in peril which we must try to save. The physical miseries of the man sick of the palsy, whose pitying friends brought him to the great Healer, must have been patent to all beholders. But Jesus saw that they were the lesser evil, and it was to the healing of the greater that he addressed himself: "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee."

Those who seek to soften our hearts towards the Germans by minimising their guilt have not begun to understand the Christian attitude towards enemies, nor the temper of mind which sees in the arrogant War Lord the most pitiful figure in Europe. We fear for him, all unwittingly the victim of a malignant, soul-destroying growth of pride and militarism—a growth which all his words and actions are causing to spread with deadly rapidity. We do not cry—God grant we may never cry—"Lord, I thank thee that I am not as this Kaiser"; rather we bow our heads in penitence at our own unworthiness, and breathe the prayer of our Master, "Father, forgive him, he knows not what he does."

But to let so grievous a sin against humanity as is represented by Prussian militarism go unpunished would be the basest cowardice. This canker at the heart of modern civilisation must be removed at all costs. At what cost but that of war, I am at a loss to see. In any case, we cannot cut deep into the very heart of a nation without wounding it. And the more thoroughly we do our work, the more clear and complete our surgery, the greater will be the suffering and prostration of the patient. But those sufferings are redemptive, that is the point. We are not at war with Germany for vengeance or for pleasure, any more than the surgeon inflicts pain upon a diseased man for vengeance or for pleasure.

His work is a work of salvation. So is ours. And if we cease to remember that, we are as culpable as surgeons who, concentrating all their attention on the destructive side of their work, kill the patient in removing the disease. Though in the struggle to free Europe from this festering cancer many innocent lives must be sacrificed, and the price in blood and tears seem too heavy to pay, we must learn to think in higher terms than those of little, individual lives, and must realise that something more precious still is at stake. All life is one, say the wise Eastern sages. We are not fighting now for the redemption of a class or of a nation. The struggle is on so gigantic a scale that we are fighting for the maintenance of the One Life itself, free and undefiled. Whether we meet with victory or defeat, we must tolerate no tampering with the channels through which it reaches us, though its essential glory no earthly power can dim or enhance.

The price must be paid on the one hand, and exacted on the other. We must not stay our hand till either the awful work is done, or we have perished in the doing. But we persist because we love the whole human race, not because we hate a part of it. And those who allow anything so miserable and petty as personal hatred to influence their words and actions are doing nothing less than trying to transform the Purgatory of Europe into its Hell.

IN MEMORY OF AN ENGLISH OFFICER.

RUSSELL KENNETH SWANWICK, whose death in action with the expeditionary force in France has been briefly announced, was the third surviving son of Mr. and Mrs. Russell Swanwick, of the Royal Agricultural College Farm, Cirencester. He was educated at Uppingham and Trinity College, Cambridge, and studied land agency. He was also for a year a student of the Royal Agricultural College. He was among the first to join the Officers' Training Corps at the College, and afterwards passed into the officers' reserve of the 1st Gloucestershire Regiment.

There are some lives which cannot be written; they seem to have been lived, unconsciously spreading a radiance which we are aware of but cannot define. They do not enter the lists against social evils; they do not write, or utter glowing words as preacher or teacher; they just are pure and brave, tender and true, never sitting in judgment on the failings of others. They are found walking always along the high, white path of duty, and this with no conscious strain, just simply and joyfully, at home on it; they cannot see any other path, always unselfish, generous, and unflinchingly helpful. There is an American expression, "He is a man to tie to," and this comes from the boatmen of the Mississippi River. The flow is so strong that piles are driven along its course at various places, and some are strong and true and some fail, and the strong ones are the ones to tie to, so these I write of, and this one in particular of whom

I write was a man to tie to, and would never fail.

If anyone should say they were negative virtues, one might reply, perhaps, the soldier who never let his King's uniform show moth or dust, nor his sword show any mark of rust, is perhaps the best fitted for the call when it comes, and so at the first call of his country he went with a solemn joy. He had seen the vision, the great task, to see it through or die in the attempt.

For what has he whose will sees clear
To do with doubt, mistrust, and fear,
Swift hopes and slow despondencies?
His heart is equal with the seas,
And with the sea winds, and his ear
Is level with the speech of these,
And his soul communes and takes cheer
With the actual earth's equalities—Air, light, and night, hills, winds and streams,
And seeks not strength from empty dreams.

Then the curtain was rung down over the greatest tragedy in the world's history, and only little gleams of sidelights were permitted to shine through, gleams which have shown England a nation of heroes.

Then the telegram from Lord Kitchener: "Deeply regret to inform you of the death of your son, killed in action."

Then silence again, and at last a letter on September 28 from his captain in command, telling how, on September 14, his brigade was very heavily engaged, and support was necessary, and "your son gallantly led his men to the support of his hardly pressed comrades; though wounded he still pressed forward, and was then mortally wounded and died instantaneously. He was much beloved by his fellow officers and by his men; an excellent officer, keen, brave, and always ready for work, regretted by all who knew him." Still later, a letter telling of the exact spot in Troyon Churchyard where he lies, with a cross roughly cut in wood, carved and inscribed by one of his fellow officers.

They shall grow not old as we that are left grow old;
Age shall not weary them, nor the years condemn:
At the going down of the sun and in the morning
We will remember them.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE WAR.

SIR:—Nothing was further from my wish than to misrepresent Mr. Heath, and I sincerely regret having done so, quite unconsciously. As, however, others also seem to have misunderstood his letter, I hope he will not be sorry to have had an opportunity of disclaiming a view we wrongly attributed to him. I now understand Mr. Heath to maintain that all the Great Powers are "equally responsible," not for the immediate, but for the other causes of the war. He thus simply pushes the matter further back, but without, as it seems to me, being much less unjust. Among "the root causes of the war" Mr. Heath rightly includes huge armaments. How, then, stands the account in this respect? England proposed a year's naval holiday, and in other ways made known her anxiety to reduce the inflammable condition of Europe. Germany, on the other hand, so far from encouraging the offer, let it appear that her entire policy was in the opposite direction (cf., e.g., the diplomatic incident described by Mr. Asquith at Cardiff). It is rather hard lines to be condemned by Mr. Heath for provoking war, and at the same time to be held in derision as a decadent nation by Germany for ensuing peace. Far be it from me to say that we should not be sternly faithful in judging both ourselves and our country. But one has heard of persons being so intent on "uprightness" in this respect as to become "slanting-dicular"—on the other side,—a tendency which may easily degenerate into the quality which Mrs. Heap fostered in her precious Uriah.

But the historian of the future will have to pass judgment on these things. To-day other instant claims press upon us, who see the fire raging and spreading, thousands of lives being sacrificed daily, hundreds of thousands of innocent people wandering about homeless and wretched, while the criminals who are responsible are still at large, gloating over their infamous work. It is because the wickedness of it all is so fearful that I object to having my country (of whose fair name I am jealous) saddled with that share of responsibility which Mr. Heath says attaches to her.

It is satisfactory to be assured that Mr. Heath's first letter was personal, and not official.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES HARWOOD.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

SIR,—Mr. Short's quiet assumption that the inevitability of compulsion is a settled matter, and that it only remains to consider alternative proposals for giving effect to it, reminds me of a once famous "F. C. G." cartoon, referring to the negotiations that led up to the Boer war. "Brer Fox" (Mr. Chamberlain) asks "Brer Rabbit" (President Kruger) with what sauce he would prefer to be cooked and eaten. On Brer Rabbit replying that he had rather not be eaten at all, he is sharply reminded that he is "getting away from the point." To some of us it appears that, so far from this question having been settled in the affirmative, it has come very near to being settled in the negative, both by declarations of more than one member of the Government, and by the fact that voluntary recruitment has already given us more men than we can easily find officers for. Be that as it may, Mr. Short has shown himself kinder than Brer Fox, and after duly rebuking us for "getting away from the point," he has, after all, condescended to meet us on our own ground. I have never before heard the maxim, noblesse oblige, used as an argument for squeezing round men into square holes. Among those to be so squeezed, and presumably to be shot if they refuse to serve, are the whole tribe of "conscientious objectors," whether non-resisters on principle or followers of Ramsay MacDonald and Keir Hardie, or the still unreconciled minority of Irish Nationalists. By the way, would any sane statesman, either in peace or in war-time, dream of applying conscription to the inflammable sister island? On the other hand, what would be the feelings of people in Great Britain, if they were subjected to it while Ireland was exempted? Doubtless a soldier with a national ideal is preferable, ceteris paribus, to one who has no thought beyond his pay; but the fact of compulsion has no tendency to turn a man into a patriot if he is not one already, while it necessarily brings into the ranks, to be a source of moral infection, any anti-national element which may exist—(e.g., Poles and Alsations in the German army)—which element would be as harmless if left alone as was Irish disaffection during the Boer war. Conversely, the fact of receiving fair wages raises no presumption whatever of indifference to the national ideal, and the German sneer about our "mercenaries" was simply silly.

In conclusion, let me assure your correspondent: (1) That I am not one of those who "expect our Allies to enforce conscription." On the contrary, I should have expected still better things from them had their traditions permitted them to adopt our system, or some better system, of voluntary enlistment; it being a vulgar error to suppose that there is any limit to the numbers obtainable by adequate inducements which would not also apply to the numbers obtainable by compulsion. (2) That I should certainly describe our army at Mons as "national," and none the less had it happened to constitute the whole, instead of a part, of our forces. Mr. Short's use of the adjective in a quantitative sense is, to me, an entire novelty. I believe we have a national mission to teach our enemies and our Allies, as well as a section of our own people, a lesson of respect for personal freedom, and that we are doing so with considerable success.—Yours, &c.

ROLAND K. WILSON.

Richmond, October 12, 1914.

SIR,—I have had the misfortune not to see the correspondence upon this subject which preceded the Rev. Walter Short's letter in your current issue. I can therefore only guess as to its general nature. But there are one or two questions raised in the letter upon which I should like to ask a little of your space. I will not pause to dispute or to express my disagreement with the declaration that compulsory military service is "inevitable," except to say that (England being what she is) such a measure could only come about through the action of Parliament sanctioned by the people of the country; it could not be "imposed by Lord Kitchener." Nor is any other comment needed upon the suggestion that our Army is "serving for motives of pay," than the fact that 439,000 men, to say nothing of the rejected candidates, in the first month of the war, were prepared to go and fight. They could hardly be accused of clamouring for the shilling a day. But Mr. Short continues by telling us that "we know now, what some of us refused to believe before the war, that England can be attacked by land, i.e., in France. 'Paris, then London!' is the sword hanging over our heads at the present moment." All I can say to this is that it is using the phrase "attack by land" in a very unusual sense, and I must admit at once, that if in regard to this country "attack by land" is to mean attack on France, or similarly attack on any other friendly neighbour, we are (so far as our own Army can do anything to prevent it) exceedingly vulnerable. But however that may be, the primary value of a conscript army is to prevent an attack by land upon its own country. England being an island cannot be attacked by land (in the narrower sense). She has therefore found in the past that her military requirements are fulfilled by keeping a small Army and a large Navy, and, so far as I am aware, the events of this war have in no way shown that she was wrong. Mr. Short, later on, in replying to Sir Roland Wilson, asks the question, "Has Sir Roland thought of the effect upon the general labour market of paying an army adequate to the situation?" I venture to think that such a question invites the retort—Has Mr. Short thought of the effect upon the general labour market, and upon the whole economic system of the country, of mobilising a conscript army in England?

Briefly, to make my point clear, I should like to make the following suggestions:—(1) That in modern warfare rapidity of action at the outbreak of hostilities is becoming a matter of ever-increasing importance. (2) That the great strategic value of a conscript army for England, as for any other country, would be that we could place a very large force in the field quickly; thus, if England were being "attacked by land in France," we could very swiftly bring into action an Expeditionary Force of much greater dimensions than 170,000 men, and no doubt avoid being "swept back from Mons." (3) That in any war in which England is engaged, it is vitally necessary to maintain her national credit, since the English system of finance and all the national activities depending thereon is the most intricate, the most far-reaching, the most sensitive, the most delicately balanced of any system in the world. (4) That the really potent weapon against England (if it could be used) is starvation.

What I wish to ask is this. Has Mr. Short thought of the effect on these things of calling out all the men in the country of military capacity? My suggestion is that it would strike England with the most deadly weapon with which she can be struck—starvation. It would bring the bulk of British industry to a standstill, as has been the case in France and Germany now. It would thereby paralyse the Government in meeting—as it has done in the present crisis—the menace of financial panic. It would consequently add fearful stimulus to economic disorganisation, which once it had really started would lead only too rapidly to national bankruptcy and starvation. From the military and economic point of view England remains a great nation so long as her industrial system continues to work, and she is able to maintain a sufficient Navy to protect her shores and to protect her trade; but England, in a state of industrial chaos, would be a nation faced with a truly appalling disaster. Put in general terms, therefore, the point I wish to make is this: a nation is better able to maintain and use a conscript army in proportion as it is agricultural and self-supporting; it is less able to do so in proportion as it is industrial and dependent on overseas trade. An example of the former amongst great nations is Russia; the pre-eminent example of the latter amongst all nations of the world is England.

Finally, I would add that if Mr. Short suggests that it is the duty of the British Government not only to protect its citizens from attack, but also to protect Great Britain from "attack by land in France," and, also, presumably, from attack by land in Belgium or Holland, he is advocating a course of action wholly inconsistent with English military policy, with English foreign policy, and above all with what England has done in the supreme cause of liberty and peace.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY OST.

Hampstead, October 12, 1914.

SIR,—It is a pity that in discussing an important subject like this Mr. Short should beg the whole question by premising the inevitability of compulsory military service. It is ridiculous to talk about that being inevitable when, in nine weeks, over 600,000 men have been enrolled voluntarily—a number that would have been larger but for (a) the recent raising of the minimum measurements, (b) a percentage of rejections due to lack of expenditure until recent years on social reform; and thousands are still joining daily. The information that Mr. Short asks for would be interesting, but irrelevant and inconclusive, because, according to its founder, the Boy Scouts' movement is in no sense a military organisation, while Switzerland's defensive problem is entirely different from ours, and New Zealand's largely so. By-the-bye, Mr. Short can hardly have been a diligent reader of your pages during the last year or two, or he would have learnt something already—not particularly creditable to a compulsory system—about the New Zealand method. "From the standpoints of discipline and decorum, universal military training for home defence is worthy of consideration," says Mr. Short. This passage exhibits the hopeless confusion which invariably characterises the utterances of pro-Conscriptionists. Military service is one thing, military training another; which does Mr. Short mean? If the latter, all its advantages, without any of its disadvantages, can be secured through the curriculum of our schools. If the former, has Mr. Short thought out all its consequences? Conscription, using that term in its popular, if, inaccurate, meaning, would give us, when it had got into full working order, three million men. Now, nobody suggests that even for the present war we want more than 1,500,000 men, so that either we shall be wasting millions a year—which some of us would prefer to see spent on Old Age Pensions at 65, and increased benefits under the National Insurance Act—in training men we don't want, or else we shall be resorting to the old system of the militia ballot, under which a rich man drawn to serve, but not wanting to, could buy a substitute. With regard to home defence, it cannot be insisted too often that the Navy is our first, second, and third, line of defence, for the simple reason that, if that were defeated, the enemy need not land a single man—he could starve us into surrender in six weeks. If Germany were to conquer both France and Belgium, we should be compelled to double our Navy, but we need not add one single man to the Army. Thus, the only truth in Mr. Short's statement, "that England can be attacked by land, i.e., France," is the obvious proposition that if Germany ruled France and (or) Belgium, she would have a more convenient base than any she possesses now for naval operations against us, and, apart from the question of our national honour towards Belgium, that was the only reason why we needed to take a part on land in the present conflict. I agree with Mr. Short that our army at Mons was not large enough, but, at that early stage of the war, that was inevitable; there are limits even to the transport powers of our mercantile marine and the protecting power of the British Navy. Surely, Mr. Short is not going to fall into the error of the man in the street—an actual, not a symbolical personage this time—whom I heard saying two months ago: If only we'd taken Lord Roberts's advice—curious how it is being forgotten that Lord Roberts said his scheme was for home defence only—we could have flung half-a-million men into Belgium in 48 hours?

Mr. Short's concluding statement that "Standing aside ourselves, we (a) employ native troops from India, (b) expect our Allies to enforce conscription," is a ludicrous travesty of fact, when we remember (a) that we shall have ultimately, as our total army on the Continent, nearly twenty times the number of the Indian troops, and that the latter have been eager to fight, (b) that our Allies, for their own convenience, adopted conscription long before there was any question of even an understanding between them and us. May I, in conclusion, recommend to your readers Sir Ian Hamilton's monograph on "Compulsory Service" (Murray, 2s. 6d.), and "The Case for Voluntary Service" (King & Son, 6d.)?—Yours, &c.,

FREDK. G. JACKSON.

THE PUBLIC-HOUSE AND THE ARMY

SIR,—Not temperance reformers only, but also, I venture to think, many others will thank you for your outspoken plea for more drastic Governmental action in regard to the sale of alcoholic drinks to men in uniform. Surely we are not going to continue to allow the number of our "fit" men to be still further reduced by the public-house and the canteen! Only a day or two ago a daily paper referred to the harm the canteens were doing to the new recruits, and urged that counter attractions should be provided. It is notorious that about one-third of the men who present themselves for enlistment are rejected as unfit, and the country cannot afford to lose the services of any of the remaining two-thirds, especially after it has spent time and money on their training. I would appeal to all to use their influence to reduce temptations as much as possible, not only for the sake of the men themselves but for the national welfare. A few days ago the Times stated that "in sternly prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors Russia had already vanquished a greater foe than the Germans." I shall be glad to send copies of the enclosed leaflet, "Effects of Alcohol on Naval and Military Work," to all who apply to me.—Yours, &c.,

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

SIR,—I should be glad if you would enable me to let it be known through the medium of your columns that it is intended to hold a meeting of the Board of Managers of the Sustentation Fund for the Augmentation of Ministers' Stipends at the beginning of November. Should any congregation, which has not already applied for a grant this year, desire to make an application to the Board at this meeting, the Secretary should write to me at once for the necessary forms, and should state the amount of the stipend at present paid to the minister.—Yours, &c.,

HAROLD F. PEARSON,

Hon. Secretary of the Fund.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

AMONG THE BIRDS IN OCTOBER.

"HAVE you seen any fieldfares yet? Have the redwings come to your neighbourhood?" These are the stock questions asked in early October by those people who pay attention to bird migration. The fieldfare and redwing are near relations of the missel thrush, the song thrush, and the blackbird. Unlike them, however, they are only visitors to Britain. The sea which they must cross in order to winter with us is the one now most talked of in Europe, nay, in the whole world—the North Sea. While armies of men have been mustering in central Europe, armies of these birds have been mustering in northern Europe, and many a look-out man on the North Sea, or coastguard on our eastern shores has seen, or will soon see, vast flocks of them passing high overhead on their way from Norway.

Sometimes a stream of redwings will take a quarter of an hour to pass a given spot. When they reach our coasts they separate into small flocks which haunt our fields by day, and roost in the woods at night. Everybody who is familiar with the redwing will tell you that it is seen in flocks, yet this rule has exceptions, for the first live redwing I ever saw was quite alone. I was sitting on Wythop Fell one 4th of October, watching a squirrel romp among golden brown bracken stems, when a bird shot past me with a flight that struck me as not quite familiar. So I watched while it settled on a crab apple tree some fifty feet below me. Only its head could be seen among the leaves. Now its general appearance when flying had made me think of a song thrush with a peculiar flight, but it had seemed a little shorter and slenderer than that bird usually is, and no song thrush has what I now clearly saw above the russet crabs and leaves—a very broad, clear yellowish-white stripe running from the beak over the eye and down towards the nape. I had a strong suspicion as to the identity of my bird, and sat absolutely still so that it should not be aware of my presence. It must have been tired, for it sat on as motionless as myself for many minutes. "Let me but see the side of your body, you motionless birdie, and I shall know whether my guess is a right one." He might have heard that unspoken appeal, for he moved to a twig a few inches higher, and there was the mark I had waited and wished for—a clear patch of bright brownish red running down his side below the wing. Now none but a redwing can lay claim to that special chestnut patch, and I knew well that if my bird would but lift his wing and show me its under side, that too would be chestnut red, and the feathers tipped with orange.

Since then my redwings have all been true to their family instinct, and have only let me see them as members of a flock of wary birds feeding in meadows, or hurrying at the least alarm to shelter in the wood close by. Sometimes they have been associated as a flock with fieldfares, their cousins; but the two flocks have not really intermingled. It has been redwings mainly on the right, fieldfares with their extra inch and a quarter length and their slate-grey heads and rumps on the left. The habits of the two flocks were a little different, too. The General Fieldfare of the day never failed to give the command, "All move towards this way!"; and no matter what the temptation might be, no fieldfare strayed towards the opposite side. Both redwings and fieldfares were after the same kind of food in the main, namely, insects, worms, and grubs on the ground, and soft fruits in the bushes and trees. When frost hardens the soil you must look for these birds among the trees which bear berries, even hard ones, the hawthorn, privet, and ivy. Startle the feeding flocks ever so little, and the leaders signal with a loud "chack!" Off fly the fieldfares to settle in the nearest high tree, heads all turned one way; away go the redwings to a wood, if there is one, to other single trees if there is not. The fieldfares are the noisiest, especially at roosting time, or towards it. You may hear them clamouring like so many sparrows, only their note is a "chack," not a chirp, and can be heard a long way. The redwings are quieter birds, and settle for the night with far less fuss.

If you want to add these two winter visitors to the list of birds you can recognise, you must lose no good opportunity of seeing them. Make the most of the bright days, for dull days are many in winter, and these foreign thrushes are very knowing about taking cover in the fields. On a dull day it is not easy to see them, as they move slowly among rotting potato tops, or over rough pasture land dotted with withered brown thistle, stalks, or faded ragwort. By the end of April the redwings will have left us, and in May the fieldfares will follow.

EMILY NEWLING.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

KING'S WEIGH HOUSE CHURCH. WELCOME TO DR. ORCHARD.

DR. W. E. ORCHARD began his ministry on October 4, and was formally recognised at a meeting held on Wednesday, 7th inst. The upper rooms of the institute, which appeared to be newly decorated, were used for tea and reception, and at 8 p.m. a crowded meeting was held in the lecture room on the ground floor. The chief speakers were Principal Selbie, the Revs. R. Roberts, Moderator of Crouch Hill, and Dr. Orchard.

Principal Selbie's remarks were significant of the trend of the times. He discouraged denominational distinctions, and thought the less said about them the better. Dr. Orchard had a message of his own, and his theology and outlook were wider than any denominational barriers. To-day there is an opportunity to speak out boldly, and the need was for absolute reality and sincerity of utterance in speech that could be easily understood. A man with a message was never limited to his own mentality, he partook, too, of the thought and feelings of those whom he addressed. Congregational principles were hard to live up to, but in themselves they represented the ideal Church.

The Rev. R. Roberts said that while the Presbyterian Church deeply regretted his loss, yet it had to admit that at the moment there was no field of activity within it open to Dr. Orchard so important as that offered by King's Weigh House. Dr. Orchard was out for the Kingdom of God; he had come to them at the right time; they were at the end of an epoch.

Dr. Orchard acknowledged the serious wrench the change meant for him, and spoke humorously of the mild discipline of the Presbyterian Church. He never expected to go back to it, but hoped always to belong to the Holy Catholic Church, and looked forward to the time when their present divisions will have disappeared. He did not mind creeds; he knew of none he could not accept, interpreted, of course, by the theological education he had received. Speaking of his plans, he said he hoped to develop their worship, and they were not to be frightened by anything he might do or was reported to be doing. Before he was a Presbyterian he had been an Anglican and still leaned to Anglican reverence and order; he was in favour of forms of worship, so that there should be at least some part of the service where the libertine mind could not have its way. The Church was the body of Christ, the mode of expression of his spirit. His key-note would be "reconciliation" of the old thought with the new; by that he did not mean compromise. He wanted to make the Church a centre of inspiration, an expression of the ideas of the Kingdom of God. While he did not care about names, he wanted to be a Christian; there was nothing wider than that title properly understood, and the freedom he asked for was freedom to express the old truths as well as the new. A shortened evening service in the church followed.

MANY of our readers will be interested to hear that a series of Sunday morning sermons will be delivered by Dr. John Hunter in the Æolian Hall, New Bond-street, W., commencing on October 18. The service will begin at 11 o'clock, and among the subjects chosen for the discourses are the following:—"The Living God: God in the Life of To-day" (October 18); "Our Invisible Allies and Helpers"; "The Long Day of God, or the Slowness of Progress"; "The Reality of the Unseen and the Power of Recognising It"; and "Not One World at a Time, but Citizens of Two Worlds all the Time."

TEMPERANCE Sunday is fixed this year for November 8, and it is hoped, especially in view of the urgent need for strengthening the hands of all temperance workers at the present time, that it will be observed in the churches and schools throughout the land. The National Temperance League has issued a striking poster in which a patriotic appeal is made to the people of the nation to abstain from alcoholic drink during the war, and a leaflet on the "Effects of Alcohol on Naval and Military Work" is being widely circulated. The poster and leaflet are being sent by the secretary of the National Unitarian Temperance Association to all affiliated societies, and in addition to this the Association has made arrangements to hold an Essay Competition open to members of Sunday schools, bands of hope, boys' own brigades, girls' life brigades, scouts, and children's guilds. Particulars as to rules, &c., will appear in the December issue of The Sunday School Monthly, Young Days, and the Unitarian Monthly.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Cambridge.—The services in connection with the Unitarian Free Church will be resumed on October 18, at 11.30, in the Liberal Club Rooms, Downing-street. Many prominent ministers have promised to preach during the term, and the committee would be glad if information about these services could be given to any members of other congregations who may be at Cambridge.

Holloway.—On Thursday next, October 15, at 8 p.m., under the auspices of the Liberal Christian League, the Rev. J. J. Poole will lecture on "Rheims and its Cathedral." The meeting will be held at London College, 409, Holloway-road, and friends are invited.

Ilkeston.—We regret to announce the death of Mrs. Shakespeare, widow of the Rev. W. Shakespeare, who was minister of High-street Chapel, Ilkeston, 1862-1887. Mrs. Shakespeare, who was a first cousin of George Eliot, had long been associated with the educational and philanthropic work of Ilkeston, and had the pleasure of living to see her eldest son chairman of the Education Committee and Mayor of the town. She was in her 83rd year.

London: Blackfriars Mission.—The anniversary service was conducted on Sunday evening, October 11, by the minister and warden, the Rev. W. J. Piggott, who preached on "The Church as the Pillar and Ground of the Truth." The Open Air Mission has resulted in winning several recruits for the church, and in the founding of a Lend-a-Hand-League. The Young Men's Club has sent 22 members out on active service, and 15 others connected with the mission have also volunteered for the defence of their country. We regret to hear that Mr. Piggott has recently suffered a great bereavement in the death of his father.

London: Kilburn.—A social evening to welcome the Rev. F. and Mrs. Munford will be held on Monday, October 19, when the Revs. G. T. Sadler (of Wimbledon), Henry Gow, F. Munford, B.A., and others will speak. The chair will be taken by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

Northampton.—There are now 17,000 Territorials in Northampton, and of these 100 are billeted in the school connected with the Unitarian Church, the greater part of which has been taken over by the military authorities. The ordinary winter activities are consequently rather in abeyance, and all the workers are meeting in various ways the demands made upon them by the war. A large Red Cross working party has been organised, and the ladies of the congregation are also engaged in other kinds of work on behalf of the soldiers in the town. Their kindness is much appreciated. The Rev. W. C. Hall is giving attention to the men connected with Unitarian congregations in Cheshire and Wales, of whom a good number have reported themselves. The services are being attended by these and others in steadily increasing numbers. Some have joined the choir, and two have sung solos. A daily service of public prayer is being held in the church.

Stand.—A very successful gathering took place in the schoolroom of the Unitarian chapel, on Saturday last, to welcome the newly appointed minister, Dr. Thackray. About 280 persons sat down to tea. At the meeting afterwards encouraging speeches were delivered by the Chairman (Mr. J. Taylor Jones), Mr. R. Jones (school superintendent), Miss Philips, and others. The Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans offered a welcome on behalf of neighbouring Unitarian Churches, the Rev. O. Gregory (Stand Independent Church), on behalf of the churches of other denominations—Mr. H. Barrett (Huddersfield Church), Rev. W. R. Shanks (Yorkshire Union), and the Rev. H. McLachlan, of the Home Missionary College. Dr. Thackray and Mrs. Thackray made a suitable response.

Wellington (New Zealand).—The Rev. G. Ernest Hale, B.A., of Melbourne, has been appointed minister of the Unitarian Free Church, in succession to the Rev. W. Jellie. The pulpit has been vacant since August of last year.

Women's League.—Miss Brooke Herford writes: "A number of fine large parcels of clothing for the refugees and other purposes have arrived at Essex Hall. Some are addressed to the Women's League, but bear no indication as to the kind donors. May I, through your columns, say that all such parcels should have on them the name and address of the sender, or a card be sent in advance to advise us of their arrival? Also, that in the cases of gifts for the refugees, it is better to send direct to the care of Lady Emmott, Belgian Refugees' Committee, 23, Warwick-square, E.C."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

FLOATING HOSPITALS.

A new way of utilising the splendid system of waterways in Northern France has been found by the Union of the Women of France, who have inaugurated a service of hospital barges for the wounded. These floating hospitals can be easily moved about, and, with their complement of surgeons and nurses, will be able to render valuable assistance to the field hospitals, the resources of which are already severely taxed. The first barge, which has been named L'Ile de France, will accommodate 40 wounded men and two surgeons. It is believed that it can make the journey from the front to Paris in less than three days.

A BELGIAN TOYSHOP.

Everyone who buys a toy at the shop opened by the Belgian Minister at 21, Old Bond-street, on Monday will have the satisfaction of knowing that he is doing something to relieve the misery of the heroic people who have, so far, been the heaviest sufferers through the war. A number of the toys are being made by the Belgian refugees in our midst, but quantities have come from France, Russia, and Japan. They are all very moderately priced, and every penny of profit is to go to the Belgian Minister to be used for the sufferers in Belgium.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

The Free Church League for Woman Suffrage has issued a declaration, which anyone can sign who wishes to do so, respecting the attitude which it is hoped sympathisers and supporters will take during the war. The declaration consists of the following clauses:—(1) I promise to pray or will, once a day, that war may soon end. (2) I promise to refuse to believe evil reports of our enemy, unless substantiated after reliable investigation. (3) I promise to think and talk of a settlement that will prevent war again, such as a League of Europe, with a Central Council, to decide international relations. (4) I believe that a great safeguard of peace would be the influence of women in the Councils of the State. Copies may be had, price 3d. for 6, postage included, from the secretary, F.C.L.W.S., 13, Bream's-buildings, Chancery-lane, E.C.

AT THE SOUTH POLE.

If anything can call forth greater powers of endurance than those which are faced by the soldier in the trenches, especially in cold, wet weather during periods of enforced inaction, it must surely be the hardships of a long winter in the Polar regions, when food is very scarce, and there is not even the excitement of conflict to warm the blood and break the deadly monotony. In his book on "Antarctic Adventure: Scott's Northern Party," which has just been published (Unwin, 15s. net), Mr. Raymond E. Priestley, who joined the expedition as a geologist and meteorologist, gives a remarkable account of the sufferings which he and his companions endured when they were cut off from their base of supplies during an exploration of the shore of Ross Sea, between Cape Adare and Mount Terror. Their days were spent for the most part in their sleeping bags in a cave, with nothing, apparently, to interest them but an occasional boxing match, the quaint habits of the penguins, and "food dreams" from which they awoke to the actuality of half rations, including one miserable biscuit a day. The eating of the biscuit was a solemn performance, prolonged as much as possible in order that the sensation of having a good meal might be enjoyed and the cravings of hunger tricked, if not kept at bay. When the biscuits were under-baked, and not crisp, the enjoyment was greater, for they could be slowly nibbled. "I have nibbled and nibbled round the edge of such a biscuit," says Mr. Priestley, "until it had all disappeared without my having ever had a fragment in my mouth of such a size that I could feel it crunch under my teeth." Then, he tells us, he could lie back in his sleeping bag feeling that he had got the maximum enjoyment out of the meal.

CHILDREN AND EMPLOYMENT.

We referred in a recent issue to the effect of the war on child employment, and the necessity for some plan being adopted by which boys and girls may be protected from the danger of running wild in the streets. The National Education Association recommends that children about to leave school should be retained, by persuasion, or (where possible) by new bye-law. No child to leave school to seek employment whilst those who have already left are unemployed. It is suggested that the local education authority use freely their power (given by section eleven of the Education Act of 1907) to aid by bursaries the instruction in public elementary schools of scholars who are allowed by law to attend but are not compelled to do so. The scholarships to be awarded for capacity, attendance, and, at discretion, according to financial needs. This is better than charitable relief. Children who have left school and entered employment but are now unemployed should be gathered as firmly as possible into convenient premises under the supervision of the education authority. Voluntary help might be employed freely; but the supreme control should be in the hands of a person with the experience of a trained and responsible teacher, so that these young people may be restored as far as possible to the influence of school discipline and educational control. It is estimated that the number of children in England affected by the war either by inability to obtain employment on leaving school or by losing the employment they have recently obtained may be easily 500,000 or 1,000,000 during the coming winter.

THE PHYSICAL AND MORAL QUALITIES OF THE CHINESE.

IN "Some Roads Towards Peace," a pamphlet written by President C. W. Eliot after his trip round the world, and published by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, some account is given of the physical and moral qualities of the Chinese which came under his observation. "One cannot be even a few days in contact with a crowded Chinese population," he says, "without being deeply impressed with the laboriousness, industry, patience, and cheerfulness of the people as a whole. It was my first sight of a country in which the principal source of mechanical power was human muscle. I had never before seen a city's traffic for both passengers and freight conducted chiefly by men, pulling or pushing small carts on one wheel or more, and carrying enormous burdens on their backs. I had never before seen women managing large rowboats without any assistance from men, and often carrying babies on their backs while rowing. I had never before seen a labourer's life so strenuous during long hours, and so absolutely devoid of comfort during eating and sleeping, as one sees it in all Chinese cities. The tough physical and moral qualities of the Chinese obtrude themselves on the stranger's notice from the first moment of his arrival in the country, and show him why the hundreds of millions of Chinese have arrived at our day through every possible hardship and suffering, through unknown centuries of despotic government, through pestilence, droughts, famines, and floods, and are here in unnumbered millions to take part in a very extraordinary governmental transformation."

"POTSDAM GUARDS OF LEARNING."

In an eloquent plea for history which is also literature which he published last year, Mr. G. M. Trevelyan refers in the following significant terms to the limitations of German learning:—"And who is the Mother Country to Anglo-Saxon historians? Some reply 'Germany,' but others of us prefer to answer 'England.' The methods and limitations of German learning presumably suit the Germans, but are certain to prove a strait-waistcoat to English limbs and faculties. We ought to look to the free, popular, literary traditions of history in our own land. Until quite recent times, from the days of Clarendon down through Gibbon, Carlyle, and Macaulay to Green and Lecky, historical writing was not merely the mutual conversation of scholars with one another, but was the means of spreading far and wide throughout all the reading classes a love and knowledge of history, an elevated and critical patriotism, and certain qualities of mind and heart. But all that has been stopped, and an attempt has been made to drill us into so many Potsdam Guards of learning."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE long despatch from Sir John French which was published on Monday is a justification of the meagreness of the official news from France during the last few weeks. It is a quiet and impressive record of detail. There is not a great deal to show for each day. But when all the days are put together we see that a really great task has been accomplished with the patience, the courage and the resource which are the marks of the highest military genius. Sir John French uses the soldier's proverbial economy in words, but he has contrived with a few strokes to give us a vivid picture of our army in being. This despatch will increase our high admiration for our own troops and those of our Allies. It will also have a very healthy influence upon the country's nerves.

THE following message from Mr. Asquith appeared in L'Indépendance Belge on Wednesday :—

I cordially welcome the appearance of L'Indépendance Belge in this country, and trust that the brave task which is being undertaken will be successful. I feel confident that before long L'Indépendance Belge will again be issued in Brussels, and our friends and Allies, the valiant Belgian people, will once more be restored to their own country in full enjoyment of that freedom for which they have made such splendid and terrible sacrifices.

The gallant deeds of the undefeated Belgian army this week give force to Mr. Asquith's words. Punch is happily inspired in its cartoon of King Albert and the Kaiser with the legend :—The Kaiser : "So you see—you've lost everything." The King of the Belgians : "Not my Soul."

* * *

A NEWSPAPER in exile is something of a novelty, but all lovers of freedom will acclaim the spirit of L'Indépendance Belge in refusing to bow to the will of the invader. It is a newspaper of long and honourable traditions. Founded in 1830 it assumed its present title when Belgium was made an independent State. In 1870 it was the only newspaper published in the French language which gave full accounts of the progress of the war. Its staff is now in London, and with the issue of a daily edition will form an important centre of Belgian industry in our midst. Its contributors will include Catholics, Liberals, and Socialists, and several well-known Belgian men of letters, all united in a common devotion to the honour and freedom of their country.

IMPORTANT steps were taken on Wednesday for the honourable detention of German and Austrian aliens in our midst. The police measures which were adopted at the beginning of August have not succeeded in allaying public anxiety, and probably the authorities have information which has made more drastic action necessary. As we have explained elsewhere, we think that we are bound at the present time to do what we can to remove every reasonable cause of provocation even at the cost of grave personal inconvenience. But the new policy is not to be set down as a triumph for the panic-monger. The Prime Minister, with his massive common-sense, is not the man to neglect measures of public safety until he is prodded into activity by the newspapers. We are deeply sorry that anything resembling imprisonment has become necessary, but there is no shamefulness in it. It is simply a matter of precaution, and when the war is over we must be careful that no stigma is attached to persons who are worthy of the hospitality of our country, because for the moment we have had to treat them with rigour.

* * *

A REUTER telegram from Petrograd on Tuesday made the significant announcement that the Russian Christian Temperance Society, which aims at the complete suppression of alcoholism, recently addressed to the Tsar a request to forbid the sale of spirituous liquors in Russia. His Majesty, in reply, sent a telegram of thanks to the Grand Duke Constantine, the president of the society, saying, "I have decided to prohibit for ever in Russia the Government sale of alcohol." The sale of spirits is a Government monopoly in Russia, and when war was declared all the spirit shops were closed. The results exceeded the expectations of the most ardent temperance advocates. There was an instantaneous decrease in crime, and the dissatisfaction among the spirit consumers quickly died out. The estimated revenue from the sale of spirits this year was over £93,000,000.

THIS splendid act of Russian patriotism is an example to the world, and nowhere is the example more needed than in the British Isles. It will be impossible in future to say that temperance legislation is too expensive, because we depend upon the prosperity of the trade in alcohol for a large part of our revenue. What Russia has done, we can do. A breach has been made in the barbed wire entanglements which surround our most dangerous monopoly. Before the war is over much severer measures will have to be taken against the menace of the public house. Respectable citizens have been terribly apathetic hitherto in face of the physical and moral wreckage which we do so little to avert. At a time when we submit quite cheerfully to being regulated for the common good, the drink traffic ought to be properly controlled. The war which will bring financial stress to many forms of industry is likely to be its opportunity for booming trade. This is an offence against the elementary decencies of life and a source of public danger. Russia has shown us a better way.

We know that many people, taking refuge in abstract arguments, are inclined to doubt the efficacy of severe measures of restriction. That, however, is not the verdict of experience. In an important communication by Professor Milyoukov, the leader of the Russian Liberals, which appeared in the Manchester Guardian on Wednesday, there is impressive evidence of the effect of the whole country becoming "dry" at the beginning of the war.

"The immediate result has been shown by an unprecedented decrease in the criminal returns and by an uncontested growth in the productivity of labour. The spirit of moral sobriety, as it were, is also revealed in the way in which the news about the war is received in Russia. No exultation, no wantonness, no display of colours on the news of victories; no despair and no desire to stop fighting at the news of occasional defeats. The people know how to appreciate fully the strength of the enemy, and they are sure of the final victory."

THE article by Professor Milyoukov is not less important for the glimpse which it affords into the aims and desires which animate progressive minds in Russia. There is, he says, a strong loyalty to the idea that Prussian hegemony must be definitely broken, but there is no desire for "a clean sweep of Germans." Nationality must be the basis of settlement, and if this means the adhesion of Prussian provinces to Poland, Germany might be compensated for these losses with the German provinces of Austria. "The chief objection against this solution," he says, "is known to be that of Bismarck—the Austrian Germans, being Catholics, do not much like Prussia, and sympathise rather with Southern Germany. They may overthrow the Prussian majority in the Bundesrat, and thus by way of internal evolution put an end to the Prussian hegemony." This suggestion opens up a most fascinating vista of political speculation. It would mean the liberation of Germany from the dominating caste of the Hohenzollerns, and of Europe from a perpetual menace to its peace.

IN regard to the outlook for international relationships and the peaceful interests of civilisation after the war, Professor Milyoukov is distinctly hopeful.

"I do not belong to the pessimists who assert that this war has brought with it the downfall of international law. On the contrary, I consider it to be an assertion of the sanctity of international obligations and a most severe rebuke for those who thought them to be nothing but insignificant 'scraps of paper.' To my mind we are now on the way to a realisation of the great problems of pacifism, and the war has brought us much nearer to the goal than we had ever been. The third Hague Conference will meet, and it will have most important work to achieve. The limitation of armaments, the conclusion of a general and obligatory arbitration treaty, the final assertion of the inviolability of life and of private property, the rights of neutral States, and, before all, a strong and efficacious sanction to be applied in future by a legally organised Europe to the attempted violations of international law—all these will be powerfully promoted by this war. But for this there would be no justification for the strong desire generally felt and universally acknowledged, in Russia as well as in England, to carry the war through to its bitter end."

In writing in this way Professor Milyoukov informs us that he is expressing something more than the opinion of his political friends. "I firmly believe that this is also what may be called the 'national standpoint' in Russia." His article is another step in our gradual emancipation from the bad habit of mistaking the baneful influence of Prussia upon the Russian oligarchy for the soul of the people.

STILL another manifesto—this time from men of science and learning. It is like its predecessors, a reasoned statement of the English case in reply to the German professors. Well, if the theologians are to make their protest, it is well that others should do so too. After all, the theologian represents a very small fragment of the intellectual life either of England or Germany. If the voice of the universities is to make itself heard, it is the historians, the jurists, and the scientific men who ought to speak. But really there is nothing more to be said, and we doubt whether a ding-dong battle of manifestoes serves any good cause except as an outlet for the feelings of those who append their names. In any case any moral effect it may have is likely to be strictly confined to home consumption. The use which the German Press Bureau has made of obedient professors has only caused the world to smile to itself and wonder why it is supposed to be so credulous.

* * *

WE are confirmed in this view by reading the following passage from a recent article by Professor Bang, of Copenhagen, dealing with the appeal of German theologians "to the Evangelical Christians abroad." He tells them, not without a touch of scorn, that the Danes read both sides of the case, and take the liberty of forming their own judgment.

"They need to be told the truth when they show so much surprise that the world does not love them so much as they think they deserve. It is a fact (compare, for example, General Botha's recent speech) that throughout the world there is positive terror of coming under German dominion or German influence. What is the reason? We know well enough from dearly-bought experience. But is it not remarkable that the Germans never seem to ask themselves this question? If they did so they might arrive at a better comprehension of the situation, and then they would certainly compose their appeals in a different strain or dispense with them altogether. The present appeal at any rate has entirely failed to make any impression."

APPARENTLY the Blue Cross is to become the protective symbol of suffering animals just as the Red Cross is sacred to wounded humanity. It is announced that base hospitals for wounded horses have been established in France with the cordial approval of the French and English authorities. This is a step which will appeal strongly to humanitarian feeling in all civilised countries, and not least in military circles. There is a feeling of close companionship between the trooper and his horse. The horse carries the man into battle, and it is a true partnership in courage. The sentiment is a very old one—was it not written long ago, "He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength; he goeth on to meet the armed men. He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted; neither turneth he back from the sword. He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting." But it is only in recent times that these provident thoughts of mercy have entered into our affection for the mettlesome steed. May we commend the beautiful prayer of St. Basil, which we print this week, as suitable for use in church for all animals who suffer in time of war.

WORTHY OF OUR COUNTRY.

EVERY week as it passes brings with it a fresh crop of problems for those of us who are not in the fighting line, and they are problems which have to be faced not as matters for discussion but with a strong sense of their practical urgency. It is the day of a wise opportunism, using the word in the sense of readiness for prompt and effective action, and the instinct which seizes upon the human factors which are operative at the moment. Moreover all our problems cohere, they are all part of the one problem of a final victory for the best things, and any slackness of fibre or unworthiness of temper or unpractical pedantry must react as a chilling and depressing influence upon our enthusiasm for the hard task to which we have set our hands. For instance, the one thing to do for Belgium is to open our hearts and our purses to her refugees. We cannot hesitate, because repatriation when the war is over will be very difficult, and while it lasts new and disturbing factors may be introduced into our own labour market. If we did we should simply be sacrificing open-handed generosity to calculating prudence, at a time when generosity is the one thing that can heal and unite and keep our own feeling fine and true.

It is in this temper of wise opportunism that we must try to face another problem which threatens to create serious trouble for the community. During the past week news has reached us from different quarters of a rising tide of popular hostility to the Germans who are still resident in our midst. In every large town there is a hooligan element spoiling for a row. There is also a section of quiet and respectable citizens, which is easily inflamed and runs quickly to violence as an outlet for pent-up feelings of excitement or hostility. In some places these two elements have joined hands, and there have been serious outbreaks of mob-violence. What can be done to check it, apart from the police measures of repression, which may only succeed in driving it momentarily underground to break out in a more menacing form later on? The problem has two sides to it. There is the provocation, which turns the law-abiding citizen into a rioter; and there is the spiritual temper, which is unequal to the strain which is put upon it. We shall accordingly do something to reduce the danger if we remove some of the causes of provocation, and at the same time fortify the soul with virtue and self-control. One part of the task may be called administrative, and the other religious, but every severe crisis reveals the need of close harmony and understanding between these two aspects of practical wisdom. It is not enough to say love your enemies, while no effort is made to avoid the occasions of offence. And, equally, it is not enough to remove hindrances out of the way unless the public conscience is trained to deal with those which remain with just judgment and generous feeling, and a constant reference to Christian standards of love and duty.

On the side of provocation we cannot absolve a section of the daily press from serious responsibility. If the men who control certain newspapers are animated by patriotic feeling, and we do not wish to impugn their motives, they have blundered badly in the tone and temper of their anti-alien campaign. Presumably, they believe that they cannot get the things done, which they think are essential for the public safety, unless they use the weapons of panic or political detraction. But they only succeed in arousing an ugly temper, which adds enormously to the difficulties of those who are responsible for good government. At a time when the whole atmosphere is electric with excitement newspapers which themselves grow hysterical with spy-fever may easily incur a heavy debt of complicity in riot and popular violence.

But we are far from thinking that anti-German feeling is chiefly the product of this kind of journalism. That would be entirely to misconceive the human factors of the situation. The mass of our people have been deeply outraged by the German crimes against Belgium. There is a great deal of indignation abroad, hot in temper and rough in speech, unqualified by any knowledge of other lands, unable to make the distinctions which are natural to minds trained in international sympathy. The German spy system, so wide in its ramifications, so unscrupulous in its methods, has also created a mood of dark suspicion in the mind of the public, which it is impossible to denounce as wholly wrong or unreasonable. It is the honourable understandings of daily life which have received a mortal wound. Hospitality has been abused by cunning and deceit. We have been betrayed by people whom we esteemed our friends. It is a horrible thing that people of German birth, who are quite incapable of meanness or trickery of any kind, should be involved in this cloud of suspicion. But how at the present moment is it to be avoided? If honourable and kind men and women tell us that they would shrink from taking a German guest into their homes, we are bound to regard the feeling as natural even though we ourselves may not share it. For these reasons we regret that all German subjects were not repatriated at the outbreak of the war. It would have removed a cause of provocation, which is bound to grow more acute as the days go by. Anglo-German relations both of private friendship and public esteem are likely to be much more cordial in the future, if we relieve them of all needless strain during the progress of the war. Even now we think that the soundest advice to German subjects still resident among us would be to go back to their own country. We say this not from any feeling of hatred or dislike—we know that many of them are worthy of all admiration—but because we desire to make self-control and good temper easier for ordinary human nature, which wants to do right, and yet is easily provoked.

But suppose the grounds of provocation should remain exactly as they are, Christian people ought to be the last to find easy excuses either for themselves or the public. Religion must throw all its strength upon the side of generous feeling and self-control. It must never relinquish its aim of peace-making when men are sharply divided in feeling and opinion. How can it do this most effectively at the present moment? Not, we venture to think, by any fervent outpouring of cosmopolitan sentiment, if for no other reason because few people will stay to listen to it. The idealism which has captured men's hearts is an intensely practical love of their own country. To that we can appeal. They want to be worthy of their country and its cause. Religion can teach them in what this worthiness consists, and in solemn warning how easily it may be profaned. Riotous behaviour, the lust of cruelty and revenge, enervating bitterness of mind, the hatred which grows reckless of justice and truthfulness, acts of disloyalty to universal charity, all these are unpatriotic, because they stain our country's fair name and defile the bright image which we treasure in our hearts. Along these lines religion may find a new entrance into lives which have long been indifferent to its influence. If it has the practical wisdom to fix its whole force and attention upon the affections which are brightest and purest at the moment, it may turn even our base temptations to glorious use. When we have learned to behave ourselves worthily of our country, proper respect for our enemies and many other difficult things will be added unto us.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE storm which is now raised shall quickly be appeased, and inward grief be sweetened by a return of grace.

I yet live, saith the Lord, and am ready to help thee, and to give thee greater comfort than before, if thou put thy trust in me, and call devoutly upon me.

Let not, therefore, thy heart be troubled, neither let it fear. When thou thinkest thyself farthest off from me, oftentimes I am nearest thee. Thou must not judge according to present feeling, nor so take any grief, or give thyself over to it, from whencesoever it cometh, as though all hope of escape were taken away. Think not thyself wholly left, although for a time I have sent thee some tribulation, or even withdrawn thy desired comfort, for this is the way to the kingdom of heaven.

It shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us; this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation.—From "Christ the Consoler," by Ellice Hopkins.

LORD, when young I have almost quarrelled with that petition, "Give peace in our time, O Lord"; needless to wish for light at noon-day; for then peace was so plentiful, no fear of famine, but suspicion of a surfeit thereof. And yet how many good comments was this prayer then capable of! Give peace, that is, continue and preserve it; give peace, that is, give us hearts worthy of it, and thankful for it. In our time, that is, all our time: for there is more besides a fair morning required to make a fair day. Now I see the mother had more wisdom than her son. The Church knew, better than I, how to pray. Now I am better informed of the necessity of that petition. Yea, with the daughters of the horseleech, I have need to cry, Give, give—peace in

LORD, since these woeful wars began, one, formerly mine intimate acquaintance, is now turned a stranger, yea, an enemy. Teach me how to behave myself towards him. Must the new foe quite jostle out the old friend? May I not with him continue some commerce of kindness? Though the amity be broken on his side, may I not preserve my counterpart entire? Yet how can I be kind to him without being cruel to myself and thy cause? O guide my shaking hand to draw so small a line straight; or rather, because I know not how to carry myself towards him in this controversy, even be pleased to take away the subject of the question, and speedily to reconcile these unnatural differences.—Ibid.

WHEN wilt Thou save the people?

Oh, God of mercy, when?

Not kings and lords, but nations!

Not thrones and crowns, but men!

Flowers of Thy heart, O God, are they;
Let them not pass like weeds away—
Their heritage a sunless day.

God save the people!

Shall crime bring crime for ever,

Strength aiding still the strong?

Is it Thy will, O Father,

That man shall toil for wrong?

"No," say Thy mountains; "No,"

Thy skies;

"Man's clouded sun shall brightly rise,
And songs ascend instead of sighs."

God save the people!

When wilt Thou save the people?

Oh, God of mercy, when?

The people, Lord, the people!

Not thrones and crowns, but men!

God save the people! Thine they are,
Thy children, as Thine angels fair—
From vice, oppression, and despair,

God save the people!

EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

A Prayer by Dr. Thomas Arnold.

O GRACIOUS Father, keep me through thy Holy Spirit; keep my heart soft and tender now in health and amidst the bustle of the world; keep the thought of thyself present to me as my Father in Jesus Christ; and keep alive in me a spirit of love and meekness to all men, that I may be at once gentle and active and firm. O strengthen me to bear pain, or sickness, or danger, or whatever thou shalt be pleased to lay upon me, as Christ's soldier and servant; and let my faith overcome the world daily. Perfect and bless the work of thy spirit in the hearts of all thy people, and may thy kingdom come, and thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. I pray for this, and for all that thou seest me to need, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

FROM THE RUSSIAN LITURGY OF ST. BASIL.

Bishop of Caesarea, A.D. 370.

AND for those also, O Lord, the humble beasts, who, with us, bear the burden and heat of the day, and offer their guileless lives for the well-being of their countries, we entreat Thy great tenderness of heart, for Thou hast promised to save both man and beast, and great is Thy loving-kindness, O Master, Saviour of the world.

GETTING AND SPENDING.

AT times of national calamity like the present it is, of course, useless to try and arouse interest in abstract economic theories. There is a natural disinclination to discuss anything except the appalling fact that we are fighting for our very existence. But we shall soon be compelled to recognise that our future welfare is threatened by forces quite as menacing as the German Army, and even when militarism is swept out of Europe—as it will not be, we fear, with the speed that some anticipate—we shall not be an essentially free people so long as we are under the influence of false social ideals, which, together with an inordinate love of pleasure, have gone far to destroy us already. Thousands of individuals are suffering at the present time for our devotion to these things; and the irony of the situation lies in the fact that, seized, if only temporarily, with a sane instinct for economy and simplicity of life, we are face to face with the unemployment and poverty of those who have ministered to our largely artificial needs, and in whose interests we are being adjured to go on spending freely "as usual."

It is all very pitiable, but it cannot be too strongly emphasised that no final remedy for the evil we have created will be found in checking a commendable desire to spend less on things that cannot be classed as necessities, or holding up to opprobrium those who abstain from extravagant pleasures on the ground that they are hoarding while others starve. We shall not save the nation by making a virtue of habits of self-indulgence which are never very praiseworthy, and seem positively indecent now in view of the terrible tragedy that is being enacted in the theatre of war. To be compelled, indeed, at such a time to buy gold purses, costly gowns, diamond ornaments, or luxurious motor-cars would, we should think, be a weariness of the flesh even to those who have been in the habit of spending their time very largely in making such purchases; and it is the same with other things. At the first touch of stark reality our passion for musical comedy, fancy-dress balls "in aid of charity," smart dinner-parties and tango teas ceased to exist, and to urge people to go on amusing themselves in the senseless and expensive fashion which was the regular thing only a short time ago is to force them back into a slavery from which many have secretly been longing to be set free, even while they appeared to be enduring it resignedly. At last the fact that simplicity of life and sincerity of purpose is the only true liberation is becoming patent to thousands who have never before been anything more than mere puppets of fashion, and this is all to the good, though the way of escape is, unhappily, impeded by the necessity of stopping to fill the hungry mouths of those whose existence our return to sanity imperils.

As things are, we must do the best we can for our fellow-men in the difficult position which our capricious desires and our chaotic methods of social management have created, and it will be for the serious thinkers and reformers to help us to evolve a better order when the awful cloud that hangs over us now has lifted. From this time of sore trial and testing we must surely emerge full of a dogged determination to end both war and destitution. But will the glib journalists so badly in need of "copy" please refrain from lecturing us if, for a time at least, we do not pour out money like water on things we do not need and are really better without. We cannot be driven to squander our incomes indiscriminately under the sole direction of the desire to keep people in employment, no matter what their employment may be, especially when we want what we can spare to give to funds which are designed to help the community as a whole. If we are, we shall find ourselves moving in a vicious circle, and the satisfaction of temporarily staving off a day of adversity which is bound to come for many, do what we may, will be more than balanced by the demoralisation resulting from continuing to occupy ourselves with inanities when we are stirred by the call to a less selfish way of living. Teetotalers know that publicans have to live like other folk, yet they pursue an aim which, if realised, must reduce his profits sadly, for in the war against evil, as in every other war, individuals have to be sacrificed for the good of the whole till we learn how to make provision for those whose labours become unnecessary as we rise to the level of higher ideals. The whole question of expenditure must, indeed, be left to our private judgment, whatever mistakes we may make, for no one can finally decide but ourselves which industries we shall support most whole-heartedly at a given moment. But it becomes clear that the problem of productive and unproductive labour is one which we have not yet clearly thought out, and it may be that, as a result of the sobering of the English mind, we shall realise our responsibility in this matter more acutely, and firmly resolve that, in future, things shall not be left so much to what we airily call "chance."

PIONEERS IN TIME OF REACTION.

OF the many excellent contributions towards a Home University Library, one by Mr. H. N. Brailsford on "Shelley, Godwin and their Circle" (Williams & Norgate, 1s.) is surely among the best. It is a rare delight to find history, criticism, and the saner ethics of reform so happily blended as here. The history of the reaction in England, following on the terrors of revolution in France, at the close of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth century, as it is reflected in the life and writings of those who opposed that reaction, is sketched in these pages with extraordinary vividness. The spirit of repression, which fear of anarchy and the thunders of Burke's eloquence made rampant in the land, is criticised and judged in language as just as it is strong; and the works of those who rebelled against it, and published their arguments and appeals in behalf of liberty, are discussed with a like fairness, albeit the writer's sympathies are obviously with these. Thomas Paine, William Godwin, Mary Wollstonecraft, and others live again, as Mr. Brailsford depicts them in their battle against hopeless odds, and summarises the ideas and theories which made their books famous, and, in some cases, dangerous to the dark and stolid conservatism of the time. It should be very wholesome reading both for the stubborn reactionaries and the too impatient revolutionaries of to-day.

Indeed, this little volume is a striking contribution to our knowledge of human nature in relation to reforms which make for real progress in social well-being; we see how sluggishness of response to fresh or unconventional ideas, unreadiness for change, indifference to the just claims of the oppressed, and the fear of giving power to the people, which haunts the minds of those who hold them in check by oppressive laws, all combine to hinder every movement of social and political emancipation. We see, too, the weakness and insufficiency of the pioneers themselves, so that even grave and powerful thinkers such as Godwin fail in their effort to clear away obstructions and lead the way by their own example to the wiser, happier life. We rise from the reading of these chapters with the feeling that it is not any one class, however privileged and reactionary, that alone, or chiefly, makes the advance of truth and justice so slow; it is human nature itself. And there is the inevitableness and the tragedy of it. Yet, also, looking back over three or four generations, to the times of which Mr. Brailsford writes, great hopes arise as we see how surely, if painfully and heavily, the sluggish creature does move. The advance has been great and the pace during the last half-century has certainly quickened, and many a social crime been trampled in the dust.

The years are slow; the vision tarrieth long,

And far the end may be;

Yet, one by one, the friends of ancient wrong

Go out, and leave earth free.

The concluding chapter, on Shelley, is full of interest, and is written with fine appreciation of the poet's impassioned ardour for the deliverance of men from every form of tyranny, and of the amazing lyric, and sometimes dramatic, power with which that ardour finds expression in his poetry. But we may be permitted to doubt whether Shelley was, intellectually, so much in bondage as a disciple of Godwin, or so lacking in originality of thought as Mr. Brailsford submits. The daring of Shelley, in his greatest flights of song, is that of one who has seen, with his own eyes, a vision of human liberty and human excellence for which it was worth while to live and sing and suffer, even in those blank days of repression and stagnation and political despair.

As an illustration of Mr. Brailsford's precision and clearness of style, and his power of summing up in a few sentences the reforms for which the born thinkers of that time stood, let the following from the chapter on Mary Wollstonecraft be quoted here. Of her book he says:—

"It has nothing of the learning, the formidable argumentative compulsion of Godwin's writing. But it is sold to-day in cheap editions, while Godwin survives only on the dustier shelves of old libraries. Its passion and sincerity have kept it alive. It is the cry of an experience too real, too authentic, to allow of any meandering down the by-ways of fanciful speculation. He said, with solitary voice, the thing which the main army of thinking women are saying to-day. . . . There is in it no trace of the dogmatic individualism that distorts the speculations of Godwin and clogs the more practical speculations of Paine. . . . It demands in words which anticipate Ibsen's 'Doll's House,' that a woman shall be herself and live her own life. But 'her own life' was, for Mary Wollstonecraft, a social life. The ideal is the perfect companionship of men and women, and the preparation of men and women, by an equal practice of modesty and chastity, and an equal advance in education, to be the parents of their children. . . . The education which she demanded was the co-education of men and women in common schools. She attacked the dual standard of sexual morality with a brave plainness of speech. She demanded the opening of suitable trades and professions to women. She exposed the whole system which compels women to 'live' by their charm. But a less destructive reformer never set out to overthrow conventions. For her the duty always underlies the right, and the development of the self-reliant individual is a preparation for the life of fellowship."

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

SIR,—Sir Roland K. Wilson's apt use of the "F.C.G." cartoon gives me the opportunity of saying that I do not contemplate compulsory military service with equanimity, but making use of his illustration, I feel we are in the position of "Brer Rabbit." We shall have to accept the ordeal whether we like it or not. Either the Germans or the English will drill us. The adoption of the latter will prevent the former. We must avoid the temptation of discussing the Irish or any other section under the figure of round men and square holes. Let it suffice to say that harmony of aim would go far towards inducing comradeship. A patriot will not pose as a superior person. In a life and death struggle "there is no last nor first," in the Browning sense, of course. Sir Roland regards my use of the adjective "national" quantitatively as an "entire novelty." Let me shelter behind Lord Erroll where he says, "No army can be national unless all the manhood of the nation is represented in its ranks" (Nineteenth Century, April, 1907).

In reply to Mr. Henry Ost's kind letter, one knows that under our constitution Lord Kitchener could not fill the rôle of dictator in the old Roman sense. What happens is that parliamentary forms are observed, while the experts get their way. There is nothing else for it in times of crisis. Mr. Ost and Mr. F. G. Jackson still adhere to a view which I only recently abandoned, viz., for defensive purposes we need a big navy and only a little army. Do they think Lord Kitchener wrong in creating a new army of a million men? Something more than keeping our word with France and Belgium is involved. The economic side of the question provides ground for speculations of an intensely interesting kind. I agree that mobilisation would cause less derangement in an agricultural than in a manufacturing country. But after all it is merely a matter of organisation. We recently nationalised the railways and took over the sugar industry. The suggestion is now being made that the Government should take over the surplus stocks of raw cotton, so as to allow the normal working of the law of supply and demand. Mr. Ost will acknowledge that though our expeditionary force was comparatively small, great masses of men have been withdrawn from trade without endangering our supply of necessities. Starvation will never visit England because of a general mobilisation. While we retain command of the sea we shall obtain food. This, of course, is at the root of the "balance of power." Mr. Ost ought to tell us when English military policy and English foreign policy ceased to consider home defence from the wide view point of the general European situation. As long ago as 1717 an English envoy could represent Lord Stanhope's policy as being based on the principle of a balance of forces.

To Mr. Jackson I would say, "Face the facts!" Our new army is composed of splendid material, but it is not altogether voluntary. And it is being recruited after the outbreak of war. We wanted it earlier. Sir Roland K. Wilson would have secured a good number of men by offering higher rates of pay, but Mr. Jackson would have prevented him on the ground that he wanted the money for Old Age Pensions and sickness insurance benefits. I know the value of these things, but even social reform is thin broth when a robber chief is at the gate. Mr. Jackson touches upon the subject of military training in schools. I wish he would follow this up. It was partly what I had in mind when hinting at an extension of scouting. My experience in connection with school care work convinces me that military training with its concomitants, adequate food and clothing, would revolutionise young England. Scouting can be made more military than Mr. Jackson seems to think. As the proud possessor of a Scoutmaster's warrant I know both sides of the shield. One side shows a staff, the other a rifle. Let him quote the latest utterances of the Chief Scout! Switzerland, too, is dismissed with slight treatment. In the matter of shooting, the modern Swiss compares with our mediæval yeoman, the difference being in the weapon. Touching New Zealand, bitter complaints were raised in some quarters against the new system, but quite recently ex-Principal Adeney sent word home from New Zealand that the churches there were in sympathy with compulsory military training. It had proved a blessing to the community. Mr. Jackson's man in the street was largely right. I don't think he had forgotten that Lord Roberts' proposals were for home defence. The New Zealand army is for home defence, but the colony has been able to despatch an expeditionary force of 8,000. This confirms the view of the man in the street, and also confutes Sir Ian Hamilton where he says that under compulsory service adequate overseas forces cannot be obtained. Just as unemployment or the fear of unemployment is driving many men into the army, so the possession of things counted good is keeping some back. Taking liberties with Psalm lxxviii. 12, one is tempted to say: "He that tarrieth at home divideth the spoil." Universal service would do something to obviate that.—Yours, &c.,

OUR ATTITUDE TOWARDS OUR ENEMIES.

SIR,—I am sure that a great many of your readers will have experienced a feeling of real gratitude for the very inspiring article printed in to-day's IN-QUIRER under the title "Our attitude towards our enemies." The question as to "love" or "hate" therein discussed is assuredly one involving the consideration of fundamental religious principles, and ought, as the writer of the article most truly says, to offer "a rallying ground for the forces of Christianity" at the present critical moment. It would hardly be possible to express more clearly and tersely the alternative with which we are now faced in Europe, than by describing it as an alternative between Purgatory and Hell. The immediate task of England and her Allies is the crushing (no mere checking, be it understood) of Prussian militarism; but, whatever the success of our armies, unless the great Christian principle of healing, redemptive love can be recognised as dominating the final adjustment which such success may enable us to make, there will be neither that new and better Germany nor that permanently-established European Peace, for which so many of us hope and pray. It has more than once been pointed out that the brave men who are actually engaged at the front show little or none of that uncontrolled hatred towards the enemy to which drawing-room patriots (?) frequently give expression.—Yours, &c.,

JONATHAN NIELD.

THE NEUTRAL POWERS AND INTERNATIONAL LAW.

SIR,—The Conventions unanimously agreed to by Germany and 43 other nations at The Hague Conference of 1907 included the following provisions: "The territory of neutral Powers is inviolable. Belligerents are forbidden to move troops or convoys, whether munitions of war or supplies across the territory of a neutral Power." These Conventions solemnly made by the German Government with the civilised nations of the whole world have within seven years been utterly disregarded by that Government. It has invaded the territories of two Neutral Powers, mutually declared to be inviolable, and in one case has bombarded unfortified cities and laid waste the country side. Luxemburg protested, but was too weak to resist. Belgium protested and is valiantly resisting. The other Neutral Powers, who were parties to the Conventions cannot but condemn and protest against this outrage on the first principle of civilised life. To fail in doing so would be to condone this infamous breach of International Law, and, indeed, to invite the German Government to invade any other neutral territory that stood in its way. The least the Neutral Powers can do is to meet in Conference to consider forthwith how they should deal with the situation which Germany's breach of their and her own Conventions has brought about. By this action of the German Government the personal liberty of the people of the whole world is threatened.—I am, Yours, &c.,

WHAT GERMANY IS THINKING.

SIR,—There must be a very large number of Germans who have not bowed the knee to the Baal of Might yet who believe the war to be a patriotic duty for Germany, trusting in their Government's assertions that it was forced upon them by France and England, the former moved by revenge and the latter by jealousy and greed. If we hope ever to hold friendly relations with such Germans again it is important that we do all in our power to inform them of the facts as to the events and negotiations that preceded the war. An opportunity of doing this is afforded by the presence in England of a large number of prisoners, some of whom will shortly be going back to Germany in exchange for English prisoners. The Government might have a translation made of the last Blue Book "Great Britain and the European Crisis," or some shorter summary, and allow a copy to be given to each prisoner wounded or unwounded.

THE HONESTY OF ENGLAND.

DEAR SIR,—In looking up some old reminiscences last week, I found the following notice:—"Döllinger, 1799-1890, is reported by the Munich correspondent of the Daily News thus: 'I trust the honesty of no other Power as I trust that of England.'" (From the Guardian, July 14, 1886, page 1,043, column 1.) It is a long communication, but I should like to see those 14 words reproduced in THE INQUIRER now. It is a valuable testimony.—Yours, &c.,

THE PUBLIC HOUSE INFLUENCE.

SIR,—I should like to support the plea of Mr. Cowlin for special efforts to be made by all our churches to reduce drinking facilities, not only with regard to men in uniform, but all citizens. We are glad to see a reduction of the hours during which public houses may be open, and I trust that those limitations will be continued when the war is happily ended. If it is a good thing to curtail drinking during the war, it will be a good thing afterwards. May I add to Mr. Cowlin's plea a reminder to all our ministers that Temperance Sunday is fixed for November 8, and urge upon them the importance of its observance this year? There will probably be a sprinkling of soldiers in our congregations on that day, and in any case the subject ought to be dealt with. The number of special sermons having reference to this terrible war delivered from our pulpits has no doubt been enormous, but an enemy no less terrible than the Germans is in our midst, and it is the duty of every minister of Christ's gospel, and of every Church professing the Christian name, to declare against intemperance, and to cast out this evil demon from our land.—Yours, &c.,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

AMONG THE BIRDS IN OCTOBER.

II.

WHAT birds shall you study in late October? It depends on where you live. If in the heart of a smoky town, I fear you will have to be content with the sparrow and robin. The latter we all love to observe and indulge, but the former has little ways of its own that repay closer attention than they usually get. We talk of the house sparrow's chirp, and some of us imagine that it has only one note. Listen to it, and you will find that it has several. They mean different things. Quite as many as the different barks of your dog. You recognise excitement, joy, fear, anger in his bark, perhaps without thinking how he manages to express these. Listen with the hearing ear, that does not take monotony in chirps for granted, and you will find that the homely sparrows can tell their friends and neighbours whether they are glad, or sorry, or hungry, or alarmed; they do it in various chirpy notes. If you want to know Mr. Sparrow from his wife, look at the throat and breast. His are black, not so hers; and the white bar on her wing is less distinct. Miss and Master Sparrow are like their mother, but somewhat paler in tint.

If you live among lanes and woods, you cannot go far without a chance of seeing the common wren, a morsel of feathered activity $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches long including the scrap of cocked-up tail. No other British bird of that size cocks its tail, so you can't mistake it even when it is not near enough to let you see the dusky bars which run all across its tiny reddish-brown body. You can hear it, too, for it is one of the dozen or so of our wild birds that ever sing in October. The song is out of all proportion to the bird's size—loud, high-pitched, yet not harsh. Its scolding note, and it is much given to scolding, is not now as loud as it was in the nesting season. Learn to distinguish this alarm note from that of the robin. You are not likely to confuse the real song of these two birds.

The wren's voice is often heard before the bird is visible, but the little creature loves to see and—with due caution—to let itself be seen; so wait awhile, and guided by the voice, a sharp clicking "chit," keep your eye on the hedge, or on the long bramble spray below it: in a few moments you will see the "chitty," as country folk call it, appear from among the dark red berries of the hawthorn. But it only stays to turn its tail towards you and fire off one or two more "chits" at you before popping under the glistening bramble leaves, now fringed here and there with warm colouring. Three yards further on it peeps at you again from among the violet and carmine foliage that droops from the branches of the small wild cherry tree. Wrens mostly "chit" from low stations, but will sing from the higher branches.

If your home is within reach of a large and quiet lake or mere out of which a few low rocks rise, you may see a bird which, though resident with us, only comes to inland waters when the summer is well over. It is the cormorant. These birds spend the summer among the rocky ledges of the Cornish and other cliffs, where they were born, and where they have reared a brood. Now they come to feast at their ease on trout and other fishy tit-bits on our lakes.

Nineteen of them came a few weeks ago to settle in Derwentwater. Two, at least, have already been shot by anglers who wished to have the trout left for their own catching. Cormorants are dark, glossy birds with white throats and yellow pouched bills. They measure a yard from the hooked bill tip to the end of the short fan-shaped tail. Expert in swimming, as in diving, they can easily secure their prey. When they have caught all the fish they need they return to the rock and sit in a row, solemnly flapping their great black wings, presumably to dry them, for after a few minutes the flapping ceases. Like the heron—a bird to be seen about the same waters—the cormorant pays regular visits to certain spots. Thirlmere has one cormorant this year. I saw it there a month ago. A local observer tells me that it comes to the same rock daily about noon, and again at about three o'clock.

EMILY NEWLING.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MISS EMILY SHARPE.

MR. SAMUEL SHARPE, banker, Egyptologist, and translator of the Old and New Testaments, writing of his early married life, says: "On our marriage we took a house in Canonbury-place, No. 4, and lived quietly, with very little visiting. There five of our children were born, beside one that died within a few weeks of its birth. They were all for the most part educated at home by their mother, and it is unnecessary for me to describe her good qualities to them, as they all remember her and cherish her memory. In 1840 we removed to a larger house, No. 32, Highbury-place. There our youngest child was born; and there, in June, 1851, my dear wife died. My six children have most dutifully and affectionately done their best to lessen the blank of widowhood to me; and they make me yet more grateful to their mother's memory, by letting me see what I owe to her forming their minds so carefully."

In that same home, to which her father removed seventy-four years ago, and in which she and her only surviving sister, Matilda, have lived from childhood, the eldest daughter, Emily, died on Saturday last in her eighty-seventh year.

To the education which the mother gave, the father added Greek and Latin and even some Hebrew, and a religious teaching which knew no theological or philosophical doubts or complications, but was of the clear old-fashioned type of Biblical Unitarianism. And amid all the social, educational, and other changes of the last sixty years the two surviving daughters, Miss Emily and Miss Matilda Sharpe, have lived on quietly in their old home carrying on the same sort of good work in which their father found his life and interest, Miss Matilda in the educational work of Channing House School, and Miss Emily in her lessons in New Testament Greek in the school, her biographical notes of Unitarian worthies, her little edition of the "Life of Faustus Socinus with English Translation," and her unflinching interest in the education of the ministry and in Unitarian congregations, new or old, and the generous support she gave to them.³ The church at Hastings owes its existence largely to her efforts. Highgate, Southend, Walthamstow, Stratford, and many others have been deeply indebted to her, and her generosity to the Home Missionary College, Manchester, was unflinching. It was again, her father's memory and the knowledge of the interest he took in Dr. Williams' Library and her sense of its value to students of theology and of the Bible that led her to make in the last few years of her life a generous gift quarter by quarter of the year in aid of the cost of preparing a new catalogue.

And amid all these activities and interests and underlying all her generosity there was a gentle, simple courtesy that seemed to belong to a past age. Her letters of business, or notes of social invitation—domestic invitation one might rather say—breathed the spirit of the eighteenth century: in their humble courtesy, that put to shame the easy-going style of the present day, and reminded one of a quieter and gentler age. She might have lived in Miss Austen's pages; or her character might have been sketched by the gentle sympathetic hand of Mrs. Gaskell.

The funeral took place on Tuesday, a short private service at the home in Highbury-place, conducted by the Rev. W. H. Rose; a service in Unity Church, Islington, at which the Rev. Tudor Jones officiated and paid in his address a tribute to Miss Sharpe's high qualities and many good works, and, finally, the closing service at the graveside in Abney Park Cemetery, when the last words of eternal faith and hope were spoken by the Rev. Alexander Gordon and the Rev. Francis Jones.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE following appeal to Sunday-school teachers has been issued by the Committee of the Sunday School Association. The appeal is accompanied by a circular dealing with War Emergency Arrangements for the coming winter:—

You have undertaken a share in the carrying on of religious education, and even in the midst of war this work must not stand still, for a child grows so quickly that what is missed at one stage cannot be made good at another.

In this trial your influence may be of the greatest service. It is for you to give your children and young people the moral and spiritual strength which they will sorely need, in order that our country may be brought safely through this coil of war. You may have many difficulties to overcome—distress, troubles, perhaps some want of attention among your scholars. Sometimes you may feel almost unable to give your whole mind to your lesson. Will you always remember that you are one of the "King's Teachers" called to do God's work in education, and try to be worthy of so great a responsibility!

We are sure you will keep it in mind that if you are not at your post, it means more work for others. Will you always prepare your lesson or other work beforehand. Teachers have the Sunday School Monthly to help them. Will you train yourself. Much can be done by asking or accepting advice from those who are qualified to give it. Demonstration lessons might be arranged. It is well to read up some book, for instance, Prof. Adams' "Primer on Teaching for Sunday School Work" (T. & T. Clark, Edinburgh, 6d. net). You may have more "play-time" than usual, and here is a useful way of filling it. In any case, who would say now "I have no time," when it is work for our country and our children?

We must maintain and improve religious education, but we must also be alive to the special demands of the time. We must keep the children out of the war. Their lives must not be saddened, and while you are with them, it is your duty to be cheerful, though your heart may be heavy enough. You can do much to make them happy and to take away their thoughts from war. You might play with the younger ones in school of an evening. You could read to them and interest them in books from a library. For after a full day's work at school, it is not wise to tire the brain or strain the nerves, especially of the younger children, just before bedtime. If your work lies with the older ones, particularly those who are out of work, you could encourage them to go to evening classes. If necessary, educational societies and classes might be started at the school for them. It is important to find them occupation, for home-duties and relief work will not fill all their time. Above all, try by your own courage to keep up theirs.

If some of your staff are away at the front I am sure you will close the ranks and do the work of two. Will you send a silent message to them daily and to all members and teachers of our schools and all the rest who are serving our country. Try to cheer those who watch for their return, and let your thoughts go out to all in danger or in trouble.

A message about relief work has already been sent to you; will you help where you can? You should notice whether your children are properly fed and clothed, and, if they are not, will you report to the superintendent, who should notify the Distress Committee. The great danger is hidden poverty and suffering, and you, as well as the day school teacher should be on the watch.

Whatever may come, have faith in yourself and in your children. Teach them already that if they are to have peace in their time, they must desire not the barren harvest of war, but the simple fruits of peace. Discourage idle talk and the spreading of stories which are probably untrue and merely cause hatred and bitterness. A burning hope and desire for the brotherhood of the nations must be implanted in the children, and the Sunday school must do it. Will you do your part?

Above all, believe with your whole heart that the power of God is in you, and in your children, to work out his plan with your help and theirs. Progress may be delayed by the blindness of men to the true values of life. But, if we make up our minds that it shall be so, nothing can hinder the onward movement to the perfect beauty of the world.

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM.

At a time when the National Anthem is often sung at public worship the following version which Archdeacon Wilberforce has provided for the use of his congregation at St. John's, Westminster, is worthy of attention:—

God save our gracious King;
Long live our noble King;
God save the King.
Send him victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us:
God save the King.

Thy choicest gifts in store
On him be pleased to pour;
Long may he reign.
May he defend our laws,
And ever give us cause
To sing with heart and voice
God save the King.

Lord, let war's tempest cease;
Fold the whole world in peace
Under Thy wings.
Make all the nations one,
All hearts beneath the sun,
Till Thou shalt reign alone,
Great King of Kings.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN LEAGUE. AUTUMN MEETINGS.

IN view of the general strain and stress of the war it has been deemed advisable to postpone the usual autumn meetings of the Liberal Christian League sine die. Meanwhile the Committee feels that members will welcome the message sent by their President, Dr. Drummond, of Oxford. It is as follows:—

"One of the principal objects of the Liberal Christian League is the promotion of international goodwill and 'peace on earth.' But the hopes of those who look forward to a true fraternity of peoples have, for the present, been rudely shattered by the sudden outburst of the most horrible mutual butchery of civilised races that has ever disfigured the sad blood-stained page of history. Whether this frightful war could have been prevented by a higher wisdom and deeper Christian principle on the part of our own people for many years past is not the question of the moment. It seems certain that the mass of our people had no wish for war, and that, as things stood, we were forced into it by considerations of honour and safety which are almost universally admitted as valid, and the nation has entered into it with a grave moral purpose and dignity as well as courage and resolution. A state of war, however, brings with it not only material loss and ruined homes, but serious moral dangers. It is difficult to read the daily papers without a feeling of vindictive anger that destroys the balance of the judgment, and makes us forgetful of the high Christian demands on our patience, and pity, and forgiveness. The war-demon may take possession of our own hearts, and drag the British Empire down to the level which we now so hotly condemn in the military government of Germany. The League appeals to its members, and to all Christian people to place themselves under the guidance of their professed religion, and, through prayer and faith, to draw from suffering a deeper spiritual life, and so to exert their influence that, when a settlement comes, it may be upon equitable and generous lines, and that the long and miserable reign of suspicion and hatred may finally yield to that of justice and goodwill."

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF LIBERAL CHRISTIAN WOMEN.

THE Union has been able, through the great kindness of its German representative, Fraulein Barth, of Frankfurt, to get into communication with a considerable number of English people stranded in Germany or Austria, among them being several men held as prisoners. It would greatly help the Union if their friends would kindly send word when the efforts on their behalf have proved successful. A post card is enough, addressed to the Secretary of the International Union, Essex Hall, Essex-street, W.C.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

London: Kilburn.—A social gathering was held on Monday, October 19, in Unity Hall, to welcome the Rev. F. Munford, the new minister of the Unitarian Church, and Mrs. Munford. Mr. Munford was formerly a Congregationalist, and assisted the Rev. G. T. Sadler, of Wimbledon, who, together with several members of his congregation, was present at the meeting. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie welcomed Mr. Munford on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and congratulated the members of the church on the fact that, after a period of difficulty, and at a time when it might almost seem as if religion had taken to itself wings and fled away, they were making a fresh start. Mr. Johnson added a few words on behalf of the Quex-road congregation, and the Rev. H.

Gow brought a cordial message from Rosslyn-hill, Hampstead, striking a deeper note as he referred to the national crisis, and the attitude which, in his opinion, a minister ought to take at such a time. Religion was going to count, and count tremendously as a result of this terrible war, in the new life and national relationships that would come into being when peace was established once more. They had no reason to be in despair, and it was not comfort that they wanted, though in a sense they were all in the position of mourners; but they needed now more than ever ministers who were ready to face the facts of life, and help their congregations to see and feel that behind these horrible forces of materialism there was a divine spirit which was real and living and triumphant. The Rev. G. T. Sadler spoke of the virtue of intellectual hesitancy as part of the equipment of the minister. They should not expect their pastor to have fixed and final ideas on every subject. So many things were in the melting pot, and some of their most cherished ideas were less surely held than they used to be. The intellect itself was not the final thing in religion. Its method was uncertain, and it could not teach the supreme ineffable truth. Mr. Sadler laid great stress on the value of the ministry of attendance. Those who went to church regularly ought to go with the idea of contributing something themselves to the service, and helping to keep up the spiritual atmosphere created there by every earnest and loving soul. Mr. Ronald P. Jones brought a message of goodwill from Essex Church, and, speaking as a representative of the laity, urged that the minister should not be allowed to immerse himself too much in institutional work, but that he should regard it as his chief duty to reserve enough time for meditation on the subjects to be brought before the congregation in his discourses Sunday by Sunday. Mr. Munford responded in suitable terms. The warmth of their welcome was, he said, a happy augury of the future prospects of the church.

London Sunday School Society.—The South-end Home has received a gift of a harmonium from Unity Church, Islington. New subscribers are greatly needed, and the Home, which is open all the year round, might be more fully occupied. Full particulars of terms, which are very low, may be had from Miss Amy Withall, 15, Highbury New Park, N.

London United Service.—The annual united service arranged by the London District Unitarian Society was held last Sunday evening. The minister and consistory of the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, E.C., again lent their noble building for the occasion. There was a very large congregation, the singing being led by a united choir of about 40 voices from different churches. Mr. T. F. Wood, organist of Unity Church, Islington, was responsible for the musical arrangements. The Rev. J. A. Pearson conducted the service, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, of Dublin.

Manchester: Failsworth.—Sunday School Anniversary services were conducted on Sunday last, morning and evening, by the minister (Rev. J. Morley Mills), and a Young People's service in the afternoon by Mr. L. W. Lewis, M.A., of Liverpool. In his evening sermon on "The Sunday School and the Present Crisis," the Minister explained the need in the future of the men and women who would understand and translate into life the higher principles of government, and individual liberty and progress, for which we were now contending. These were to come through the Sunday schools, and on Sunday school teachers lay the solemn responsibility of training the children who were to make a nation strong in health, and character, and spiritual power. If the Sunday schools proved unequal to the task to-day, the nation of to-morrow would be lacking in the qualities necessary to continue in the high position among the world-powers that had been gained at the immense sacrifice of blood and treasure now and in the past.

Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund.—The half-yearly meeting of the Board of Managers was held on the 14th inst. at Essex Hall, London, the Rev. Dr. Carpenter presiding. Mr. P. J. Winsor was elected a manager in place of Mr. John Lawson, resigned. It was reported that Mr. Cedric R. Boults' donation of £100, received last December and duly invested, had at his request been transferred to the Sustentation Fund, as it had been sent in mistake. A donation of £50 had been received from Mr. Blake, of South Petherton. Two new beneficiary members were elected under the ordinary insurance tables; an application for assistance towards special insurance was granted; and a conditional promise of a small annuity was made to one of the older ministers who may be obliged to retire from active service through ill health. The death of a young minister was recorded. In his case only one premium had been paid, and his representative received £250 by way of insurance.

Shrewsbury.—On Thursday, October 8, the new organ which has been placed in High-street Church, in memory of the late Rev. J. C. Street, for thirteen years its minister, was dedicated in the presence of a large congregation. The service in the afternoon was conducted by the minister, the Rev. William Stephens, the preacher being the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield. The organ was opened by Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. It has been built by Messrs. P. Conacher & Co., of Huddersfield, and bears a brass tablet stating that it is a memorial of the former minister, and paying an affectionate tribute to his warm sympathies and nobility of character. In the evening a public meeting was held, followed by an organ recital given by Mr. C. W. Perkins, the organist of the Town Hall and the University, Birmingham. Mr. W. Vickery presided, supported by Mr. Brunner, the Revs. C. J. Street, H. Enfield Dowson, H. Moncur Sime, and W. Stephens, Alderman Deakin, and Mr. R. Mansell. The Chairman, in the course of his address, said they had met there not only to witness the formal opening of the new organ—which, through the kindness and generosity of many friends, they had been able to place in the church—but also to pay a tribute of affection to the memory of their late pastor, to his great gifts, his nobility of character, and to the enduring example of his life. In the course of a long career, as varied in its interests and sympathies as it was distinguished in its achievements, Mr. Street's lovable personality and character fashioned a place for themselves in many hearts throughout Great Britain and Ireland. They were happy to think that that gathering was, in a large measure, representative of the diverse activities of Mr. Street's life, and the movements and changes with which he was in many cases prominently associated. His ministry among them was conspicuous for the work that he did, with the loyal co-operation of its members, for the restoration and alteration of the interior of the church. That scheme had been carried out, and the installation of the new organ was the fulfilment of Mr. Street's desire to complete the work by erecting a new instrument in place of the one formerly in use. Mr. Brunner, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, the Rev. C. J. Street, and the Rev. W. Stephens delivered brief addresses. On Sunday, October 11, the 223rd anniversary of the church was celebrated, the preacher being the Rev. J. Ewart, of Stourbridge.

Southern Advisory Committee.—The Rev. F. Munford, B.A., has satisfied the Southern Advisory Committee as to his personal character and general fitness for ministerial work.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE IMPROVEMENT OF WATERWAYS.

The question of the improvement of waterways, with all the discussion of financial details, Acts of Parliament, and the economic value of inland navigation which it involves, may have little attraction at first sight for the general reader, but when it is shown to be intimately related to the progress of the garden city movement and the general welfare of the community, it becomes a matter of deep interest. Mr. J. S. Nettlefold, who in "Practical Town Planning" set forth certain methods for protecting the public health and the public purse against the power of vested interests, pleads in his new book, "Garden Cities and Canals" (The St. Catherine Press, 1s. net), that a forward policy in waterway reform would work in the same direction. In the olden days, as he points out, "towns grew up on river banks because of the cheap and easy means of communication afforded by the river, and this is to-day still the case in uncivilised countries. In more civilised countries, such as France, Germany, and Belgium, but not in England or Spain, the process is reversed; canals are brought to the towns, because it is found by experience that in spite of all the inventions that have been made water carriage is still, and is likely to remain, better suited for certain classes of merchandise than any other form of transit."

* * *

For many reasons the British canals have not been a success, but it must be remembered that, with the exception of the Manchester Ship Canal, few improvements and no large extensions of English waterways have been made for over eighty years. Many canals have been allowed to fall into decay during that period, and in the meantime enormous sums have been spent on railways. But with the increase of trade and the demand for more accommodation for traffic, which the railways will be unable to meet unless they are prepared to go on spending very large sums of money on their extension, the necessity for opening up new means of cheap transit becomes urgent. From the trader's point of view water transit is unquestionably the best for many sorts of goods, and Mr. Nettlefold gives some cogent reasons—from which the prospect of added beauty to the landscape which water always gives is not excluded—why inland waterway reform should be regarded as "a question of first-rate economic importance well worth the most careful attention of any government."

The Report of the Royal Commission on Canals and Inland Navigation, 1909, deals forcibly with the question of the development of facilities for the distribution of trade, and a passage quoted by Mr. Nettlefold ends with these words: "For social and sanitary reasons the distribution of industrial populations over wide areas is to be preferred to concentration in a few crowded districts. Relative superiority in the physique and morals of its workers is an advantage to a nation. If industries are widely distributed the workers can have better houses at lower rents, can breathe less vitiated air, and they and their families can in many cases combine with factory work the healthy and profitable occupation of small agricultural production. These advantages will be lost if by reason of the continued costliness of internal transport British staple trades are driven to mass themselves around a few seaports."

CONCILIATION IN AMERICA.

The Executive Committee of the Association for International Conciliation has printed in pamphlet form a batch of official documents bearing upon the war—the Austro-Hungarian Note to Servia, the Servian reply, the British White Paper and the German White Book. This is in pursuance of their main object, which is to arouse the interest of the American people in the progress of the movement for promoting international peace and relations of comity and good fellowship between nations. They have already printed and circulated many valuable documents giving information as to the progress or interruption of these movements for the benefit of individual citizens, the newspaper press, and organisations of various kinds, which thus have at hand reliable information on the subjects. President Wilson's appeal for impartiality and restraint in discussing the war is printed as a preface to this latest publication.

PICTURES FOR THE BIRMINGHAM ART GALLERY.

At a meeting of the Birmingham City Council on Tuesday a letter was read from Mr. Austen Chamberlain offering on behalf of himself and his brother, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, two pictures by Albert Moore, entitled "Canaries" and "Sapphires." The pictures, the letter stated, "were acquired by my father many years ago, and since then have formed part of his collection at Highbury. If our offer is accepted we should give them in memory of him to the Art Gallery, where he is already represented by the gifts which he made in his own lifetime." The offer was accepted with thanks.

THE SALVATION ARMY AND THE WAR.

Captain Webb, of the headquarters staff of the Salvation Army, told a press representative this week that they had sent 10,000 men to the colours. In addition, Salvationists, both men and women, are assisting in a thousand ways in every belligerent country. Sometimes, in little lonely places, when soldiers have to stop by the wayside, a Salvation officer will unexpectedly meet them and offer them hot coffee and food, irrespective entirely of nationality. The Salvation Army Hall in Berlin has been turned into a crèche for children whose mothers have to go out to work because their husbands are fighting, and the cost is being defrayed to a large extent by a Jew. "We go where we are needed," said Captain Webb. "The greatest grief to our general is that we have men fighting against each other in all the armies engaged."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is a fortunate coincidence that All Saints' Day falls this year on a Sunday, for it will come to many hearts with a new intensity of meaning. There is no festival in the Christian calendar which should make a more powerful appeal to the modern mind, for it can gather into itself all that is great and good in the long procession of the ages, while it recalls in a special way the elect souls, men and women great in holiness and peace, whose names shine like stars above our troubled world. And this year, linked with the memory of the saints, there will be the thought in our hearts of many brave young lives, who have suffered and died in devotion to their country's cause, looking for no reward because such was the will of God concerning them.

LIKE Easter Day, All Saints' is a festival of immortality, and in the midst of the sufferings of this present time it renews our confidence in the things which are unseen and eternal. To those whose hope is confined to some dream of progress, and fruitful happiness on this earth is the sum of God's thought concerning us, the terrible holocaust of human lives on the fields of Belgium and France may well seem a loss without repair, but for the Christian heart behind the tragic mystery there is the confidence that all souls are safe in the Divine keeping, and that those who fall in earthly battles shall find the fulfilment of their powers in the heavenly kingdom. In years of peace, when we were rich in the fruits of industry and confident in our own power to organise happiness for the world, the hope of immortality died down in many hearts. But now, in the midst of trouble, when once again we are conscious of the shortness and uncertainty of life, it is being restored to us with gladness and power. The services on All Saints' Day should not be acts of commemoration in a minor key, but the offering of jubilant thanksgiving. We have looked once again into the face of consecrated death, but we have also learned how to triumph in God. "Great and marvellous are Thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints."

A GOOD deal of feeling has been aroused in some quarters by the swift and stern measures taken by the Government against alien enemies of a military age. As we explained last week, we are not prepared to criticise the wisdom of their action, for we do not suspect strong men of wide experience, of acting in a panic. There are many considerations which may well have made it the only prudent course for those who are responsible for public order and the safety of the realm. At the same time, we hope that the measures of restraint which have been adopted will not be unduly irksome, and that generous consideration will be shown to women and children who have suddenly lost their means of support. The fact that we allowed these men to live amongst us, to form homes and to contract various social obligations, imposes duties upon the community which cannot be abrogated even in time of war. Moreover, the public must not be allowed to forget that "alien enemy" is a technical phrase, which does not annul either the common claims of humanity or the closer ties of friendship.

THE Rev. J. H. Rushbrooke, who has been detained in Germany since the beginning of the war, returned to London this week. Suspected at first of being a Russian spy he was treated with some rigour, but afterwards he was permitted to reside in Berlin with his wife without molestation. In an article describing his experiences, which appeared in the Daily News and Leader on Tuesday, Mr. Rushbrooke raises the question whether some generous and far-reaching scheme for the exchange of all civil prisoners is not possible. Undoubtedly the feeling of irritation and resentment against the unfortunate foreigner is growing in both countries, and lurid newspaper paragraphs fan the flame and make one side eager for reprisals against the reported severities of the other. Mr. Rushbrooke reports that on the whole food in Berlin has been abundant and cheap, though the tendency is upward, and undoubtedly there is anxiety. As to the attitude of the German people to the war, "it is one of startling and absolute unanimity; at least the unanimity is startling until one realises the marvellous skill with which every organ of opinion or expression has been captured and used or suppressed by the Government. Scarcely even yet among the most influential and well-informed classes are the contents of the English White Paper known. The Press is of course unanimous for the war, though the practical unanimity rests on very varied grounds."

* * *

PERHAPS the most revealing passage in Mr. Rushbrooke's article is his description of the moral indifference to the crime against Belgium, which is characteristic alike of private feeling and public opinion in Germany; though there are not wanting signs of an uneasy state of mind which dares not look the thing in the face lest they should be forced to condemn themselves. "What has most of all pained me," Mr. Rushbrooke writes, "is the practically complete absence of any sense of the real character of the wrong done to Belgium. It is peculiarly painful to find that leading theologians have even gone the length of blaming the Imperial Chancellor for his admission that the inroad involved 'a certain degree of wrong.' The fashion in which, after the terrible injury done to a feeble country, newspapers and public men have raked for any vestige of evidence to justify it is discreditable to the entire people. In this matter, more than in any other, my faith in the ethical soundness of Germany's public men has received a severe blow. Anyone who knows the degree of admiration which I possess for German achievement in many realms and the deep attachment I have cherished for the land and people will understand the shock which this attitude has brought. Above all was it more than painful to read and hear day by day the stock phrase, 'Unsere gute gerechte Sache' ('Our good and righteous cause'), and in connection with this to think on Belgium. One cannot but believe that the efforts of almost the whole Press to direct against England a stream of passionate hatred is not unconnected with a certain discomfort of conscience in connection with the particular issue which brought England into the war."

* * *

We are glad to see that the problem of the Public House and the War is at last receiving serious attention in high quarters. Last Saturday Lord Kitchener, whose strong belief in the virtue of severe self-control is well known, issued an appeal to the following effect:—

The men who have recently joined the Colours are doing their utmost to prepare themselves for active service with the least possible delay. This result can only be achieved if by hard work and strict sobriety they keep themselves thoroughly fit and healthy.

Lord Kitchener appeals to the public, both men and women, to help the soldiers in their task. He begs every one to avoid treating the men to drink, and to give them every assistance in resisting the temptations which are often placed before them.

Lord Kitchener suggests that in the neighbourhoods where soldiers are stationed committees should be formed to educate public opinion on this subject, and bring home its importance to those who prevent our soldiers from being able to do their duty to their country in a thoroughly efficient manner.

This appeal is a plain hint to managers of public-houses to adopt the policy of refusing to serve men in uniform. If good advice does not produce the desired result there must be compulsion. But, as we have pointed out already, the civilian population also needs to be protected from the terrible seduction of intoxicants at a time of public excitement and severe nervous strain. Habits may be easily contracted now which will blight the homes of the people for many years to come.

* * *

COMMENTING on Lord Kitchener's words of advice, the Archbishop of Canterbury makes a suggestion of abstinence during the war as one way in which those who are not already total abstainers can help to carry their share of the national burden.

Every one of us wants to help, he says, and in some way or other to "spend and be spent." Lord Kitchener's appeal seems to give a special opportunity. If those who can rightly do so, and who care sufficiently to make what would be a real and sustained act of self-denial, were to undertake to be themselves "abstainers" during the continuance of the war, the resultant good might be such as to surprise us all. Other countries are doing something like it. Why not we? It is not everyone who can, or perhaps ought to, do it, and it would be the merest impertinence were we to censure or even to criticise those who prefer to stand outside such an effort and to let their own free-will offering be some act of another kind. But I believe that there are many who, when they have thought it over, would like to take the course I suggest.

AMID our solicitude for the famishing and homeless Belgian refugees, the Senate of the University of Manchester has been happily inspired to pay a tribute of respectful admiration to the University of Louvain in its exile; for our hospitality must include a generous welcome on equal terms to the gifts of mind and spirit, which more than armies make a nation great. How apt the address is alike in historical reminiscence and in a kindling sense of the spiritual significance of the present conflict the following passage will show:—

As we stand to-day side by side in the midst of the struggle, we honour you as the noblest of Allies, and bid you take courage; for, like Achilles, we are

Striving for no paltry prize,
No crown of strength or runners'
vaunt of speed,
But for a life,

the life of civilisation, to defend the very soul of humanity from a deadly creed, proper only to creatures of prey but linked with the vast and evil dream of universal dominion. This creed has so blinded the rulers of the Germany which we once knew as the home of a civilised people, a people to whom we looked as the friend and pattern of learning, that they now count it lawful, or even glorious, to break treaties, to condemn the laws of warfare, to burn churches and libraries, and, as their official records day by day announce, to destroy women and children and aged men by throwing bombs on undefended cities.

No wonder that the first and chief victim of their cruelty was the home of learning from which the great Lipsius first interpreted to the Western world the writings of Tacitus, that undying foe of despots; and where in our day Willems has brilliantly expounded the principles of Roman Public Law. On that Roman system rests the whole framework of modern International Law, which it is now the world's first duty to strengthen, and we count upon your aid in the task of devising new and weightier sanctions for its statutes, based on the willing pledges of civilised peoples. This law we will print so deeply upon the minds of our conquered enemies that it shall constrain them to learn that noble fashion which Virgil prophesied, and which they have put far from them—"the fashion of peace."

THE following story of our Indian troops has been sent to us by a correspondent. "It came in a letter from India. The writer was seeing off some of the Indians he knew, big men among them, and, of course, wishing them God speed, and safe home, &c. 'Oh, no,' was the answer, 'we are not coming back. We, and as many more to follow as are wanted, are going to fight our best for England and for Freedom, but we shall not come back.' The Englishman repeated his hopes. 'No, perhaps a couple of hundred may, but not likely. We are going to fight for Freedom—no talk of coming back.' Our correspondent adds:—"Though there may be some Oriental fatalism in it, there is also such devotion to a cause. They believe their children—all Indians are married—have a better chance of freedom with us than with anyone, and are giving their lives to secure that heritage to them. But it made me realise so overpoweringly what our responsibility will be to make sure these men do not die in vain, and to see that their children do get their heritage."

ANOTHER side-light upon the nobler aspect of the war is contained in a letter written by a Frenchman, which has found its way into the Manchester Guardian. It comes from a man who has seen some of the horror of devastation in Northern France and may be taken as representative of the spirit which animates many civilians at the present time.

At bottom, he writes, I am of my mother's way of thinking. I have a boundless trust in Providence. Whatever may be in store for us, I feel that this trial cannot but turn to our advantage. Ours is a just cause. Right is unquestionably on our side, and so are "sweetness and light," to use Matthew Arnold's words. I am convinced that we shall conquer. And should the worst come to the worst, I think that even then we ought not to despair. The survivors would quietly set about cultivating in the rising generations all the fine qualities that have made France a great nation in the past and cannot fail to make it great in a near or distant future. Let us only take care to avoid the failings that have contributed to bring on us this terrible scourge. We had grown too skilful in evading the sterner realities of life. No more elegant trifling for us. Let us think more of our duties and less of our rights.

There is the unquenchable idealism of a nation that cannot be conquered in these modest words.

HUMILITY AND PATRIOTISM.

IN a letter on "Humility and Patriotism" which we publish to-day an esteemed correspondent takes us to task for some of the sentiments which we expressed last week. Evidently he feels that patriotism as a motive is of very doubtful value, and that even in the high sense in which we used the word it is a serious menace to true humility of heart. We welcome his criticism, both for the courtesy with which he recognises the sincerity and earnestness with which we are trying to grapple with the difficulties which are presented to the Christian conscience by the actual facts of the war, and for the opportunity which it gives us of some further words of explanation. May we be allowed to point out, in the first place, that in singling out our love of our country for emphasis we were not concerned in the least with any abstract scale of relative values. We were dealing with an urgent practical need, and the best way of meeting it. We feel the supreme importance of keeping our national loyalties on the highest possible level of honour and mercy and justice. We doubt whether we can do this in a more effective way for the great masses of our people than by making a strong appeal to them to be worthy in all things of the ideal of their country which they carry in their hearts, as the home of freedom and the mother of justice. That is what we mean by patriotism, and the meaning is neither new nor strange. To us who have been trained from our youth up in the school of MAZZINI, it is one of the holiest words in the language. It has acted as a beacon-light to us in the application of spiritual principles to political thought. Like Worship, it is a word which has been tarnished by ignoble use; but we cannot cease to call Divine love and goodness worshipful, because some men in their blindness bow down to the things which their own hands have made. The need of the hour is not humiliation and a general confession of unworthiness, as though upon this issue we had not made up our minds at the bar of conscience, but strength to serve the good cause and to bring it to victory; and we can meet this need best, as religious men, when we appeal to warm, intimate, human affections. The inspired patriot is often the humblest of men, because he is conscious of a divine call to help his country's cause for the good of the world.

This brings us at once to the centre of our argument. Patriotism, we are told, is dangerous because it lifts men up in pride. Patriotism, we reply, may be a well-spring of humility, when it makes men conscious that they are enlisted in the service of God. In the Christian character there are two sources of humility. There is the humility of conscious sin—"Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord"; and there is the humility of privilege—"Who is sufficient for these things?" It is very easy to fall into the mistake of thinking that a mood of abjectness or impotence is the one which human nature in its blind folly ought to adopt. When we read the article in the Times Literary Supplement on "The Illusions of War," to which our correspondent refers, we could not resist the conclusion that the balance of the writer's mind inclined towards this error. In its pervading sense of human weakness and delusion, in its subtle effort to create a mood in which all judgments of conscience are subordinated to the claims of pity, in the sad abasement of its view of the world as "our foolish little planet," it reminded us, not of the New Testament, but of the delicate intellectual pessimism of MATTHEW ARNOLD's poetry. We seemed for a moment to recapture the half-forgotten strain:—

Ah, love, let us be true
To one another! for the world, which seems
To lie before us like a land of dreams,
So various, so beautiful, so new,
Hath really neither joy, nor love, nor light,
Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain;
And we are here as on a darkling plain Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight,
Where ignorant armies clash at night.

Probably most of us know something of this mood of disenchantment, and of the hard effort to be kind as we realise that all men are the deluded victims of misfortune. "What shadows we are and what shadows we pursue." What is left to us for consolation but the virtue of humility and the sad commerce of pity? We are far from denying that there is something admirable in this temper, especially when it is placed in sharp contrast to harsh pride or vulgar boasting. But it strikes us as more Pagan than Christian. In exalting resignation or acquiescence into a lonely virtue it saps the foundations of moral courage and obscures the piercing insight of conscience. This is what marks it off decisively from the Christian consciousness of sin, to which on the surface it has such a close resemblance. The Christian knows that he is an unworthy servant, and this knowledge makes him contrite and humble; but though unworthy he is still a servant of the heavenly Will, and herein lies the ineffaceable dignity of his nature. His life is a life of action, which involves him in swift decisions of duty. He does not find wisdom and peace in a knowledge of his own follies, but through doing the will of God. For the Christian, the humility which springs from our conscious partnership in blindness and sin, which may so easily enervate and cripple us, is conquered by the knowledge that in spite of all we are fellow-workers with God. And then humility assumes a new and finer meaning. It is no longer resignation or acquiescence, as we wander through the inscrutable darkness of the world and the tangled mazes of our own hearts; it is the glad acceptance of our vocation to fight the good fight of the faith, not in our own strength, but in the light which shines through conscience, and the divine grace which alone enables us to be strong and of a good courage.

Let us apply this doctrine of humility, which springs out of a strong conviction that we are sent into the world to do the will of God, to the matter in hand. We are told that our love of our country is a proud and uplifting thing, and that to appeal to it will encourage evil pride in other men. Is that really so? What if our patriotism has in it some sense of divine vocation? To thoughtful and earnest men it can never be a thoughtless and vulgar thing. They recognise in it a precious trust which God has placed in their keeping for the good of the world. Our country has been called—a simpler and more religious age would have said that God has chosen it—to defend liberty, to uphold international law, to offer an asylum to the outraged but unconquered people of Belgium, and to maintain its own cause, because its cause is good. Does this belief in our country's call, and the sense that we are part of it, make us boastful and vain-glorious, false to our friends and ungenerous to our foes? Nay, rather it is a true source of humility and a safeguard for all other virtues. Now as always we must find moral security not in warnings and prohibitions, but in positive affections. It is not the sense of our sad partnership in the delusion and evil of the world, but the confident faith that here and now, in this very crisis of our country's need, we are fellow-workers with God, which will give us courage and insight and true humility of heart. The duty which is laid upon us both as Christians and as patriots is to remember the high dignity of our vocation, and then to strive to walk worthily of it with all lowliness of mind.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

AFTER this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; and cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb. . . . These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple; and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.

Revelation vii.

THE COMMUNION OF SAINTS.

OUR worship here . . . unites us by a chain of closest sympathy with past generations. In our helps to faith and devotion in this place, we avail ourselves of the thought and piety of many extinct ages. We reverently read those ancient scriptures, which have gathered around them the trust, and procured the heartfelt repose, of so many tribes and periods, since prophets and apostles first gave them forth. We sing the hymns which a goodly company of pious men have left as the record of their communion with heaven. And it is impossible to look at the consecrated names of those sweet singers of Christendom without feeling ennobled by their communion, and even astonished at our sympathy with them. Do not we, the living, take up, in adoration and prayer, the thoughts of the dead, and feel them divinely true? Do they not come forth, as if fresh coined from our own hearts? Indeed, could we ourselves so faithfully utter the consciousness of our inner being, or shape so interpreting a voice for our secret life? What an impressive testimony this to the sameness of our nature through every age, and the immortal perseverance of its holier affections! The language of their confessions, their struggles, their desires, speaks our own: the light that gladdened them, shines now upon our hearts: and the mists they could not penetrate, brood now upon our path. There is the choice minstrel of Israel, true alike to the spirit of mourning or of joy; there are the venerable fathers of the ancient Church, whose vespers, chanted centuries ago, will suit this night as well; there is the adamant yet genial Luther, telling, with the severity of an eye-witness, the awfulness of judgment; there is the noble Milton, breathing his sweet and rugged music out of darkness; there is the afflicted Cowper, sending out the tenderest strains from his benighted spirit: with an attendant multitude of the faithful—the confessor, the exile, the missionary—a chorus of sublime voices, with which it is a sacred privilege to be in harmony. And these are not merely the accents of the past, but the anthem of the sainted dead—the strains of immortals that look back upon their toils, and behold us singing their songs of sadness here, while they have already learned the melodies of everlasting joy. Blessed communion of earth with Heaven! making us truly one family, below, above; and rendering us fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the very household of God!

JAMES MARTINEAU.

ALL SAINTS.

ONE feast, of holy days the crest,

I, though no churchman, love to keep;
All Saints—the unknown good that rest

In God's still memory folded deep.

The bravely dumb that did their deed,

And scorned to blot it with a name,

Men of the plain heroic breed,

That loved Heaven's silence more than fame.

Such lived not in the past alone,

But thread to-day the unheeding street,

And stairs to Sin and Famine known

Sing with the welcome of their feet;

The den they enter grows a shrine,

The grimy sash an oriel burns,

Their cup of water warms like wine,

Their speech is filled from heavenly urns.

About their brows to me appears
An aureole traced in tenderest light,
The rainbow-gleam of smiles through tears
In dying eyes by them made bright,
Of souls that shivered on the edge
Of that chill ford repassed no more,
And in their mercy felt the pledge
And sweetness of the further shore.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

A PRAYER FOR ALL SAINTS' DAY.

(From Private Devotions, 1560.)

ALMIGHTY God, we do offer unto thee most high praise, and hearty thanks for all thy wonderful graces and virtues which thou hast manifested in all thy saints, and in all other holy persons upon earth, who by their lives and labours have shined forth as lights in the several generations of the world; such as were the holy prophets, apostles, and martyrs, whom we remember with honour, and commemorate with joy; and for whom, as also for all other thy happy servants, our fathers and brethren, who have departed this life with the seal of faith, we praise and magnify thy holy Name; most humbly desiring that we may still continue in their holy communion, and enjoy the comfort thereof, following, with a glad will and mind, their holy examples of godly living, and steadfastness in thy faith. Amen.

THE DRUM AT DRUMHAIR.

WHEN you see this quiet little Leitrim village, with its one steep street, set amid surroundings of almost magic beauty, you begin to understand why Yeats' "Man who dreamed of faeryland" stood amid the crowd at Drumhair, "His heart hung all upon a silken dress"; though, truth to tell, we saw no throng of folk there; mainly humankind was represented to our eyes by little children, and they were for the most part barefoot—smiling, too. There came pattering by three small maidens, hand-in-hand. The eldest, a mature seven-year-old, lifts her fair, lovely face, and with an evident struggle between shyness and "manners," explains that the baby of the party, aged two, wears the only shoes and stockings among them, "because she's the littlest, Miss."

And the baby, solemn with the importance of her position as purse-bearer, opens a pearly palm to disclose a half-penny, wherewith sweets are to be bought. It is to be hoped that no serious demoralisation results in such cases from a small subsidy towards these small joys; but, indeed, so sweet, so peaceful is the scene, that it is not easy to realise any wrongdoing or unhappiness there.

The sunshine fell soft on the sparkling brown waters of the Bonet river. Across it, on gently rising ground, are the ruins of an ancient abbey. Within easy distance lies Lough Gill, with its myriad islets and enchanting shores; hills whose beauty changes with the rapidly changing light and clouds. Suddenly there breaks upon the smiling stillness the sound of stirring fife and drum. The Irish Volunteers, of course! Ah no! it is explained, "it's only the Children's Band! The Boys of Breffny, they call themselves; used to be amusing themselves of an evening with tin whistles, till a man began teaching them, got them the instruments, too, and . . ."

And down the hilly street they came, about thirty boys, playing as they marched, and led by their teacher. He lined them up in front of the hotel; and it was good to hear them; to observe the energy of the small drummer, the serious air of the child with cymbals, possibly six years old. Before one could do more than feel after small change, the leader gave the word, and they swung off again, happy and very important. It was a relief to find these warlike sounds proceeded from a source so innocent, with purpose altogether so admirable.

Breffny? At the head of the street grim ruins are standing—all that remain of a stronghold of the O'Ruarke of Breffny, who once ruled this country-side. But the gaunt walls are veiled in ivy now; and the valley that "lay smiling before" that Prince smiles still. Its walls are long deserted; close by are modern, comfortable residences, where as often as not no one even dreams of locking doors at night.

And all around are places whose names suggest old, strange, half-legendary stories. Most of them are connected with fighting. The Plain of Moytura is just beyond Benbulbin, where the terrible battle was fought in pre-historic days between the Fírbolgs and Danaans, testimony to the reality of which exists in the almost unequalled number and importance of cairns and burial stones that cover the place.

Upon the summit of Knock-na-Rea is plainly visible the mound erected, it is said, over Queen Maeve of Connaught, "angry and pale-faced," who led forth her hosts herself to give battle. And if you remark upon the extreme, the dazzling green of certain pasture fields, you may be told that "there was fighting there once, and men's blood was shed, and so . . ." But you look around and drink in the satisfying beauty of the place, with its woods and streams, its glens and hills which seem just luminous masses of ineffable blue, unearthly and remote; and you think—these stories of fighting and wild rage, of robbery and oppression of the poor and the feeble, of tyranny and injustice, belong to an order of things long past and gone. We are different; we have gone very far onward since these things were, these old, unhappy things. Our lives are protected, well-ordered. We believe that Justice and Mercy were met together, and would never part, never be dethroned from amid civilised nations; we thanked God (or should have done so) that our lives had been appointed so far from those dreadful days of strife and brutality. We felt very secure, very far from evil, that first day of August . . . and since then . . .

Well, God's in His world still; even though the foundations thereof are out of courses, to our eyes.

A WORD OF PEACE IN TIME OF WAR.

[FROM A GERMAN CORRESPONDENT.]

To speak of peace at a time when the whole world's chief point of interest is the development of the "Big War" seems to be a hopeless enterprise, especially when such words emanate from the pen of a civilian of that nation which is being credited with having given rise to all these calamities. Nevertheless, I hope that my well-meant words will reach my readers' hearts. I am not going to advocate a stoppage of the present hostilities; I am not going to criticise anything in connection with the great struggle of the nations—I am going to speak of that Great Universal Peace which has been mankind's most cherished dream for centuries, and the realisation of which is, I hope, nearer at hand now than it may appear. Perhaps when the star of this deplorable war suffers eclipse the dawn of a new era of brotherhood will break. Whatever weapons man may invent and use to subdue his foes, they cut both ways; they hurt while hurting, kill while killing, destroy while destroying. Hatred engenders new hatred; attack is followed by counter-attack; but there is one method of dealing with an enemy which disarms him without disadvantage to either defender or aggressor—a method known for 2,000 years and nevertheless so very seldom made use of—the method preached by the Great Prophet of Nazareth, the Prince of Peace, who taught: "Love your enemy"—words of far greater significance than is generally understood. More than the negative recommendation of non-resistance to evil, they imply the positive attitude to be taken when face to face with an aggressor. This attitude is love. As soon as we are able to realise that also in our greatest enemy there is a spark of that Divine Spirit which as the life-giving principle permeates the whole creation, as soon as we on such consideration succeed in overcoming our hatred for the wrong which has been done, or was intended to be done to us—as soon as the realisation of our brotherhood with our presupposed enemy awakens the flame of love in our hearts, we become absolutely invincible.

Have you never observed the sudden change in your opponent's attitude when you, with serene calmness and unaffected friendliness, tender him your hand for peace? His rage is at once abated; you will see him amazed, perplexed, confused; he is at your mercy—at the mercy of love. There is no greater victory than such a victory, no conquest which ensures a more solid and lasting peace than a conquest through love. The weapons of love are the most powerful, and they do not hurt.

I am quite aware of the difficulty in finding and realising the spark of the Divine Spirit in an adversary, especially when the minds on both sides are excited and the eyes are blinded by hatred and rage; but it is there, the Divine Spark—it is everywhere in the whole universe, even in the hearts of our vilest enemy.

Therefore let our armies fight in the field until peace can be obtained with honour for both parties. It is as useless as undesirable to intervene after the fighting has started. But let us civilians who are not directly involved in the great struggle keep our heads cool and remember, before all, that we are brethren of the same Teutonic race which is destined to lead humanity to the realisation of that spiritual brotherhood where war and hatred have no place.

Thus, though we fight in the field, as it cannot be stopped, let us keep burning in our hearts the flame of Divine Love, and make preparations for that great peace which will follow when the fight is over, and, whatsoever the issue may be, will tend to tie the people of different nationality closer together than ever before has been the case in history.

HUMILITY AND PATRIOTISM.

SIR,—Just now all sensible people are rightly impatient of anything in the nature of mere academic discussion; it is felt that, in face of the great life and death realities which the present world-crisis involves, the guesses of the pure theorist, and even the admittedly definite problems arising out of ordinary political and social experience, are to be ignored as of no account. But, while we lay such stress upon the actualities of the moment, and desire chiefly a clearness of perception which will enable us to yield our full measure of true and fitting service, we cannot, if we are to remain genuine human beings, escape the duty of asking—each one for himself or herself: what are the principles which lie behind all my actions and words in this war period? That earnest folk are putting this question to themselves is very strikingly illustrated by the appearance, within the last few days, of two journalistic expositions of principle. I allude to the article entitled "The Illusions of War," which appeared in The Times Literary Supplement of October 22, and to the article entitled "Worthy of our Country," which appeared in The Inquirer of October 24. Both these articles are written in a manner that will arrest the attention of any intelligent reader, and both are unmistakably the outcome of much careful and honest thinking. Moreover, the two articles exhibit, in their different ways, a generous recognition of man's spiritual and religious needs.

Now it is extremely interesting to observe the widely divergent teachings presented in the above-named articles. The emphasis of the one is upon Humility—a sense of our own and of general human failure—as constituting for us Englishmen the all-important characteristic in this crisis; the other emphasises the supremacy of Patriotism, giving to the word something like a re-interpretation. With a view to the clearer understanding of the teachings thus briefly outlined, it may be well at this point to set down two lengthy quotations:—

"Pride makes comparisons with other men or other nations—we will not behave as they do because we are Englishmen—but humility compares us with what we should like to be; it never flatters us to make us good. If now we are to set a standard of behaviour before ourselves, let us imagine the historian of a distant and happier future looking back upon us with full knowledge and judging our conduct and our temper in this time. We should wish him to say of us that we waged war not only resolutely and successfully, but with a spirit new to the world; and that, because of that spirit, there came a new kindness and wisdom after the world-wide calamity. Of that judgment our remote descendants might well be proud, but we can deserve it not by pride but only by humility. In every age, if men are to advance, there is a harder task set to their spirits; but if they are filled with pride in their own past they do not see the hard task that is set to them; and they perform it only if there is a possibility in themselves that makes them humble. The whole world, and we with it, is falling very far short of that possibility now; and a god without pity might smile at the prayers of each conflicting nation for its own victory, and at the assurance of each, amid the general ruin, that it was fighting for the future of mankind. But if we all could pray to God that He would have mercy upon our foolish little planet, there would be some chance of an answer to the prayer, and that we should have mercy upon each other. The way to wisdom and peace is not through contempt of others' follies, but through a knowledge of our own."—The Times Literary Supplement (October 22).

"Religion must throw all its strength upon the side of generous feeling and self-control. It must never relinquish its aim of peace-making when men are sharply divided in feeling and opinion. How can it do this most effectively at the present moment? Not, we venture to think, by any fervent outpouring of cosmopolitan sentiment, if for no other reason because few people will stay to listen to it. The idealism which has captured men's hearts is an intensely practical love of their own country. To that we can appeal. They want to be worthy of their country and its cause. Religion can teach them in what this worthiness consists, and in solemn warning how easily it may be profaned. Riotous behaviour, the lust of cruelty and revenge, enervating bitterness of mind, the hatred which grows reckless of justice and truthfulness, acts of disloyalty to universal charity, all these are unpatriotic, because they stain our country's fair name and defile the bright image which we treasure in our hearts. Along these lines religion may find a new entrance into lives which have long been indifferent to its influence. If it has the practical wisdom to fix its whole force and attention upon the affections which are brightest and purest at the moment, it may turn even our base temptations to glorious use. When we have learned to behave ourselves worthily of our country proper respect for our enemies and many other difficult things will be added unto us."—The Inquirer (October 24).

I think that, with the above extracts before him, a reader should be able to form a very fair notion of the respective standpoints adopted. Such pleadings, devoid as they are of all pettiness of tone, are entitled to respectful consideration, and I shall endeavour, in a few words, to state the reasons for my own judgment in regard to them.

And, first of all, it seems to me necessary, while noting THE INQUIRER writer's own account of what is implied in the phrase, "Love of one's country," to get, if possible, at the simple meaning which those words convey to the average man. Turning to my dictionary, I find the following definition of Patriotism: "Love of country—Desire to serve one's country." Now, amongst the members of this or any other country, we see illustrated many degrees and types of love and of service; there is the man who is led by an almost blind, instinctive feeling of material proximity, and there is the man whose love and service are based upon a spiritual vision of what his country may yet become—a vision which is largely coincident with the religious mystic's vision of the "City of God." It is safe to assume that the average man's patriotism cannot be so definitely or clearly conceived as either of the extreme types above specified; his experience will incline him now to the instinctive material type, now to the idealistic.

Having glanced at these varying types of the patriotic disposition, we can now return to consider the pleas set forth in THE INQUIRER article; and, in the light of what has just been said, there can scarcely be any doubt as to the particular type of Patriotism therein exemplified. The claims for "love of country" as a fundamental motive cannot be more forcibly urged than they are in the said article. What, then, is the essential point of its argument? It would appear to be this: that Religion—working through the popular channel of Patriotism—can show men how best to "serve their country" and to be worthy of it; and that, under the influence of this religious instruction, men are even to be led into the realisation that "acts of disloyalty to universal charity" are "unpatriotic." Do not these words really mean that only in so far as a country's general aim and policy conform to a universal or world-wide ethical standard, can such a country be rightly taken as furnishing the ideal motive which is to sway a good man's life? In that case, a high-minded man's position in regard to his country may be likened to that of the lover in regard to his mistress: "I could not love thee, dear, so much, loved I not honour more." And is not this to imply that Patriotism—however natural, valuable, and noble in its degree—can never properly be raised to the level of a religious (i.e., universal idealistic) motive? If patriotism thus fails as a religious motive in the fullest and deepest sense, how can the attitude of the patriot be regarded as the supremely important attitude for a man at this or any other moment of crisis? Perhaps, after all, the attitude of humility, so persuasively urged upon us in The Times Literary Supplement article, will prove to be the better and safer method? It certainly seems to me that by such method we are enabled to reach, almost at once, the region of universal ideals. As the Supplement writer reminds us, humility, instead of inviting measurement by some merely national or individual standard, "compares us with what we" [in our capacity as human beings] "should like to be"—but have never yet consistently been; and, acknowledging this, are we not led to the conclusion that the attitude which the spirit of humility imposes, must be deemed the only true ultimate attitude for us all? "Cosmopolitan sentiment," I quite agree with THE INQUIRER writer, would never of itself lead to charity or peace, but the Christian doctrine of humility—cutting beneath the most stubborn differences—inevitably ranges the men of all nations as erring brethren in the presence of a Common Father.

One final word to forestall misunderstanding. This letter is not concerned, except indirectly, with the rights and the wrongs of the present great international struggle—it leaves these just as they stand in all their terrible significance; but the attempt has here been made to show the spiritual disposition at which, in the last resort, we ought all of us to aim.—Yours, &c.,

JONATHAN NIELD.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

SIR,—“Face the facts” is Mr. Short's admonition to me. That is precisely what I did, and precisely what Mr. Short declines to do when he shirks my question as to whether he proposes to waste millions of money in training superfluous numbers of men, or to institute a ballot with its inequalities of selections and substitutes. It is curious that, like other men of ability who have caught the disease of conscriptionitis, Mr. Short loses immediately the capacity to grasp first principles and elementary considerations in regard to the problem of national defence. The robber chief may be at our gate, but, so long as it is “banged, bolted, and barred” by the British Navy, only a small section of his banditti, whom our existing arrangements are ample for dealing with, can enter. “England can be attacked on land, i.e., in France,” Mr. Short said in his first letter. Surely the events of the past week show that he should have said “The German army can be attacked from the sea, i.e., off the Belgian coast.”

I am sorry if, through a desire to avoid prolixity, I led Mr. Short to think that I favour military training in the schools. I do nothing of the kind: compulsion is bad enough for men, but infinitely worse for boys, for the former can rebel, whereas the latter cannot. What I meant was that, through the schools, all the advantages of military training, e.g., Swedish drill, can be secured without any of its disadvantages, e.g., the interference with our commercial supremacy, a matter which is not to be disposed of so lightly as Mr. Short suggests. It is not merely Free Trade and the command of the seas which make us the leading business nation in the world, but the fact that, unlike those of Continental countries, our youths are not called away from their vocations, at a most important period in their apprenticeship, for two or three years. The danger to our commercial interests, however, is a small matter compared with the loss of liberty which conscription involves. In Australia, for example, militarists are suggesting already that the exercise of the franchise by conscriptionists should be delayed, so that, when they come to record their votes, their resentment against their compulsory training will be less. I have no doubt that Lord Kitchener is right in asking for an army of a million men. My point is that they can and ought to be obtained by voluntary service, not merely for the reasons which I have given above, but because we shall get better soldiers that way. Those who imagine that conscription will give us a hugely-increased army which, man for man, will be as good as our present one, are living in a military Wonderland, in which history, morale, and money have all ceased to count.

There is no conflict between Sir Roland Wilson's ideals and mine. I should support heartily the raising of the soldier's pay by, say, 5s. a week, and the officer's pay by an average of, say, £50 a year. We could do this, and, as compared with the waste under conscription, have several millions a year left over for social reform, thus getting a better return for the same outlay. I daresay that Mr. Short is quite right in saying that for 150 years our policy has been to preserve the balance of power on the Continent, but it is a policy which must cease if this war is to be, as most readers of THE INQUIRER hope, the last big European one. The Boy Scout movement can, of course, be made a military one: what I said was that it was not so at present. Should it become such, many who now wish it well will regard it not merely with indifference, but with active opposition. The Swiss military system, I have always understood, was admirably adapted to the needs of Switzerland. The needs of a land-locked country are, however, the very opposite of those of an island.—Yours, &c.,

FREDK. G. JACKSON.

WOMEN AND CONSCRIPTION.

SIR,—In advocating compulsory military service, Mr. Short is apparently ignoring one section of the community which will perhaps decline to be so ignored—the women. For the time being women are silent, but those who have for years been strenuously struggling for their own social and political emancipation are not likely to allow themselves to be calmly pushed aside while fresh fetters are forged on men. Democracy needs more power, not less. The people, men and women both, must have more say in the making of laws and treaties. It is intolerable that all social reforms should be brought to a standstill through the blind blundering of one incompetent monarch. To the monarchic system, with its powerful weapon, a conscript army, is largely due the present collapse of civilisation, and nothing could be more dangerous to peace and liberty than conscription.—Yours, &c.,

OUR SOLDIERS AND STRONG DRINK.

SIR,—Temperance Sunday, November 8, is close upon us. Let us prepare for it by a mental stock-taking of what we have done for the cause of temperance in the past year, of what most urgently needs to be done now, and of what we personally can do to help, and, please God, will do to help. Manifestly, what most needs doing now is to safeguard our soldiers and sailors from intoxicating drink. The earlier closing of our public-houses is doing something for this; the total prohibition of the serving of drink to men in uniform would do more, as you, Mr. Editor, suggest, but the root of the evil is still there in the conviction among the masses of the people that intoxicating drink is a good and a festive thing.

In one district I know, when the Mayor and Town Council were pressed to close the public-houses at an earlier hour than 10 they refused, on the ground that it would do little good, because the wives of men at the war gave drink to soldiers in their own homes. Their hearts feeling warm to the soldiers for the sake of their husbands and sons at the front, they show it by giving their soldier friends drink till they are drunk. Last week a number of sailors and soldiers came home here on four days' leave, and were met by their friends at the station and "treated," so that they were drunk before ever they reached their own homes! Nor is the example of their own officers always what it should be. A friend of mine travelled by an evening train lately which was full of Territorials. The men in the third-class carriages were sober and well behaved, but the officers, who were dining in the restaurant car, appeared one and all to be drunk. What can we do in face of facts like these, which are a disgrace to our national life, and not only a disgrace, but a very real danger? We can redouble our efforts to influence public opinion in every possible way.

I would suggest that cottage meetings to teach the evil of drink would do much good. Get a cottage housewife to invite a few friends, and then let two or three temperance workers be there to hold a short meeting for hymns, simple address, and prayer. Leaflets may also be given away at such meetings, which the N.U.T.A. will gladly supply. I have found cottage wives willing and proud to lend a room for such a purpose, and the homelike atmosphere is helpful. This is only one of many ways by which, with voice or pen, we may take our part in the needful work.

May I beg our ministers to see to it that our churches take their part by bringing this very serious matter before their congregations on Temperance Sunday, November 8.—Yours, &c.,

Unitarian Temperance Association.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOLS AND THE ARMY.

SIR,—Over 60 young men from our three Sheffield churches have responded to their country's call. Several of them have written in a fine spirit, showing the effect of their Unitarian training. One of them, e.g., writing on behalf of ten who went together from the senior class, writes to say: "Wherever we are sent, or whatever we are called upon to do, we will try our best to remember the teachings we have learnt at the Attercliffe Unitarian School, and do the right thing." Another from Upper Chapel says: "I hope that when the war is over I shall be able to look back upon my record in the Army without any regrets whatever," and he proudly signs himself "A Unitarian Scholar."

The Sunday School Association, at my request, has supplied me with copies of its excellent statement of "Our Religious Faith," and I am sending a copy to each of our lads. May I suggest that other ministers might well do the same thing. They will meet with every encouragement from the Association.—Yours, &c.,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

DAVID LIVINGSTONE.

BEFORE me is a map of Africa in 1840, the year that David Livingstone went out as a missionary "in the glow of love which Christianity inspires, resolved to devote my life to the alleviation of human misery." The interior of Africa on that map is a great blank, without river, lake or mountain, or trace of human habitation. It was called the Dark Continent. Livingstone lifted the veil on a wonderful land peopled by many races. Look at the map of Africa now.

Always delighting in nature, which he said was a key to his health and good spirits, Livingstone decided to make his home in South Africa in a beautiful valley. He had found a noble help-meet in Mary Moffat. There was only one drawback to the situation. The valley was infested with lions, the terror of the natives. Livingstone came of a race of soldiers, and knew not fear. He straightway made war on the lions. It nearly cost him his life. A great infuriated beast which he had wounded sprang out upon him, and crushing him to the ground, dug his claws into his flesh and broke his shoulder bone. The lion was diverted and shot, but the eleven scars of the claws and a wounded limb remained to the end of his life. He felt like a mouse, said Livingstone, in the jaws of a cat.

In the midst of benighted and hostile tribes, the missionary's kindness and strength of will were a better defence than arms. The natives did not think much of him at first, because he was not big and stout. They said: "He is not strong. He is quite slim, and only appears stout when he puts himself into those bags (trousers). He will soon knock up." This roused Livingstone's Highland blood, so he kept his men marching at top speed for days until they respected his powers as a walker.

Livingstone's first important discovery, made in company with his friends Oswell and Murray, was of Lake Ngami. In later years he explored Nyassa, Tanganyika and other vast sheets of water like inland seas to the far north. He traced the course of the Zambesi and was the first white man to behold the stupendous Victoria Falls, now spanned by a railway bridge. Journeys absorbing years and extending over thousands of miles were made across deserts, through enormous dense forests, over pestilential swamps, where fever ever waylaid the traveller. Sometimes on foot, sometimes astride an ox; tormented by swarms of mosquitoes, by poisonous spiders and stinging ants; often hard up for water and food. Once it became necessary to barter part of his clothing for food. This distressed him, as even amongst naked savages he was particular about his dress and felt that neatness won respect even from them. "Took my belt up three holes to relieve hunger" is an entry one day in his journal. One of Livingstone's bitterest experiences occurred late in his career. It was during the most unhealthy season, when, drenched to the skin daily with the heavy rains, the explorer had to make his way through dripping forests and oozing bogs, the goats he needed for milk got lost, and then two native carriers deserted with the medicine chest and all the drugs. Livingstone wrote in his diary: "Felt as if I had received my death sentence."

When Stanley went out and found him he tried to persuade him to return with him to England, but the indomitable old traveller was bent on discovering the source of the Nile. He pressed on, enduring great hardships, but his strength failed. Entering his tent early one morning his servant Susi found his master dead, kneeling beside his bed with his head buried in his hands upon the pillow. The faithful servants reverently buried the heart of the great explorer, and having embalmed his body and wrapped it in bark and sailcloth, they set out with it lashed to a pole and carried it all the way to the coast, hundreds of miles off, whence it was brought to England and buried in Westminster Abbey.

Livingstone was the friend and champion of the black people. He taught them and helped them and showed them the beauty of a gentle and noble life. He also discovered the sources of the Arab slave trade, and so opened the way to the extinction of that cruel business. H. M. L.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

AFTER careful consideration, it has been decided, in view of the many troubles connected with the war, not to hold the usual Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association this year, but to pour as much energy as possible into the special duties now appealing to us, and to endeavour to maintain the highest efficiency in the work of the congregations and their institutions. The deep feelings now stirring in the hearts of our people, and their imperative need of guidance, comfort, and high inspiration, specially appeal to all who in this dark storm of life hold fast their faith in the Fatherhood divine and human Brotherhood. It is the hour for true valour, for unswerving determination, for a more complete consecration, and for a more generous pity for all who are stricken and suffering.

It is hoped that, whilst waiving for the present our larger gatherings, the local Societies in touch with the Association will do their utmost to sustain the faith and work in their respective districts, and that no centre will be allowed to fail just when its beneficent influence is most needed. The Executive Committee will heartily co-operate, so far as their means permit, in any special schemes of missionary work. Association Sunday is fixed for November 15, when it is hoped that the congregations will do what they can to aid financially the missionary work at home and abroad.

REV. JAMES HOCART, OF BRUSSELS.

INQUIRIES have been made through Essex Hall respecting the Rev. James Hocart, of Brussels, so well known to English Unitarians. His son called a few days ago to report that his father was last heard from in a letter dated September 11. He was then quite well, and had suffered no serious inconvenience or privation since the German occupation. For a fortnight he could not obtain any milk; but on the day of writing the milkman had again called on his rounds. Meat had been somewhat scarce; but vegetables and fruit were abundant, excellent in quality, and cheap in price. Mr. Hocart feared, however, that if the situation was prolonged, things would become worse for residents in Brussels. Many people were in mourning; and several families connected with the Free Christian Church had suffered sadly through deaths on the Belgian battlefield.

APPEAL FROM THE SISTER OF LORD KITCHENER.

Help my brother by signing this patriotic pledge.

FRANCES E. J. PARKER.

In order that I may be of the greatest service to my country, and carry out the wishes of the Commander-in-Chief at this time of national peril, I promise until the end of the war to abstain from all intoxicants (except when such are ordered by a doctor), and to encourage others to do the same.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Altrincham.—The centenary of Shaw's Lane Chapel, which was opened on September 8, 1814, was celebrated on Saturday and Sunday October 24 and 25, by special services and meetings, and the opening of the school room at Dunham-road. The school room has been enlarged and greatly improved, at a cost of £850, according to the plans of Mr. Claude Paterson, who is now serving with the colours. A large class room of modern design has also been added, which can be divided into four smaller ones when required. A service was held in the afternoon, conducted by the Revs. W. G. Price, of Hale, and Dendy Agate, the minister, the sermon being preached by Dr. Odgers. The school room was opened afterwards in the presence of a large gathering by Mr. Ion Pritchard, president of the Sunday School Association. After tea a public meeting was held, at which Mr. C. E. R. Abbott, chairman of the Chapel Committee, presided, supported by the Mayor and Mayoress of Altrincham (Mr. and Mrs. G. Faulkner Armitage), the Revs. J. Morley Mills, W. D. Thomas (Broadheath Congregational Church), Dr. Odgers, G. A. Payne, and others. The Chairman said it was a great day in their annals, and represented the climax of two years' very hard and anxious work on the part of the chapel and Sunday school, in which they had been assisted by the generosity of many friends who were not members. Reference was made to the death of Mr. Joseph Lunn, a member of the Committee, who had been greatly interested in the centenary and the school enlargement. Speeches were delivered by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, the Mayor of Altrincham (a Congregationalist), the Rev. W. D. Thomas, secretary of the Altrincham and District Free Church Council, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Dr. Odgers, the Rev. G. A. Payne, and the Rev. W. G. Price. A vote of thanks to the chairman and speakers was moved by the Rev. Dendy Agate, seconded by Mr. Willis Paterson, and carried. As the result of the Mayor's reference to the needs of the Belgian refugees, seven of whom, he said, were staying at his house, a special collection was taken. On Sunday the Rev. Dendy Agate preached in the morning, and Dr. Odgers in the evening. The morning service was attended by the Altrincham 1st Company of Boy Scouts, under the command of Mr. Rowlands and the Scoutmaster. There was a special Sunday school service in the afternoon, at which addresses were given by Mr. Ion Pritchard, the Rev. D. Agate, Mr. Willis Paterson, and Mr. T. Bell Houlden.

Belfast.—After a period of ten and a half years the Rev. J. Worthington, B.A., brought his term of ministry at Mount Pottinger Unitarian Church to a close on Sunday, October 25, when he preached his farewell sermons to good congregations. Speaking with much feeling, the preacher thanked the members of the congregation for their kindness and forbearance with him during his term of service, and expressed the opinion that, whilst nothing very showy had been accomplished, some good solid work had been put in by both minister and people during the period referred to which would ultimately bear good fruit. On the previous Friday the members of the congregation held a social evening in the school room, when a presentation was made to the Rev. J. and Mrs. Worthington, the gifts taking the form of a grandfather clock and gold watch bracelet, both suitably inscribed.

Leeds.—Two more cottages have now been taken in connection with Mill-hill Chapel for 21 Belgian refugees, and a fourth will be taken as soon as the necessary furniture for it has been given. Money is, of course, needed for the maintenance of the refugees. Perhaps these lines will meet the eyes of former members of the chapel now residing away from Leeds, who are not called on to help refugees in their own locality. If so, Mrs. Grosvenor Talbot, Southfield, Burley, Leeds, will be pleased to receive contributions from them.

Leigh.—The Rev. G. A. Ferguson has resigned his ministry at the Unitarian Church owing to a breakdown in Mrs. Ferguson's health.

London Lay Preachers' Union.—The fourth annual meeting of the Union was held at Essex Hall on Monday, October 26, 1914. Before proceeding with the business a vote of sympathy with the relatives of the late Miss Emily Sharpe was carried in silence, all standing. The Committee's report showed that the activities of the Union had been well maintained during the year. Over 240 services had been conducted by members, and a considerable amount of open-air work had been done. The membership had increased from 35 to 38. The adoption of the report was moved by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P. Very cordial votes of thanks were accorded to the retiring president, Mr. E. R. Fyson, to the vice-presidents, the Revs. W. H. Drummond and J. A. Pearson, and to the retiring secretary, Mr. W. T. Colyer. The new president and secretary were respectively Mr. John Kinsman, of Ilford, and Mr. S. D. Greenfield. At the close of the business meeting the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, gave an address. The object of all preaching, he said, was to inspire love of goodness and the determination to be good. The good sermon was the right sermon delivered by the right man to the right people. He proceeded to show how much the preacher could do, by his own reverent bearing and sense of responsibility in conducting the service, to make the particular congregation he was addressing "the right people." It was impossible to be so definite with regard to "the right man," but there must be personal conviction, true humility, and absolute candour. In speaking of "the right sermon," Mr. Tarrant laid stress upon the obligations laid upon the preacher to take trouble to verify his "facts"; to abstain from reading into texts or words meanings which they did not legitimately bear, and so to maintain the feeling of confidence which it was the aim of the preacher to build up in his congregation. The chairman briefly expressed to Mr. Tarrant the thanks of the meeting for his kindness.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting was held at Denton on Saturday, October 24, the president, the Rev. H. E. Perry, presiding. In his address he referred to the war, and to the fact that so many from their schools, including his own son, had joined the Army for the sake of their country. After the usual business had been transacted, and the annual report and financial statement, presented by Mr. A. Slater, the hon. secretary, received and adopted, the Rev. J. Shaw Brown read a paper on "The Aims and Method of Sunday School Teaching." The ministers present included the Revs. H. E. Dowson, B.A., Lawrence Scott, and J. W. Bishop.

Nottingham.—A course of six lectures, entitled "Before the War—and After," will be delivered in the school room at the High Pavement Chapel, by Professor R. C. F. Dolley, M.A., on Thursdays at 8 p.m., beginning November 5. The lectures will comprise a historical study of the rise of the German Power, the causes that have led up to the present European crisis, and some suggestions as to the fundamental principles involved in securing a just and lasting peace. A concluding lecture will be delivered by Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson. Each lecture will be followed by a Tutorial Class or Study Circle for those attending the lectures.

Sheffield.—The Rev. John W. Lee, late Baptist minister, entered on his duties on Sunday, October 18, as assistant minister at Upper Chapel, and minister in charge at Attercliffe. A cordial welcome from the Sunday school teachers and elder scholars of Upper Chapel was given to Mr. and Mrs. Lee, at a largely attended social gathering on Monday, October 19. The Rev. C. J. Street presided, and short addresses were given by Mr. Wm. Laycock, Miss E. Wilson, Mr. H. Williamson, and Mr. S. E. Deeley. Mr. and Mrs. Lee made suitable response. A similar welcome was given at a successful social gathering at Attercliffe, on the Thursday following, when Mr. H. E. Fishburn presided, and addresses were given by Mr. J. P. Whitehouse, Mrs. Ross, Miss D. Whitehouse, Mr. W. R. Barclay, the Revs. A. H. Dolphin, H. W. King, T. Anderson, and C. J. Street, to which Mr. and Mrs. Lee responded. Mr. Lee expressed his happiness in having found a congenial spiritual home in the Unitarian denomination after a period of wandering in the wilderness.

Victoria, B.C.—An interesting letter has been received from the Rev. H. E. B. Speight, M.A., describing his arrival at Victoria, B.C., where he has assumed the ministry of the Unitarian Church, after a period as co-pastor at Essex Church, Kensington. Mr. and Mrs. Speight reached the end of their long journey on September 6, and they were cordially welcomed then and at the annual meeting of the congregation on September 25. Mr. Speight says: "I have already met several of the city ministers, being invited to their social service commission. I received a surprisingly hearty welcome from all present at that meeting, such a welcome as I fear would be unique in England for a Unitarian minister joining a group of ministers who were brought together by no common love of liberalism in religion. Perhaps the most orthodox minister present urged me to lunch with him that week. To-morrow I accompany a number of other ministers on a deputation to the Prime Minister to urge immediate measures on the part of the Government to cope with the distress prevailing in the cities and towns of the Province." The city has been badly hit by the war, but it is expected soon to recover. Mr. Speight's nearest neighbour is Mr. Sharpe at Vancouver, 81 miles away.

Whitby.—The Rev. S. Sidaway Brettell, M.A., has accepted a cordial and unanimous invitation from the congregation of Flowergate Old Chapel to become their minister, and will enter upon his duties on the first Sunday in the new year.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS AND THE QUEEN'S FUND.

The ecclesiastical authorities of the principal religious bodies in the British Isles have approved of a Sunday school collection being made in aid of the Queen's Work for Women Fund, and letters approving of the scheme have been received from, among others, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal Bourne, the Chief Rabbi, the Rev. J. Williams Butcher, the Rev. Carey Bonner, secretary of the Sunday School Union, and Mr. Ion Pritchard, President of the Sunday School Association. The committee, in their letter to the officers and teachers throughout the country, state that the Queen wishes it to be understood that such collections are to be entirely a free-will offering, undertaken by the scholars themselves, without coercion or persuasion. Many of them will doubtless be interested to hear that all sorts of gifts have been received at headquarters, for sale, including a small bear from West Africa, the only one of its kind in England, excepting one at the Zoo, four Russian sledge-dog puppies, and some Shetland ponies.

THE ARMY CHAPLAINS.

Professor J. H. Morgan, writing in the Daily Chronicle about his experiences in a base hospital, gives a delightful description of the Army chaplain. His sacerdotal character, he says, is never obtrusive. He wears a service uniform, distinguished only by a black iron cross in place of a star, and his ministries, both lay and divine, seem inexhaustible. He is a kind of clearing-house for all the soldier's need. He writes letters home, distributes newspapers and magazines, and administers secular comforts. Mind, body and estate are equally his concern. Is a soldier sick, he visits him; penitent, he shrives him; dying, he comforts him. Of him it may devoutly be said that his motto is, "Come unto me, all ye that are weary, and I will give you rest." He usually is—as indeed he needs to be—a man of robust physique and of buoyant temperament, forgetful of himself and mindful only of others. The religious spirit manifested, Professor Morgan says, is excellent; the chaplains of the different denominations take duty for one another, and united services are often held.

RABBI'S DEATH AT THE FRONT.

It is reported that the Chief Rabbi of Lyons has been killed on the battlefield while administering the last rites to a Christian soldier. He was in the midst of the fighting for the purpose of tending Jewish soldiers when he was called to the side of a dying trooper, who was a Roman Catholic. The poor fellow begged the Rabbi, who he probably imagined was a priest, to exhibit before his eyes the symbol of his faith, and give him his blessing. It was while holding a crucifix before the wounded soldier and whispering to him words of comfort that the Rabbi fell a victim to an enemy's missile.

THE BIRDS OF THE AIR.

While the war is affecting even the fate of the birds by devastating fields and woods abroad, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds is pressing on with its work in the British Empire. The autumn number of Bird Notes and News records, among other things, the history of the Plumage Bill and the new edicts prohibiting importation and exportation of plumage in Canada and the Solomon Islands; and the success of recent Bird Protection laws in Egypt, which are heartily supported by the fellahin. Home work is instanced by the completion of bird-rests at a third lighthouse, and by the good season at the Society's bird sanctuary, Brean Down. The Council of the Society is well represented in the British Expeditionary Force.

A STEVENSON COLLECTION.

A valuable collection of material relating to Robert Louis Stevenson is about to be offered for sale in New York. It consists of books, MSS., autograph letters, drawings, curios, and objects of art, and was left to Mrs. Isobel Strong, daughter of the novelist's wife, by her mother. Every article in the collection was Stevenson's property, and at one time in his house at Vailima, Samoa. The library consists of about 500 volumes, some of which belonged to Stevenson's father, and some to his grandfather, and bear their autographs. The MSS. number more than 200, and include that of "St. Ives" (in Stevenson's handwriting) and "Weir of Hermiston." There are also hundreds of poems in MS. A most interesting item is the portrait of Stevenson by Sargent. In a letter dated October 22, 1885, to Will H. Low, the American artist, who was one of the author's intimate friends, he wrote: "Sargent was down again; and painted a portrait of me walking about in my own dining-room, in my own velvet jacket, and twisting as I go my own moustache. At one corner a glimpse of my wife, in an Indian dress, and seated in a chair that was once my grandfather's—but since some months goes by the name of Henry James's, for it was there the novelist loved to sit—adds a touch of poesy and comicality. It is, I think, excellent."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is characteristic of our national temperament that recruiting is brisker in days of acute anxiety than in days of good hope. In itself this is evidence of toughness of fibre, but it is not very practical. The indecisive character of much that has happened in the war hitherto shows that progress must be slow, and slowness means the prolongation of agony, until there is a decisive advantage of numbers on the side of the Allies. Accordingly, the need of the moment is for men, and for still more men. It may sound like a paradox, but the most effective thing which the peace-maker can do is to strengthen the army. All the instincts of love and humanity cry out that the war must be stopped at the earliest possible moment. We can only quicken the pace and bring peace nearer, it may be by six or even twelve months, by making a decisive victory possible.

MANY men who are past military age must be chafing in their quiet homes against their own inactivity. With a wider experience of life they realize what shortening the war by over four weeks would mean in lessening the sum of misery, and they feel that if all our young men could grasp the immense issues of every day they would not hesitate to join in overwhelming numbers. But this does not mean that the older men must be content to stand aside as ineffectives. If we get the men, and we shall get them, we must see to it that they are kept morally sound and physically fit, and that they understand the cause for which they are fighting. This is the secret of true courage on the battlefield, and of generous feeling and self-control in all their dealings with the enemy.

* * *

THERE is thus need of moral discipline as well as of technical skill in the art of war. Here the private citizen can bring the full weight of his influence to bear, and a great responsibility rests upon the churches. It is clear that the grouping of large masses of young men in camps, away from the ties and restraints of home, creates a situation of exceptional difficulty. A good deal of work is being done to provide healthy recreation for their leisure hours, but we cannot have too much intelligent effort in this direction in districts where large numbers of recruits are quartered. But in addition to this every encouragement should be given to the idea that the soldier must lay aside every weight which hinders him in his calling. He is under training, and this means that it is far more important for him to live a disciplined life than it is for the professional athlete or the rowing man at college.

IN this connexion we are glad to see that a serious warning to the girlhood of the nation has been issued by the wives of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops of Rochester and Southwark. It is a warning which every minister in the country can help to make effective, alike by words from the pulpit and by influence in the homes of the people.

Without dwelling further upon the special forms of evil into which aimless excitement and silly behaviour may betray many girls, we may quote the following appeal to them to help our soldiers and sailors to be good men :—

You can help them by expecting them to be steady and brave and good men. Many a man has been kept good by thinking of the good straight girl he knows at home who expects him to be good and straight. He is fighting for us women and for our homes. Give him something nice and good and true to think about. Don't let your excitement make you silly and lead you to wander aimlessly about. This won't help anybody, and is very selfish. Be a good friend to anyone you know. That helps. Be a comfort and help to any sorrowing wife or mother, and help anyone who is in need. And so you can do your part in the war.

Remember that the war is a very solemn thing. For the men and lads who are now learning to take their part in it it is a matter of life and death. For many of them it may mean death. Be very careful that, so far as you are concerned, no one of them shall carry away with him as his last remembrance of the women and girls of England anything but what is pure and gentle and straight and true.

There is a League of Honour started for women and girls in war time. You may like to join it. Your clergyman can tell you about it. Every girl joining it promises by the help of God to do all in her power to uphold the honour of the Empire and its defenders in this time of war by prayer and purity and temperance. Ask about it if you like.

But at any rate stand up for what is steady and good and true and happy.

At the risk of wearying our readers we must return to what we have said already about the menace of Drink in war time. There are few matters upon which it is so difficult to move public opinion. The financial interests concerned are enormous, and their policy of laissez-faire is supported by the dislike of the ordinary well-behaved Englishman for fanatical opinions. But the evil is so grievous and menacing that we must go on talking about it until public opinion becomes irresistible. The present writer goes about London with his eyes open, and he has some opportunities of observing the neighbourhood of the great London railway stations on Sunday evening. This is no mare's nest on the part of people who want to find a grievance against the public-house. We have ample evidence that the danger to the health and happiness of the people is very grave in the tardy action of the authorities, which tends to grow a little in stringency every week. We are glad to see that the publicans of Birmingham have been warned that they are forbidden to serve intoxicating liquors to any soldier before midday or after 7.30 P.M. Soldiers are warned that if they are found in public-houses before or after these hours they will be severely dealt with. On Tuesday a Crown application was made in Dublin for the closing of the public-houses at 8 P.M., but it is stated that, though the drink evil in Dublin has been appalling since mobilization, seventeen counsel are engaged, and the legal proceedings are likely to last several days!

THERE is an article in the current number of The Nineteenth Century and After by Mr. J. H. Whitehouse on 'Belgium in War,' which ought to be read by everybody who realizes that we must have knowledge of the facts, however dark and horrible the facts may be. It is a record of personal experiences in Belgium after the German devastation by a man of high qualifications, who was afforded special official facilities for the task of investigation. Here is Mr. Whitehouse's verdict:—

The whole life of the nation has been arrested; the food supplies which could ordinarily reach the civilian population are being taken by the German troops for their own support. The poor and many others are without the necessaries of life, and the conditions of starvation grow more acute every day. . . . We are face to face with a fact unique, perhaps, in the history of the world. The life of an entire nation has been arrested, its army is driven to the borders of another country, the bulk of its civilian population are refugees, of those who remain many are panic stricken wanderers from village to village.

Mr. Whitehouse is convinced that this wholesale devastation of Belgium was not due to any sudden outbreak of passion, but had been deliberately planned.

The one bright feature in this national agony is the unquenchable faith of the people:—

Belgium (Mr. Whitehouse writes) is now in the hour of her need. She wants our help, and it must be given in overwhelming measure. But we are not helping a nation which is going to perish. She will emerge again. The spirit of the nation may be seen in the spirit of her King. Let me offer this tribute, however inadequate, to the courage, the genius, and the splendid heroism of the King of the Belgians. The manner in which he has faced unexampled misfortunes has revealed his character to the world. Known as one of the most modest and gentle of men, his conduct in this crisis has revealed a great statesman and a great leader. In part this has been a revelation even to the Belgians themselves, and has been the inspiring factor in the national action.

LITTLE by little we are hearing something of the splendid generosity of Holland to the Belgian refugees. What resources of goodness and chivalry there are in these little nations! It is said that she has taken in 700,000 people, and found them shelter and food. And it has all been done so quietly, with such a wealth of practical sagacity and genuine kindness. A correspondent in The Daily News tells of a farmer who rooted up his whole winter supply of potatoes, and served them out to his thousand guests whom he sheltered in his barn. Another was feeding and sheltering fifteen hundred himself. In another place a railway guard was caring for seventy in his own house. We ourselves heard the other day of a man in a Dutch town who opened his doors to the miserable refugees who came flocking in one evening till his house was filled with guests, and then he himself spent the night in the streets. Let it be remembered that the Dutch and the Belgians have not always been friends, that there have been acute political differences in the past, and there is still a certain amount of racial prejudice, and these actions begin to shine with a more than earthly beauty.

Two poems inspired by Germany's hatred of England have appeared in translations in the press this week. No doubt the translators intended them to reveal to us the actual state of feeling in Germany. That is a necessary though distasteful task. But we think they may serve another and not less useful purpose, namely, as a revelation of the spirit which must never be allowed to desolate our own hearts. At the present time there is no doubt a good deal of anti-German prejudice, and there is a widespread horror and detestation of the ruthless and unscrupulous methods which Germany has employed in this war. Among thinking people there is also a strong conviction that we are fighting against the menace of a nation which has made war into its chief industry. But there is no spirit of bitter and unpromising hatred. None of us want to sing "Our Hatred is for Germany till we die," or would find any satisfaction either for our patriotism or our martial instincts in doing so. Let it remain so. Let us remember that indignation against evildoers and inexhaustible pity for their victims are poles asunder from the blind hatred which cries aloud for revenge. From the demoralization of vengeance the soul of our country must be saved, if we are not to come out of the war, which we began as liberators, as the slaves of our own lusts.

WE are glad to see many signs that the churches are trying to maintain most of their usual activities during the war. It is no time for religion to abandon any of the channels through which it tries to help and bless the world. Of course, some of the large gatherings for discussion and fellowship have become difficult, largely owing to local preoccupation with other things. The Church Congress was abandoned this autumn, and now we hear that the National Conference of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches, which was to meet in Leeds next spring, has been postponed. But every church, in its own neighbourhood, has a special duty and opportunity. It can help to create an atmosphere in which the heart will be strengthened and renewed. Without forgetting the war and its special needs it can do much to keep the interests of its members large and healthy and sane. It can provide means of escape from the daily strain through fellowship with the realities of love and God, or in the happiness of social gatherings knit the ties of friendship still closer. Above all, it can recognize that there is a new sensitiveness to the appeals of worship, and a new welcome for helpful pastoral relationships in the homes of the people.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE CRISIS.

CHRISTIANITY is the world's greatest experiment in living. In the depth and range of its mystery, in the power and richness of its appeal to the human heart, it has always baffled the attempts which have been made to find a formula into which its meaning can be compressed. When the thinker or the moralist fancies that he has captured it with a definition, it eludes his grasp and rides off triumphantly upon some new encounter with the spirit of the world. The modern mind, with its impatience of intellectual boundaries, is more than content to let many of the old dogmas go. It is hardly worth while to stay to argue with a man who still believes that the Thirty-Nine Articles or the Westminster Confession of Faith, or the Nicene Creed, is a complete statement of the meaning of Christianity. Even those who cling to them are willing, for the most part, to admit that they are partial statements—good, but imperfect attempts to explain and preserve certain important aspects of the truth. Others, more deeply conscious of the limited area to which these or any other statements can be made to apply, have surrendered the old love for definitions altogether; and there is in consequence a widespread revolt against the familiar habit of making any dogma into the test of another man's Christianity. To a large extent this weakening of the power of the intellectual formula has coincided with a recovery of the vitality of the Gospel, as life and love, which can never be explained except in so far as it explains itself, when men walk by its light and live in its power.

But this growing habit of doctrinal modesty and reserve has been the opportunity for the passion of definition to break out in another direction. The decay of traditional theology has seemed for the moment to throw the Gospel teaching into clearer relief. Christianity, men say in their summary way, is not a creed, but a rule of life. Jesus Christ was the teacher of a nobler morality—the legislator of a new kingdom of righteousness. If we cannot explain, we can at least tabulate the precepts which all men who profess and call themselves Christians are expected to obey. In English religion this tendency may be traced back to the publication of 'Ecce Homo,' a book with so many admirable qualities of insight and moral fervour that many readers have been quite blind to the spirit of legalism which infects its whole position. While it weakened the demand to believe, it intensified the demand to obey. It will be remembered that some of its most impressive pages are devoted to an attempt to codify the legislation of Christ under appropriate headings, the law of philanthropy, the law of edification, the law of mercy, the law of resentment, the law of forgiveness. Upon the fruitful ground prepared in many hearts by 'Ecce Homo' the teaching of Tolstoy has fallen. With the passionate intensity of genius Tolstoy selected a few precepts from the Sermon on the Mount and poured all the ardour of his own faith into the task of convincing others that the supreme virtue, without which no man shall enter into the Kingdom of God, is to be found in the law of non-resistance. But what has been the result? We have simply exchanged the definitions of Nicæa for the definition of Tolstoy. The exchange may be a good one, but the passion for definition has triumphed, and we are left with Christianity still imprisoned in a formula.

A few people have a deep and clearly reasoned attachment to this teaching of Tolstoy. A large number have been attracted by its literalism and apparent simplicity, and in days of peace they professed an ardent attachment to it. Suddenly they have found themselves in a position where they must either confess that their formula has broken down or condemn all the good men and women in the country, who are in favour of defending Belgium and resisting German aggression, as anti-Christian. It is a position of genuine spiritual distress. It is the source of the sadness and perplexity which cripple the energies and cloud the religious confidence of many sensitive men and women at the present time. What have we to say to these things? Must we in sheer honesty of soul dismiss all thought of being Christians in any real sense of the word until there are no more wars upon the earth, no more wrongs to redress, no more violated liberties to defend?

For ourselves we can honestly say that we have never been seduced by Tolstoy's formula; otherwise we should have gone over to the side of the disenchanted Christians long ago. We are deeply conscious of the danger of taking one or two texts, apart from the rich and varied impression which the New Testament makes upon the mind, and treating them as the ark of the covenant. This false method of interpretation leads us captive to the mood and temperament of any gifted teacher, who may happen to interest or fascinate us at the moment. But while we are thus intent upon our formula, Christianity remains as a divine fact in the world, shaping the most intractable conditions for its use, claiming every variety of human character for its manifold service, turning obstinate difficulties and the battles which we must still wage with earthly weapons into opportunities of divine love and victory. With all its fine qualities of patience and quiet endurance the sect of the Tolstoyans is far from exhausting the meaning of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, either in its thought of God or its thought of man. Let us remember on the one hand the fullness and depth of the thought of God, which lives for us in the primitive records of Christianity. There sternness and gentleness are in perfect harmony, and the God who is terrible in judgment is also the Heavenly Father without whom not even a sparrow falls to the ground. There, too, the same Master, who blesses the little children and heals the stricken heart, drives the money-changers from the temple and withers the scribes and Pharisees with his scorn; and there is no feeling of contradiction or discord. Let us remember also how, from the first days of the preaching of the Gospel in Galilee to the present hour, Christianity has never set out to mould men in precisely the same way. There is no monotony of moral type about it. It is a religion for the whole world of men, and it nerves them for conflict or prepares them for suffering as the need may be. Innumerable groups of earnest men have tried to capture it, and have vainly dreamed that they alone really understood its meaning. But it has always escaped into the great world again, for it demands the human race, all places and occupations in which men can serve or defend the right, for the field of its activity. It created St. Francis, but it also created General Gordon. The lowly brother of the poor and the chivalrous soldier are two of its distinctive types of character. It may be hard to find a formula which will include them both; but there is ample room in the world of spiritual reality to which they equally belong.

If any readers of these lines feel that they are disenchanted or dispirited Christians, going about softly with sadness in their hearts, owing to the stress of present circumstances and the apparent collapse of their favourite Christian formula, may we address this final word to them? What is happening now has happened often before. This does not make the evil any less; but it reminds us that an imperfect material world, where evil powers threaten us and we have need of daily deliverance, is the stage upon which we have to struggle and suffer and conquer. If our Christianity seems to be failing us just when we need it most, it may only be our narrow interpretation of it which is being sifted and found wanting. Every form of evil is a defiance of God; but God has his own answer. It is the trumpet which calls good men to the battle.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

PATRIOTISM is a great thing, either as love of school or love of country. But it is not the greatest thing, and must never usurp the place of what is greatest. I expect you know the close of Henry Newbolt's poem on Clifton Chapel and its allusion to the war memorial there:—

"Qui procul hinc," the legend's writ,
The frontier-grave is far away—
"Qui ante diem periit, Sed miles, sed pro patria."

But another poet has written on another school war memorial; and after commemorating the fine devotion to duty of those in whose honour it was erected, he concludes:—

But, oh! lest glory stoop to pride,
May we remember, when we pray,
The noblest death was His who died
Nec miles, nec pro patria.

"When we pray." There is the solution of our trouble. If our worship in this Chapel is genuine, we shall be learning to seek the glory that cometh from the only God before all else in the world. Our duty, then, is plain. Never allow public opinion to over-ride your own conscience. Try to find what the will of God is for you; and then try to follow it. So we shall be able to derive strength or even heroism from our membership in the school and our inheritance of its great traditions without forfeiting the open vision of Right, and Truth, and God.—From an Address delivered at Cuddesdon by the Rev. William Temple.

"SEVERELY WOUNDED."

DEAR one! give cheer unto thy heart
For mine is not afraid,
Love dieth not by wounds or death,
Nor doth by absence fade.

The sun that blazes on the sand
Has tender beams for thee,
The nightly wind that numbs my hand
May open spring to thee.

I keep no pride in carnage now,
I pray that hate may cease,
That earth before thy gentle brow
Be consecrate for peace.

Our martial trophies fall and fade,
The golden spoil is vain,
Heaven's law still worketh unafraid
And counteth every grain.

Farewell! be thine a truer war
For love of all to fight,
Bind the whole world from shore to shore
For God and human right.

A LETTER BY WALT WHITMAN.

To the Mother of Frank H. Irwin, Company E, 93rd Pennsylvania, died May 1, 1865.

DEAR MADAM,—He was so good and well-behaved and affectionate. I myself liked him very much. I was in the habit of coming in afternoons and sitting by him and soothing him, and he liked to have me, liked to put his arm out and lay his hand on my knee—would keep it so a long while. All the while he was in delirium not one single bad word or idea escaped him. It was remarked that many a man's conversation in his senses was not half so good as Frank's in delirium. He seemed quite willing to die, he had become very weak and had suffered a good deal, and was perfectly resigned, poor boy. I do not know his past life, but I feel as if it must have been good. He behaved so brave, so composed, and so sweet and affectionate, it could not be surpassed. And now, like many other noble and good men, after serving his country as a soldier, he has yielded up his life at the very outset in her service. Such things are gloomy—yet there is a text, "God doeth all things well"—the meaning of which, after due time, appears to the soul.—WALT WHITMAN.

COLLECTS FOR ALL SOULS' DAY.

O GOD, the maker and builder of our nature, who only art to be adored, who knowest all things and desirest the life and salvation of all, give to us by thy mercy good memory and the remission of our transgressions. Grant also forgiveness of sins to our fathers, our masters, and all the sons of thy Church who drank of old time the cup of death. Visit them, O Lord, and console them in the habitations where they rest, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

RECEIVE, O Lord, in tranquillity and peace the souls of thy servants, who, out of this present life, have departed unto thee. Grant them rest, and place them in habitations of light, the abodes of blessed spirits. Give them the life that knoweth not age, good things that pass not away, and the delights that have no end, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

UNTO LIFE.

"These are men who have all something to give up."—Florence Nightingale of the Volunteers in 1859.

THE turmoil and distress of war, the reports of victory and defeat, the long lists of the wounded and fallen; we must needs seek for some solution of this problem of systematic destruction, this ruthless disregard of human life. Armies have gone forth to fight, millions of men are laying down their lives; but armies are only individuals in the mass, and the weal or woe of the whole is the weal or woe of each unit. What means it, this vast riddle of suffering, this enigma which we call war? To the fallen does it represent gain or loss?

At such a time, matched against the whole, the individual seems of small account, yet to each his own life, his individuality, is the sole mirror through which a man views that fragment of the universe which he is capable of beholding, and in which he acts. Thus to every man, his life is a unique possession, however relatively worthless it may appear to others. It is of numberless human lives that nations are composed. As a fragment of mosaic does each individual life contribute its share towards the perfection and the completion of the whole. Some lives are vivid in colour, others dull and drab-hued; but all, however unconsciously, work together to form the complete design which God frames in the golden setting of divine revelation, never leaving Himself without a witness, even in those corners of the earth which we deem so sordid.

The clarion call for renunciation has come, and men are quick to respond. But it is not upon the glory of war or its shame, neither upon victory nor the wounds and horror and blood, that we would fix our thoughts, but rather upon the splendour of the opportunity which war offers to the individual soul—its aspect as a spiritual campaign for those who fall.

We watch men setting forth in this first flush of a great enthusiasm, which later may fade in the lurid light of the battlefield, or at the approach of sable-clad death, who, did they but realize it, is but one person of the trinity, of which birth and life are also brethren. Each man bears with him a life, which, perhaps hitherto has been neither fine nor great, coloured by no special goodness or unique achievement, a poor weak thing, of seemingly little worth. It is all he has to offer, but death the alchemist transmutes its dulled metal into the priceless gold of a great sacrifice, worthy to be offered at the feet of God.

To many a man this meeting with death means his supreme opportunity, his one chance of heroism, the moment of triumph in which he lays down his life for his fellows. Yet few realize the extent of their sacrifice. That it lacks self-consciousness makes it as of the greater value. The man probably expects no retribution; either here or hereafter, for the loss of all that binds him to the world. He possesses no reasoned philosophy of existence. Urged by an inward prompting, inspired by an emotion which he calls "patriotism," he deems the gift of himself as of small account, yet lays it cheerfully, gladly upon the altar of sacrifice. And in the giving of his all the man becomes a sharer with God himself in that great act of sacrifice by which the world was created, and by which it is sustained.

By no chance of blind fate do men die by thousands upon the battlefield. They are more than creatures of a day. If we believed otherwise our faith would fail us at such a time as this, with the shouts of battle in our ears, and our eyes blinded by smoke and dust and blood. The waste of human life would overwhelm us.

But we hold higher hopes of man's destiny. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Men to-day are revealing this greater love upon the battle-field. To those of us who thus believe, this war becomes transfigured as an opportunity for thousands to make their exit from this brief phase of existence as heroes, glorified by a supreme act of self-abnegation, which surely must cover a multitude of sins.

Unlocked by the key of sacrifice, the door of death may reveal undreamed of beauties to many a man whose earthly eyes closed their last upon scenes of slaughter and agony.

"There is no death, there is nothing but life," one life, of which this short span of earthly existence is but a fleeting phase.

Such faith we hold, and a belief that, all unconsciously, many a soldier's heart at this time echoes the words with which another laid down his life—"It is a far, far better thing that I do than I have ever done; it is a far, far better rest that I go to than I have ever known."

THE BELGIAN NATIONAL ANTHEM.

THE words of the Belgian National Anthem, 'La Brabonçonne,' are quite unfamiliar to most English ears. They date in their original form from the revolutionary movement of 1830, but they have been modified in recent times in order to remove anything which might appear lacking in courtesy to Holland, which is now united to Belgium in bonds of firm friendship. We print the official version, from the columns of L'Indépendance Belge :—

I.

Après des siècles d'esclavage,
Le Belge, sortant du tombeau,
A reconquis par son courage
Son nom, ses droits et son drapeau !
Et ta main, souveraine et fière,
Peuple désormais indompté,
Grava sur ta vieille bannière :
Le Roi, la Loi, la Liberté !

II.

Marche de ton pas énergique,
Marche de progrès en progrès ;
Dieu qui protège la Belgique
Sourit à tes mâles succès.
Travaillons : notre labeur donne
A nos champs la fécondité,
Et la splendeur des arts couronne
Le Roi, la Loi, la Liberté !

III.

Ouvrons nos rangs à d'anciens frères,
De nous trop longtemps désunis ;
Belges, Bataves, plus de guerres ;
Les peuples libres sont amis !
A jamais resserrons ensemble
Les liens de fraternité,
Et qu'un même cri nous rassemble :
Le Roi, la Loi, la Liberté !

IV.

O Belgique, ô mère chérie,
A toi nos cœurs, à toi nos bras,
A toi notre sang, ô Patrie,
Nous le jurons tous, tu vivras !
Tu vivras toujours grande et belle,
Et ton invincible unité
Aura pour devise immortelle :
Le Roi, la Loi, la Liberté.

HUMILITY AND PATRIOTISM.

SIR,—I gratefully acknowledge the courtesy shown towards myself in the opening section of the leading article which appeared in last week's issue of THE INQUIRER. As regards the actual arguments therein used, I cannot help thinking that they indicate considerable misunderstanding. Please allow me to give one or two examples of what I mean ?

"We....appeal to them" [i.e., "the great masses (italics my own) of the people"] "to be worthy in all things of the ideal of their country which they carry in their hearts, as the home of freedom and the mother of justice. That is what we mean by patriotism" (THE INQUIRER, October 31).

I would venture to point out that the sudden transition from "they" to "we" in this passage strikingly illustrates that method of argument which is specified under the somewhat inelegant term : question-begging. If reference be made to my INQUIRER letter (October 31), it will be found that I was at some pains to show that, so far from Patriotism being capable of uniform definition, its meaning fluctuates in accordance with the "varying types of the patriotic disposition"; and that I tried to make specially clear that, in the case of the "average man," no fixity of meaning can be assumed.

I must regard the parallel offered between The Times Literary Supplement article and certain well-known lines of Matthew Arnold, as creating a wrong impression of the 'Supplement' writer's attitude; it certainly seems to me that a careful study of his article as a whole will yield an interpretation quite other than that which your contributor's parallel suggests. Be this as it may, however, I would entirely dissociate my own standpoint in emphasizing the spiritual advantages of Humility, from the standpoint of a semi-Pagan pessimistic dreamer. "Resignation," "acquiescence," "lonely virtue"—these words and their context convey the mental picture of an almost completely negative life-attitude. Now, such an attitude is one peculiarly abhorrent to me, and I have, indeed, failed in expounding my own case if anything that I have said has suggested for one moment my acquiescence in a disposition so gloomy and deadening! Let me hasten to avow a quite Browning preference for strenuousness in pursuit of almost any "life prize," good or bad, over such a mood of aloofness and negation. Had a mood of this kind really taken possession of me, I think it must be evident that, instead of urging upon my friends the need of a safe and enduring motive behind all their actions in a time like the present, I should have maintained an unbroken silence. The "humility" for which I plead has nothing properly in common with such downright abjectness as you imply; the humbling of the narrower self, as I view it, is no merely negative process—it means deliverance from the bondage of a partially blind, individual-centred stage of existence, and entrance into the glorious liberty of a universal spiritual and intellectual sphere. Believing that a Divine Purpose is being effected through and in Humanity—looking not merely to the “things done,” but also to the divine possibilities within men, I can hope for, and work for, a Unity which shall overcome all differences. Is this a creed to “sap the foundations of moral courage”?

Lastly, I should like to draw the attention of readers to a newly published pamphlet by the Rev. William Temple, entitled ‘Christianity and War.’ This pamphlet (as its author’s reputation would lead us to expect) is well worth reading as a remarkably interesting statement of certain religious and ethical issues involved in the present War, but my special reason for mentioning it here is because it bears unmistakable traces of having been written under the influence of just that spirit of humility which I tried to indicate in my letter last week.—Yours, &c.,

JONATHAN NIELD.

Malvern, November 3, 1914.

[We have no desire to spend our time on what may appear like a verbal quibble. Much of the noblest and most inspiring literature of the world justifies us in our use of the word Patriotism. The real difference between our correspondent and ourselves seems to be this. He believes that patriotism in the great masses of our people is on the whole rather unworthy in temper and distinctly dangerous from the moral point of view. We hold exactly the opposite to be true. There is in it a real element of moral splendour. For hundreds of thousands of our people their country is “the home of freedom and the mother of justice,” and in the hour of danger they realize it with a depth of feeling unknown before. When they give themselves in her service their aim is neither self-aggrandizement nor vengeance upon their foes, but the defence of a spiritual treasure which is of priceless value to themselves and the world. It is this ennobling affection which we desire to strengthen and to guard from abuse.—Ed. of INQ.]

A GERMAN PLEA FOR PEACE.

SIR,—Many of your readers will be grateful to your unknown German correspondent for the beautiful Christian appeal which he makes to our better mind. The religious press itself is so firmly and serenely entrenched in Christian principle that it, perhaps, does not quite understand how we are stirred throughout the week by visions of the atrocious wickedness of our adversaries and our own abnormal righteousness, and how difficult many of us ordinary mortals find it to be faithful, in all our moods and provocations, to the inner voice, the Holy Spirit of Peace and Love which broods over our storms, and bids the waves of passion be still. We long for a Sabbath rest from the excitement of the week, and a clear reminder that there is one God and Father of all, Germans as well as English; that the tears of the bereaved mothers of Germany are as sorrowful and sacred as those of England; that the life freely sacrificed on the battlefield because duty calls is equally acceptable from every land; that we all have sinned and come short of the glory of God; and that the pitying Love which calls for our grateful worship is pleading also with our enemies, and requires us, the much-forgiven, to forgive our fellow-servant. It is only too evident that national hatred is rising. Innocent Germans have been attacked by mobs; and German friends whom we have known and loved and trusted have been treated with coldness and suspicion. It may be necessary in the present un-Christian state of the world to repel violence by violence, but evil can be overcome only by good, meanness by generosity, cruelty by compassion, hatred by love. Evil is fierce and violent, but weak at the core, and will pass away; and we may trust that the true and permanent spirit of Germany still lives and speaks in your correspondent’s words. But if the great peace which he anticipates is to come in, much will depend on ourselves; and our religious press must make it its first aim to bring the higher peace to our own troubled souls, and give us strength to subdue that natural but unspiritual wrath of man which works not the righteousness of God. That this hideous carnage, carried on by helpless multitudes at the bidding of statesmen, should end without leaving behind it feelings of bitterness and vengeance can hardly be expected of our frail human nature; but let those to whom Christianity is something more than a name for theologians to quarrel over strive against the evil temper which in some quarter is the ultimate cause of all wars, and watch and pray for the dawn of the coming day of justice, mercy, and peace. Let the churches and the religious press help us to overcome in the war with our own evil, and to understand as never before the meaning of Christian Love—love as Christ has loved.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES DRUMMOND.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

SIR,—Unless the whole of this correspondence had been read, a perusal of the two letters in your last issue would lead to the conclusion that I was advocating conscription. I don’t know how my critics can count me a conscriptionist, unless they insist that service is something more than training. (Your readers doubtless know that Lord Roberts proposes the maintenance of a Regular Army side by side with the army in training.) A national army need not be conscript. My request for a frank discussion of schemes has met with no success. There appears to be general agreement that Britain is right in participating in the war, but no disposition to admit our unpreparedness.

It is right to go into training after war breaks out, but an interference with trade and liberty to learn drill and the use of arms before war comes. I hazard the opinion that your readers have been so wedded to peace principles that they have ignored the proposals of the National Service League. I confess that, before the war, I was too complacent to even look at the “nation in arms” theory. Even now, when there is a consensus of opinion that our national existence is at stake, Mr. F. G. Jackson adheres to the superseded views of the blue-water school.

I have no wish to shirk any question raised in this discussion. As conscription is not contemplated, Miss Dawtrey’s fears are groundless, and Mr. Jackson’s strictures about the ballot are unnecessary. I join issue with him where he speaks of “training superfluous numbers of men.” The best witnesses to the value of military training are the young men of our own acquaintance now serving with the colours. After only a short spell of rigorous training their physical response is very remarkable. If all, whether rich or poor (no exemptions on grounds of status are proposed), could participate in this, the stamina of the nation would be raised. Before the event it is unsafe to dogmatize, but I venture the view that the withdrawal of young men from work and study for from four to six months in their twenty-first year would in no way prejudice business. In Germany, even under conscription, trade has grown phenomenally. As this is my last letter, I should like to say that my proposal for the present is “a nation in arms,” but my ideal is “the beloved community” so clearly described by Prof. Royce.—Yours, &c.,

OUR SOLDIERS AND STRONG DRINK.

SIR,—It has been often said that the strongest temperance advocates are frequently the least careful and temperate in statement and argument, and Mrs. Solly, the President of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, appears to lay herself open to this charge. She states in her letter to you of last week on the above subject that a friend of hers (who gave her the information) travelled by an evening train lately which was full of Territorials; that the men were sober and well-behaved (so they, at all events, had not been the subject of the widespread treating she laments), “but the officers who were dining in the restaurant car appeared one and all to be drunk.” On the face of it—to one who knows anything of the subject—this is a most improbable—indeed, almost an impossible—story, but apart from this, to make such a charge against a body of men to whom we owe no little now, and may soon owe much more, and who are giving up a great deal for their country’s sake, is regrettable, because unnecessary, even if Mrs.

Solly is prepared to prove it, and absolutely unpardonable if she is not. I have seen a good deal of different bodies of Territorials and their officers, and, without intending any discourtesy to your correspondent, I may say frankly that I do not believe that what she alleges is true, though I have no doubt that she repeats quite accurately what she has been told, and believes it herself. Either Mrs. Solly has verified the correctness of her informant's story (she speaks of "facts like these") or she has not. If the former be the case, will she state (privately, if she prefers) the date and place of the occurrence, and the battalion to which these Territorial officers belonged. If the latter, will she withdraw her statement and apologize for the wrong she has done them, and give us the name of her informant?—Yours, &c.,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE SPY.

It happened in Victoria Park, in the East End of London—the garden and playground of thousands of children out of the closely packed streets of Bethnal Green and Hackney. Theirs is the delight of open space and sunshine, trees and flowers, acres of green grass to play on, and ponds for bathing and boat sailing. Six deep stand the boys on a hot August evening, waiting for the sound of the big bell that announces the longed-for hour. At the first stroke there is a rush, and the pool is boiling with the foam of the lashing arms and legs of the liberated crowd. Elsewhere older folk sit and sun themselves, and girls and young children find rest and pastime on the turf. Many of the younger boys and the babies trot about barefoot. Shoes are only to go to school in, by preference, in hot weather.

At the gate stands a portly solemn policeman. His duties are light. He tells children the time and gives strangers directions. Once in a while, when taking a turn round, he has caught a boy up a tree after a sparrow's nest, and the youngster has had to come down sharp; but the transgression ends with nothing worse than a shaking. Or the girl with a pram is told to keep a keener eye on the nipper who is bent on sampling the flowers. For the rest the brawny constable can pass his time in thought, calling up an appetite which rises without exertion for dinner or supper, and dreaming of the good time coming when working days will be over and he will be able to retire on his pension.

P.C. X, however, has one little anxiety. His eye has dropped from time to time on a little old woman who frequents the park. She looks as if she were very poor, but appearances are sometimes misleading. She is slight and feeble, and somewhat bent. She speaks to no one, and no one speaks to her—a lonely soul. But she seems very fond of the park, spending some hours in it every fine day. That is all as it should be, of course, and there is nothing to attract attention. What excites the curiosity, not to say suspicion, of the guardian of the law is the fact that on several occasions when he has happened to be on duty at the gates he has seen the little old lady going home, and has noticed that she always has her black cotton apron gathered up in her hand, with something in it. It is no part of the duty of a policeman to ask unnecessary questions. P.C. X was careful to do nothing that might appear rude. But this began to appear suspicious, and he must do his duty, though the object of his concern looked far too meek to perpetrate any crime. "There's them as cribs and them as spies. I wonder what it is she's up to," he said to himself. "I must find out. Perhaps she's a German. There's no knowing." A few days later his chance came. It was about four o'clock in the afternoon—time for a cup of tea on a hot day—that he saw her creeping along the path towards the gate homewards, her eyes fixed as usual on the ground, the bunch of apron before her in her left hand. Stepping in front of her, he said: "Beg pardon, Mother, but do you mind showing me what you've got there in your apron?"

"Oh yes," she replied, and, opening the apron, showed a number of fragments of broken bottle-glass. "You see," she added, "I'm too old and feeble to work now, so I come into the park and look for bits of broken glass, and pick them up and carry them away to a safe place, so that the dear children may not get their little feet cut."

"Well, there!" exclaimed the big policeman, as he gazed at the dangerous splinters. "I hope," he added, "you'll pardon me for stopping you, Ma'am. You see, we can't trust everybody nowadays"; and raising his hand to his helmet respectfully, he said "Good afternoon" to the newly discovered good angel of the children, who smiled and nodded her grey head, and went on her tired way to beg a drop of hot water from her neighbour, who would have her kettle on the fire, to put on the tea-leaves which she had kept from breakfast.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF LIBERAL CHRISTIAN WOMEN.

It has been suggested that the readers of THE INQUIRER might like to hear what progress has been made by the Union in its efforts to facilitate correspondence between English people and their stranded friends and relations in Germany.

When the first shock of the outbreak of war was over, and the dust of the great social earthquake cleared away a little, the Union took stock of its position and looked about to see what it could do to help. The Committee has its headquarters in London, but is composed of seven or eight persons living in as many different countries, and representing groups of women Liberals. These were at once asked to communicate with each other and to make known their mutual readiness to help one another as fellow-members of the Union. In this way a chain was formed of which Germany was a link—with Holland, England, Denmark, America, Geneva, and Italy and Hungary. Though direct communication was not possible between London and the German members, there were other ways of managing, and the warmest response was the one that came from Frankfort.

It was arranged that the Union should start, in London, a sort of informal Correspondence Agency. As may be known to some, this could only be carried on with the help of neutral countries, and it is owing to the wholehearted and ungrudging co-operation of Miss Van Ech of Leiden and Miss Westenholtz of Copenhagen that so much success has been obtained. That the Genevan, Italian, and American members stood ready to do their part goes without saying, and, indeed, at certain points the aid of some of these was sought and gladly given, while from Frankfort help was forthcoming for special cases in Germany. It was found that such correspondence must be limited to postcards, and that there were a number of other conditions to be strictly observed if the communications sent were not to fall into the clutches of the censor. A circular describing these conditions was sent to all who applied for information at Essex Hall. Though the notice about the Agency did not go far beyond our own congregations, there was quite enough to do with the applications from even that limited field. It was interesting work, and most satisfactory to find that the Union had hit upon something that evidently needed doing.

There was a good deal of business to be done between the agents themselves, besides other incidental correspondence for which the postal and other expenses on both sides have been amply met by the 1s. fee charged to each person using the agency. At the outset there arose a slight difficulty with Scotland Yard, which had to be convinced (in a rather terrifying interview) that nothing underground was being attempted, that the G.P.O. was not being defrauded of its rights as sole letter-carrier, or the Censor's eagle eye evaded. At first the Danish route was used as the nearest, but soon the fear of mines sent the Danish mail-boats round by Liverpool and the north of Scotland, and so Holland was, in future, mainly used. Miss Van Eck has been kept very busy, for her task has been to receive each card, add to it her own name and address, direct it to its destination in Dutch fashion, stamp and send it on its way, and to do the same for the replies as they came along. This, of course, necessitates very careful registration of all names and addresses sent to her care. All this has been tolerably straightforward. The difficulties arose when there was a question of getting information about the various civilian prisoners interned in Germany or Austria. Some of these appear to be mere boys, and the letters from their anxious kindred make sad reading. Here it was that the German members of the Union came in, giving their help most promptly and willingly in searching out and making known to us the places of detention of the missing menfolk. But for their co-operation we could have done nothing. It is a pity that there is no room here to print the letters from Fräulein Barth, the President of the "Verein für Religiöse Erziehung," who said "The idea was beautiful," and thanked those who had helped her own stranded German countrywomen in England, and declared her intention to put notices of the Agency into their Liberal religious papers, so that her people might be able in return to make use of its services. That this has been done is evident from the number of German cards forwarded to London, and transmitted to German exiles in England. With Fraulein Barth's help civilian prisoners have been heard of and communicated with in Berlin, Marbourg, Leipzig, Dortmund, and other places. Most of them seem to have been very decently treated, the one exception being a boy who was kept in solitary confinement for three weeks!

Of course, correspondence limited to a few lines in a foreign language on an open card is not very satisfying. No one may mention the War or anything interesting at the moment. One or two applicants for help declined it on learning this restriction—"as they didn't see what they could write about except the war"! Still, even into a few innocent words much can be got that is reassuring and comforting, and so in most cases the main object was accomplished, and no little anxiety relieved.

Here and there a card seems to have fallen victim to the Censor, whose methods are apparently as inscrutable as his temper is uncertain. Once there was a rumour that the Dutch and German postal authorities had fallen out, and preparations were made to send through other neutral countries. But the rumour proved false, and the cards still go through Holland and Denmark. It is doubly good of the Dutch women, for upon their country is falling with increasing weight the burden of their Belgian neighbours. Miss Van Eck writes very sadly of what her people are facing—evidently with the grim determination and quiet self-sacrifice so characteristic of the Dutch nation. She tells of "one small town of 5,000 inhabitants, into which poured 20,000 refugees, carrying all they had left in their pocket-handkerchiefs. They sleep everywhere, even in the cleared Protestant churches. We hope the authorities of other countries will think of this! We live in a quiet manner in our armed peace, helping each other. No feasts or concerts, even philanthropic, no fashions either. A wonderful time, and it has its blessings!"

It should be added that the Union officials are grateful alike for the encouragement and thanks they have received from friends whom they have been able to help, and for the very kindly forbearance and patience of others on whose behalf their efforts have proved less successful.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

Postponement of the Leeds Meeting.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on October 30, when there were present Mr. H. R. Rathbone (President), Revs. D. Agate, Dr. Carpenter, R. Nicol Cross, Rudolf Davis, A. H. Dolphin, E. D. P. Evans, A. Hall, C. Hargrove, W. W. C. Pope, H. D. Roberts, C. Roper, A. L. Smith, C. J. Street, J. Wood, Mrs. Sidney Martineau, Messrs. H. Baily, J. H. Brooks, W. B. Kenrick, J. Lewis, F. W. Monks, J. Wigley, L. N. Williams, and the Secretary (Rev. Jas. Harwood).

Among other business were the following items. It was agreed, after communicating with the friends and expected hosts at Leeds, to postpone on account of the war the Triennial Meetings which were to have been held in April next.

The Fifth Annual Report of the Ministerial Settlements Board to September 30, 1914 was received as follows:—

"During the four and a half years the Board has been at work, 81 congregations and 111 ministers (including a few of each that have entered on the lists more than once) have requested its services. The numbers necessarily vary from year to year. In 1912-13 they were unusually large (21 congregations, 22 ministers); this year they have been about the average (17 congregations, 15 ministers). Of the congregations on the list 19 have effected settlements—5 of them apparently due to the assistance of the Board.

Thirteen ministers have effected settlements during the year, of which 5 appear to have been due to the introduction or recommendation of the Board. The Board has continued to receive acknowledgments of its services from both ministers and congregations, including several cases where an eventual settlement was effected with a congregation or minister outside the Board's lists. The year closes with 12 congregations and 22 ministers on the list, as compared with 13 and 21 respectively at the beginning. The Board has recommended to the National Conference Committee (1) That the 'Information' List of Ministers be no longer sent to congregations, but that recommendations be sent as hitherto where requested, and that this change, if approved by the Conference Committee be made at once. (2) That the Board be authorized in making recommendations to select from any names in 'The Essex Hall Year Book.'"

It was agreed that Recommendation I. be put into effect at once, and that Recommendation II. be referred for final decision to the Conference.

The Report of the Special Committee on public Worship was ordered to be circulated among the Committee before the next meeting.

After a discussion on some Resolutions by Dr. Blake Odgers (which in his absence were proposed by Mr. Kenrick) it was agreed "That a Conference of Representatives of the National Conference, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Ministerial Fellowship, and the Advisory Committees be requested to settle the limits within which discretion shall be used, and suggest means for providing a channel of communication between the Advisory Committees and the Committee for Revising the List of Ministers."

The officers were authorized to exercise their discretion as to the time and place of the next meeting.

SOCIAL STUDY IN WAR-TIME.

A Programme for Reading Circles.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS in its message issued shortly after the outbreak of the war, told us that "it is not too soon to begin to think out the new situation which will arise at the close of the war. We shall be faced with a stupendous task of reconstruction. The Christian conscience must be awakened to the magnitude of the issues. Now is the time to speak of this thing, to work for it, to pray for it." Several organizations have already taken steps in this direction by drawing up courses for Study Circles, &c., on various aspects of European polity, including the Workers' Education Association (vide Supplement to its magazine, The Highway, for October), the National Home Reading Union, and the National Adult School Union, while a further course is, we understand, now being drawn up by the Society of Friends. The National Conference Union for Social Service has also issued a course on 'European International Polity with Special Reference to the Origins and Issues of the Present War, and to the Fundamental Religious Principles involved in Securing a Just and Lasting Peace.' The Course is divided into four divisions: (1) 'Europe in the Past'; (2) 'The Ideal Europe'; (3) 'Principles to be Laid Down at Close of War'; (4) 'Religious and Moral Considerations.' Each division is in some detail, and is provided with an extensive bibliography. An alternative Short Course (with a limited bibliography) is also provided for those who would prefer this.

The Committee of the National Conference Union for Social Service earnestly hope that the Course may be followed in more or less detail by Study Circles, Senior Classes, &c., in connexion with churches and Sunday Schools throughout the country, and that it may prove suggestive for courses of lectures or discussions in Adult Schools, Brotherhoods, &c., and for single addresses from the pulpit or elsewhere. A list of lecturers available for various parts of the Course will be ready shortly, and may be obtained on application to the Secretary. It is probable that the next Inter-denominational Summer School Conference at Swanwick will be devoted to this great question. Copies of the Course, 1d. each, by post, 1½d., can be obtained either at the Book Room, Essex Hall, Strand, W.C., or of the Rev. H. H. Johnson, Secretary, National Conference Union for Social Service, 29, Greenhill, Evesham.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham.—An All Souls' Day Service was held at the Old Meeting Church last Monday evening, conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas. This year it had the special character of a solemn commemoration of those who have fallen in the war. Brahms's Requiem was sung. There was a large congregation, which included several Belgian Catholic refugees—Modernists (as they explained afterwards) who do not attend Roman Catholic services, having already in Antwerp formed themselves into a little group, cherishing the same ideals as the Old Meeting Church.

Evesham.—The Rev. H. H. Johnson, B.A., has received and accepted the unanimous invitation of the Oat Street Chapel congregation to be their Minister. Mr. Johnson has already begun his ministry.

London: Blackfriars' Mission.—A Service was held last Sunday in memory of the late Mr. James Welch, who for the last thirty-three years has been connected with the Mission and Chapel. He taught in the Sunday Schools, and later held the office of Superintendent, he sang in the Choir, and sat on the Church Committee. He was the Hon. Treasurer of the Free Popular Monday Evening Concerts since the Mission first opened them, and the whole Church mourns his loss as that of a gentle, loyal, and self-sacrificing worker and friend. A strong advocate of Trades Unionism, Mr. Welch was for thirty years President of the local branch of the Wheelwrights and Coach Builders Society, and for several years an active member of the Southwark Liberal Association. As a member of the old Vestry, and subsequently of the Borough Council, as a Trustee of Public Libraries and of parochial charities, as a school manager and a citizen Mr. Welch gave of his very best to serve his fellows.

London: Finchley.—The members of the Finchley Branch of the British Women's League held an "At Home" at Granville Hall on the afternoon of Saturday, October 31, to which they invited all the Belgians who are at present receiving hospitality in the district. The large hall was decorated with flowers and the flags of the Allied Nations, and arranged with bright rugs and groups of chairs so as to look cheerful and informal. Over 100 guests were received by Mrs. Blake Odgers (President), Mrs. Van Oppen, and Mrs. Percy Clarke, being introduced by Mr. Parkinson, the local representative of the War Refugees' Committee. Many of the English friends present could speak French more or less fluently, a few spoke Dutch also, and several of the Belgian guests knew sufficient English to act as interpreters when necessary. The babel of conversation, at any rate, was a sign that a friendly spirit prevailed. At intervals there was music, and tea was served in the smaller hall from 3.45 to 4.45, after which a party of 32 boys and girls from one of the elementary schools sang some charming two-part songs, conducted by their master. Mrs. Blake Odgers then gave a few words of hearty welcome to the guests, explaining shortly something of the aims and far-reaching extent of the League, and expressing the warm sympathy of its members with the misfortunes brought upon an unoffending country by this terrible war. Mr. Parkinson set before them a scheme for providing them with a club or meeting-place for men and women in a central situation in Finchley, and asked for volunteers to form a committee of management amongst themselves. This, he said, was a useful opportunity to meet them all together, and he felt grateful for it. Miss Van Oppen had brought a list of the names of wounded Belgian soldiers now in hospital at New Barnet, and was successful in finding amongst those present a personal friend of one of them, who will now be able to visit the invalid. M. Marcel de Potter, a magistrate from Antwerp, moved a hearty vote of thanks to the ladies who had entertained his compatriots, and then the children sang a further selection of songs, including "Brabonçonne" and the "Marseillaise," and finally the English National Anthem, in which all joined as they could. On Wednesday, November 11, the second anniversary of the Finchley Unitarian Church, the branch holds a Sale of Work and Social Evening, from 3.30 to 10 o'clock, when all friends will be heartily welcomed. In the evening there will be a concert arranged by Mrs. Berryman, and a duologue by Miss A. M. Odgers and Mr. W. B. Odgers.

Manchester: Longsight.—The Sunday School Anniversary Services in connexion with the Unitarian Church were conducted on November 1 by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, of Bolton, Minister-Elect of Essex Church, London, who preached the sermons. A Childrens' Service was held in the afternoon. The collections amounted to nearly £7.

Newchurch.—Councillor J. H. Lord, a well-known member of the Unitarian Church, has accepted the Mayoralty of Bacup for the ensuing year.

Southampton.—We regret to learn that the Rev. A. R. Andreae, M.A., has resigned the pulpit of the Church of the Saviour. The resignation will take effect next March. We understand that Mr. Andreae, who was educated at Lincoln and Manchester College, Oxford, and entered the ministry in 1901, will not take another pulpit owing to reasons of health.

Stockton-on-Tees.—At the Quarterly Meeting of the Congregation of the Unitarian Church, held on October 28, satisfactory reports were presented. Eighty-four members have now been enrolled, of whom a large proportion have recently joined, and the choir and Sunday School have increased their numbers.

Workers' Aid Society.—Miss Barmby writes from Mount Pleasant, Sidmouth:—

"May I remind the members of the above Society that contributions should reach me early in December, so that the parcels of garments may be sent in good time to Winifred House and the various Domestic Missions which our Society helps. This year especially, when distress, owing to the war, is even more acute than usual, we ought to make a special effort to provide our Missions with warm, useful under-clothing for women and girls. The leaflet issued last winter, descriptive of our work, was instrumental in enrolling a good many new members; several working parties also have sent valuable contributions to our stock of garments. I should like to offer a cordial welcome to any new members to our Society. Two garments a year, and an optional subscription of sixpence, are the conditions of membership."

Yorkshire Ministers' Union.—On Tuesday, October 27, a Meeting of the Yorkshire Unitarian Ministers was held in the Mill Hill Schoolroom, Leeds, when the Rev. M. Evans, of Lydgate, presided over a good attendance. The Rev. J. Wain, of Scarborough, read a paper on "Our Churches' Opportunity in the Present War Crisis."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A MANIFESTO FROM ASSISI.

The International Society for Franciscan Studies in Assisi has issued to its members copies of a resolution passed at a meeting of the Council in September calling attention to the European War, and protesting against the temporary loss of reason, of justice, and of pity which has provoked it. As men who are endeavouring to transmit the ideals of St. Francis expressed in many precious books and manifestations of art, the signatories, all Italian scholars, including Prof. Avv. Mariano Falcinelli Antoniaci, regard with horror the inhuman, cruel, and destructive conflict which is sacrificing day by day thousands of human lives, and invokes the spirit of peace and brotherly love which can alone unite all peoples, preserving to them their own nationality as a sacred possession.

AMONG THE WAR CORRESPONDENTS.

Among its 'Men and Women of To-Day,' The World's Work includes the portrait of Miss F. Tennyson Jesse, a grand niece of Lord Tennyson, who has been foremost among women war correspondents in the last few weeks. Although she is described as a "mere slip of a young thing," small in stature, and with an unusual, almost unearthly, or elfish personality, she has a very active mind and an intrepid heart, which have not failed her on the battlefields of Belgium, and amidst the horrors of the bombardment of Antwerp. Miss Jesse is a novelist, and is well known to many as the author of 'The Milky Way.'

TOY-MAKERS AT OLD BEDFORD COLLEGE.

The toy-making industry which has been started by the Women's Emergency Corps is in full swing, and if one can judge from the facts so brightly recorded by Miss Elizabeth Robins in The Nineteenth Century, its promoters will soon have opportunities of widening the area of their activity. The girls who are now being taught how to make Noah's arks, dolls, ships, go-carts, and other things dear to the child's heart will be available later as instructors in rural districts, so that in this country, as elsewhere, toy-making may, if desirable, become a cottage industry. There are now sixty workers at Old Bedford College engaged in cutting, fitting, sawing and hammering, painting and enamelling, after designs supplied by well-known artists, and we hear that another workshop for the growing army of women toy-makers has been provided by Lord Portman, who has placed at the disposal of the Women's Emergency Corps the disused chapel on his estate. Curiously enough, this was built for French exiles at the time of the Revolution, and it will now once more be at the service of refugees who have sought the hospitality of our shores.

* * *

As an instance of the way in which the Women's Emergency Corps is able to make use of any talents the applicants for employment may possess, Miss Robins gives the story of an English girl from Paris, an orphan, who arrived in this country with but a few shillings, and after trying for days to obtain work, presented herself at the offices of the Emergency Corps. She was rather despairing, as she realized that she had not been taught to do anything which anybody wanted, but it was ultimately discovered that she could make a practically indestructible gollywog out of stockinet, with hair warranted not to come off because it was crocheted stoutly into his head, and eyes not to be plucked out because they were made of French knots. "Personally I am no friend to gollywogs," says Miss Robins. "I cannot think it fair, in a world so full of beauty, to invite a child to fix its young affections upon a thing of nightmare." But she made an exception in the case of this particular gollywog, which is, apparently, a cheerful apparition, distinctly intended to make you merry, and so honestly put together that he would hold his own against the most remorseless tug-of-war. So the girl from Paris was set to work making gollywogs according to her own design, which has now been patented. Fifty other hard-up comrades are now profiting by her instructions and making a decent livelihood in consequence.

WELFARE OF THE INDIAN TROOPS.

In order to meet the special needs of the Indian troops who have come to the aid of the Empire at the time of need, and who are serving in a climate to which they are not accustomed, the Indian Soldiers' Fund has been inaugurated under the auspices of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem. The appeal issued recently has met with a cordial response, the Grand Priory of the Order of St. John having given £10,000, whilst the Viceroy contributed a lakh of rupees (£6,666) from the Imperial Indian Fund; but much more than has yet been received will be required to carry out the purposes which the Committee have in view. Their object is to provide a specially equipped hospital in close proximity to the Government hospital in the south of England, to supplement the clothing and comforts already available for the troops with articles which it does not fall within the responsibility of the Government to provide. Lord Curzon has granted the use of his house at 1, Carlton House Terrace, where the work of the Fund is now being carried on, and copies may be had of the Hon. Secretaries at that address of the list of clothing and comforts that will be most appreciated by the Indians.

THE ATMOSPHERE OF LARGE TOWNS.

The Committee for the Investigation of Atmospheric Pollution has published some results obtained in the course of its inquiries which are of considerable interest, though they are by no means exhaustive. It appears, according to The Manchester Guardian, that of the eleven towns and cities from which returns have been received (Manchester itself does not figure in the list), Birmingham has the highest soot and dust fall, and Malvern the lowest, while London occupies a position which one would hardly expect in the centre of the list. Arranged in the order of their relative dirtiness and smokiness, these eleven towns and cities rank as follows: Birmingham, Liverpool, Paisley, Newcastle, Kingston-on-Hull, London, Greenock, Exeter, York, Leith, and Malvern. Expressed in tons per square mile, the soot and dust fall of Birmingham equals 916 tons per annum, that of Liverpool 558 tons, that of London 381 tons, and that of Malvern 68 tons. The enormous discrepancy between the fall in Birmingham and Liverpool and Malvern indicates the great scope for improvement that exists in regard to the atmosphere of our large cities, and strengthens the case of those who are tireless in their efforts on behalf of smoke abatement.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It has been decided that the first Sunday in the new year shall be observed as a Day of Prayer and Intercession "on behalf of the cause entrusted to our King, our Empire, and our Allies, and on behalf of the men who are fighting for it on sea or land." We are glad to see that the traditional phrase "A Day of National Humiliation" is not to be used in connection with it by the express desire of the King himself. He has conveyed his wishes on the matter to the Archbishop of Canterbury in the following terms:—

The King has lately received numerous communications from different quarters urging upon His Majesty the necessity for a Day of National Humiliation and Prayer.

Personally the King is disinclined to advocate the use of any term which might plausibly be misinterpreted either at home or abroad.

At the same time His Majesty recognizes the national call for united prayer, intercession, thanksgiving, and for remembrance of those who have fallen in their country's cause.

THE opening of Parliament and the Lord Mayor's Banquet on Monday at the Guildhall have made this into a week of speeches. They have all been marked by a tone of strong resolution to finish the terrible work to which we have set our hands in the only way compatible with our honour as a people and the cause of freedom and civilization. It is the firm conviction of the nation as a whole—to use Mr. Balfour's words—

"that the success of our arms is inextricably bound up with that which is, above all things, the most valuable to the future of humanity—namely, the sacredness of international law and the rights of international freedom."

* * *

ALL the speeches have also borne witness to the strength of the moral forces which are fighting on the side of the Allies. Our cause is just—we did not go into this war willingly, or to gratify our own ambition—this is the burden of their message. There is here no tone of unctuous rectitude, but the sober conviction of strong men, and it imparts a quality of earnestness and self-control to the life of the nation as a whole, in spite of some eddies of excitement on the surface. "We do well," Mr. Asquith said, "not to be moved unduly either to exultation or to despondency by the fluctuating fortunes of the campaign. This is going to be a long-drawn struggle, and whether at this moment or at that fortune smiles or frowns upon our arms, we cannot do better than to cultivate and to practise, after the fashion of our forefathers, the temper of equanimity. There is certainly nothing in the warfare of this hundred days to damp our hopes, to depress our confidence, to impair our resolve."

BUT of all the speeches of the week, perhaps the most significant was the one which Mr. Lloyd George delivered in the City Temple on Tuesday evening. He spoke as a Nonconformist to Nonconformists, as a man of peace to lovers of peace. "It is a great wrench for most of us," he began, "who have during the whole of our lives been fighting against militarism, to be driven by irresistible force of conscience to support a war." These words express the thoughts of many hearts. It is those who have contended most valiantly in the cause of peace who now find themselves most determined to prosecute the war. Following Mr. Lloyd George, Dr. Clifford confessed that for three months he had been acting as a recruiting sergeant. "We are fighting," he said, "for the abolition of slavery, the abolition of the slavery of militarism." "I believe," he added, "in no half-hearted measures. If you fight, fight, and get done with it."

* * *

WE agree entirely with this sentiment. It seems to us to be not only common sense, but also good Christianity. Half-hearted measures are fatal in any stern path of duty, and most of all in war. It is for this reason that, having examined the matter as carefully as we can, and made up our minds that it is the right thing to prosecute this war of liberation with all our strength, we find it quite compatible with our religious feeling to plead for more recruits. We rejoice that thousands of young men brought up in the atmosphere of Church and Sunday School have volunteered, and we want to encourage many more to do their duty in the same way. We are deeply conscious of the horror of it all, and we hope that our hearts are just as firmly set upon the things of the Spirit of God as before, but no other way is open to us which offers the slightest chance of liberating the life of Europe from the oppression of cruelty and evil ambition. If we fight at all it must not be with sad hearts and downcast eyes, but with the enthusiasm and the lofty courage of defenders of the right.

* * *

So long as we maintain this spirit and keep its fires burning brightly we are not likely to lack volunteers, though there may be some ebb and flow in the work of recruiting. For many reasons we are opposed to the idea of compulsory military service, and at the present time there is this additional reason, that willingness to go means so much more both for the men who offer and for the cause which they serve. It brings moral enthusiasm instead of the spirit of dull obedience into the fighting line. The rumours that conscription is imminent which have been flying about recently have probably been due to imperfect knowledge of the scheme for encouraging voluntary enlistment which has just been made public.

It has been decided to ask householders to make a return of the names of those members of their households who are willing to enlist for the war or who have already enlisted. The names returned will be entered in a register, and the nearest recruiting officer will arrange to attest those registered as their services are required. The need is emphasized in the following letter, signed by the Prime Minister, Mr. Bonar Law, and Mr. Arthur Henderson:—

There has been a generous response to the appeal for men for the new Armies, but the number of recruits, though large, does not nearly meet the nation's need. In order to maintain and reinforce our troops abroad, and to complete the new Armies which we hope within a few months to throw into the field, we need all the best the nation can give us of its youth and strength.

If we are to repair, as far as may be humanly possible, the innumerable wrongs inflicted on our Allies; if we are to avoid for ourselves the ills which they have suffered; if we are to maintain for our children all that we hold dear—honour, freedom, our very life as a nation—we must fight with the courage and endurance which won for us the struggles of the past.

Every man, therefore, who is eligible will ask his own conscience whether, in this emergency, it is not his duty to hold himself ready to enlist in the forces of the Crown.

The difficulties and dangers which confront us have never been so great; we await the issue with confidence, relying on the spirit and self-sacrifice of our fellow-countrymen to prevail.

THERE will be general satisfaction at the new scale of pensions and allowances for soldiers and sailors and their dependents which has been issued this week. The advances do not reach the minimum demand which has been advocated in many quarters, but the whole question has evidently been examined with great care, and the figures are based upon the possibility of a long war. In the event of the war continuing for two years it is calculated that the new allowances will involve a total liability of over £200,000,000. This is only a small part of the bill which will have to be met. There is a prospect of many lean years when the war is over. The country will be immeasurably poorer than it has been. There will be widespread suffering and privation. We have not begun to feel it yet, for so far we have paid our way with loans, without fresh taxation; but we cannot begin too soon to school our hearts for what is coming. Even in the matter of pensions, it is not safe to take for granted that we have a bottomless purse.

WE regret the discouraging nature of the reply of the Home Secretary to the deputation on the subject of excessive drinking among women. The members of the deputation recognized the gravity of the evil, but deprecated any discrimination between men and women in any measures which might be taken for the restriction of sale. They suggested that the sale of intoxicants should be prohibited to men and women alike before noon. Mr. McKenna doubted whether it would be possible to get unanimous assent to such a proposal as an emergency measure. He asked the deputation to consider whether, in the absence of the power to close all public houses before noon, they should not, at any rate, look at the actual state of facts and take advantage of such powers as they might get by agreement to close public houses at any rate to women. It is clear that there is organized resistance to any adequate measure of restriction, and the evil is only likely to be dealt with in a piece-meal fashion, which is thoroughly unsatisfactory. The Government needs the support of a stronger public opinion in order to overcome the indifference or the hostility of powerful groups in the House of Commons.

MEANWHILE we fear that the evil of drinking among recruits grows steadily worse. The only thing to do is to prohibit the sale of drink to any man in uniform. In a temperate but very grave letter which appeared in the press this week, the General of the Salvation Army urges that it is a matter which should have the attention of Parliament. "Is it unreasonable [he asks] to hope that some attention will be given to the moral safety of the soldiers? Drinking is steadily increasing and, with it, other evils quite as serious, if not more so. The scenes to be witnessed in the vicinity of some of the camps are so disgraceful that one must suffer much before publicly referring to them." In contrast to this let us quote the following sentence from the dispatch of The Times Special Correspondent, who has spent four weeks with the Russian troops: "The soberness of the army is beyond question. I have not seen a single tipsy or disorderly soldier or officer, and hearsay reports are extremely rare." No doubt exactly the same might be said of our army in the field; but why are the men under training allowed to be exposed to such demoralizing temptations?

* * *

M. RODIN'S gift to the British nation of twenty pieces of his own sculpture is an act of princely generosity, and the gracious simplicity with which he has made it adds not a little to its value. The statues were exhibited three months ago at the house of the Duke of Westminster. When the war broke out they could not be taken back to Paris, and they were removed for safety and temporary exhibition to South Kensington. "When I returned to London [M. Rodin says] I was charmed to find how well they were displayed. The English and the French are brothers; your soldiers are fighting side by side with ours. As a little token of my admiration for your heroes, I decided to present the collection to England. That is all."

IN the course of an interview with a representative of The Times, M. Rodin spoke of the possibility of his doing something to commemorate the heroic sufferings of Belgium. If the dream can be fulfilled it should be the masterpiece of his genius, for he has never had a nobler inspiration.

For years [he said] I have been an admirer of your country. We have today an entente, a brotherhood, that is an example to the world. But I must speak, too, of Belgium. There is a project—a suggestion—it is merely in the air—that I should execute a statue of Belgium, which should represent the heroism of that country. I have seen in one of your journals a drawing of a soldier in the trenches, bearing on his back a wounded comrade. "Il marche pour deux." That soldier might be Belgium—Belgium is bearing the burden of comradeship. This idea, perhaps, I might develop.

THE FORCE OF CONVICTION.

PREACHING may be described as the art of producing religious conviction. A sermon is not a soliloquy on the things of the soul; still less is it a weekly episode in the endless discussion of religious topics. It has a definite aim in view, and that aim is practical. It seeks to influence the lives of the people to whom it is spoken by bringing them into contact with the realities of religion. Its purpose is to get people to be something, and to do something along definite lines of character and conduct. It is a channel by which the vital power of one soul is given to other souls for their help and deliverance. Without a message there can be no preaching. Without urgency to get his message accepted there can be no preacher.

From this point of view preaching has much in common with other forms of oratory. The political speaker always has a definite end in view. There are ties of party loyalty to be strengthened. There are measures which must have the driving power of public conviction behind them. Ultimately he is out to win votes for the men and the policy in which he believes, and all his powers of eloquence and argument are concentrated upon the achievement of his purpose. There are many different ways of doing this: one man will appeal to the imagination, another will use the weapons of logic, while a third will trust chiefly to hard facts and figures; but they are all agreed that unless they inspire their hearers with a force of conviction strong enough to make them do what they want them to do they have failed. Can the same thing be said of the majority of preachers? It is with a chill feeling of discouragement that we notice the difference between the emotional intensity of a political meeting and the dull apathy of many congregations. In the one case there is a man giving himself passionately to the cause he has espoused, eager at all costs to produce conviction and to win active assent; in the other there is a preacher engaged in a conventional religious exercise, without the glow of personal assurance and the desire to convince behind his message. Here is the fatal weakness of a great deal of modern preaching. It may have many virtues of scholarship and intelligence, but unless it has some Divine reality to offer men in their need, and inspires them to do the will of God, it has only a name that it liveth, and is dead.

Preaching, like other lofty efforts of the human spirit, has lost a great deal of its force and directness in days of ease and quietness. Our habits of easy tolerance for every sort of opinion, our belief that we can prolong mental hesitation indefinitely without moral disaster, the critical temper undermining the plain loyalties of the Christian conscience, the dislike of extremes of any kind—all this has tended to damp down the fires of the soul and to make many preachers doubtful of the validity of their teaching for any one but themselves. On these terms we can discuss religion as a matter of common interest, but we can hardly frame it into a message and a programme for which we want to capture the whole life and affection of other men. And yet the Christian Church must either do that or die. Without the driving power of common conviction it can accomplish no good thing either in its conflict with evil or its ceaseless ministry of comfort to the sorrow of the world. We state this, not as a matter for argument, but as an obvious fact which will be accepted by all who understand the sources of its spiritual power in the past. Can it recover some of this force and directness of appeal, which it seems in large measure to have lost, and renew in its ministers the power to speak of the things of God with the accents of certainty which they use when they talk about their homes and their friends and all the things which are seen and temporal in the world around them?

A short time ago the answer to this question might have been more doubtful than it is to-day. Nothing opens the eyes of the soul like trouble, whether it come in the form of personal sorrow or of some shattering event which reveals the insecurity of life and its earthly possessions. This strange thing has happened to us. In the midst of peace and safety we have been plunged into devastating trouble which threatens the lives of those we love, and scatters many of our pleasant schemes like chaff before the wind; and our eyes have been opened. Justice, honour, liberty, the chivalry of the strong for the weak once again claim our hearts' undivided homage; and the martyred soul of Belgium is more precious in our sight than any dream of earthly glory. It is a revelation of God's presence in our midst, and of the moral order of the world, of such clearness and power that the preacher must be dull of heart and slow of speech who does not find a new note of certainty ringing through his message, and an opportunity such as he may have never known before of winning souls for the service of goodness and the unseen things of the Spirit. It is no time for debating whether love is better than hate, or freedom better than oppression, or Christ stronger than Napoleon. The need of the hour is for men who can speak the message that it is so with such kindling conviction that it will go home as a gospel of power to other hearts and make them capable of doing great things for God.

In his speech at the Guildhall on Monday Lord Kitchener laid stress upon the fact that "only from a clear conception of the vast importance of the issue at stake can come the great national, moral impulse without which governments, war ministers, and even navies and armies can do but little." This moral impulse the preacher can do much to stimulate and illumine. All his efforts should be directed to feeding the faith and idealism which are working strongly in the hearts of his countrymen, and to keeping them free from every lower influence which may weaken or destroy their power. But he may find in these words a lesson of even wider application. It is his business to be a creator of the moral impulse for lack of which good deeds are often undone and noble causes have often been betrayed. He ought to have a clear idea in his own mind what it is which he is trying to produce in this world of living men, the greatness of the issue at stake, the strength of the forces which are arrayed against those who contend on the side of Christ. He will then see how pure and strong the moral impulse needs to be, how complete the dedication, how simple and direct the purpose of his own life. He will no longer be content to feed a languid interest in religion with literary essays or critical arguments. He wants to see a divine thing accomplished, and there is a lack of driving power. Face to face with this issue, he knows that the world has no use for his doubts, but he dares to hope that it may be helped by his convictions.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE CHARACTER OF WILLIAM THE SILENT.

GOD alone knows the heart of man. He alone can unweave the tangled skein of human motives, and detect the hidden springs of human action, but as far as can be judged by a careful observation of undisputed facts, and by a diligent collation of public and private documents, it would seem that no man—not even Washington—has ever been inspired by a purer patriotism. . . . Whether originally of a timid temperament or not, he was certainly possessed of perfect courage at last. In siege and battle—in the deadly air of pestilential cities—in the long exhaustion of mind and body which comes from unduly protracted labour and anxiety—amid the countless conspiracies of assassins—he was daily exposed to death in every shape. Within two years, five different attempts against his life had been discovered. Rank and fortune were offered to any malefactor who would compass the murder. He had already been shot through the head, and almost mortally wounded. Under such circumstances even a brave man might have seen a pitfall at every step, a dagger in every hand, and poison in every cup. On the contrary he was ever cheerful, and hardly took more precaution than usual. "God in his mercy," said he, with unaffected simplicity, "will maintain my innocence and my honour during my life and in future ages. As to my fortune and my life, I have dedicated both, long since, to his service. He will do therewith what pleases Him for his glory and my salvation." . . . He possessed, too, that which to the heathen philosopher seemed the greatest good—the sound mind in the sound body. His physical frame was after death found so perfect that a long life might have been in store for him, notwithstanding all which he had endured. The desperate illness of 1574, the frightful gunshot wound inflicted by Jaureguay in 1582, had left no traces. The physicians pronounced that his body presented an aspect of perfect health. His temperament was cheerful. At table, the pleasures of which, in moderation, were his only relaxation, he was always animated and merry, and his jocoseness was partly natural, partly intentional. In the darkest hours of his country's trial, he affected a serenity which he was far from feeling, so that his apparent gaiety at momentous epochs was even censured by dullards, who could not comprehend its philosophy, nor applaud the flippancy of William the Silent. He went through life bearing the load of a people's sorrows upon his shoulders with a smiling face. Their name was the last word upon his lips, save the simple affirmative, with which the soldier who had been battling for the right all his lifetime, commended his soul in dying "to his great captain, Christ." The people were grateful and affectionate, for they trusted the character of their "Father William," and not all the clouds which calumny could collect ever dimmed to their eyes the radiance of that lofty mind to which they were accustomed, in their darkest calamities, to look for light. As long as he lived, he was the guiding-star of a brave nation, and when he died the little children cried in the streets.—Motley.

FROM "PROMETHEUS UNBOUND."

(First Spirit)

O thou, who plumed with strong desire
Wouldst float above the earth, beware!
A shadow tracks thy flight of fire—

Night is coming!

Bright are the regions of the air,
And among the winds and beams
It were delight to wander there—

Night is coming!

(Second Spirit)

The deathless stars are bright above;
If I would cross the shade at night,
Within my heart is the lamp of love,
And that is day!

And the moon will shine with gentle
light

On my golden plumes where'er they move:

The meteors will linger round my flight,
And make night day.

(First Spirit)

But if the whirlwinds of darkness
waken

Hail and lightning, and stormy rain;
See the bounds of the air are shaken—

Night is coming!

The red swift clouds of the hurricane

Yon declining sun have overtaken,
The clash of the hail sweeps over the plain—

Night is coming!

(Second Spirit)

I see the light, and I hear the sound;

I'll sail on the flood of the tempest dark,

With the calm within and the light around

Which makes night day:

And thou, when the gloom is deep and stark,

Look from thy dull earth, slumberbound,

My moonlight flight thou then may'st mark

On high, far away.

SHELLEY.

FROM THE ALEXANDRIAN LITURGY.

O KING OF PEACE, give us thy peace; keep us in love and charity; be our God, for we know none besides thee; we call upon thy name; grant unto our souls the life of righteousness, that the death of sin may not prevail against us, or any of thy people. Thou art our God, who loosest those who are in bonds, and raisest up those who are oppressed; the hope of the hopeless, the helper of the helpless, the lifter up of those who are fallen, the haven of those who are shipwrecked, the avenger of those who are injured. O
Lord, thou physician of soul and body, heal all our infirmities, both of soul and body; O thou, who art the overseer of all flesh, watch over us and heal us by thy saving health. Amen.

THE DAY OF THE LORD.

*The Day of the Lord is at hand, at hand:
Its storms roll up the sky!*

THE DAY—of the Lord! Sixty-five years ago one of our own prophets cried out the burden of England with burning words that seem like a vision as well as a prophecy of the fiery trial that has come to the nations. Charles Kingsley belonged to that "School of the Prophets" which included Tennyson, G. F.
Watts, George Macdonald, F. D. Maurice, William Morris—and whose master in one sense was Ruskin, though it was rather a group of inspired individuals than an association. The middle of the nineteenth century was one of the world's great moments, and the leaders and prophets were ready; but the peoples were almost blind and deaf to their message, and the great opportunity was only partly grasped. Italy won its freedom at the end of that decade, goaded on by the appeals and reproaches of its broken-hearted prophet Mazzini. America freed its slaves, and became the United States in deed and truth. But England with her materialism, indolence, and love of comfort, and a prosperity founded on sweated labour—did her prophets cry in vain? Those who know anything of the present-day conditions of women workers and children in slums need make no deep investigations into economic questions. It is obvious that the message that came to us in the forties and fifties was practically disregarded, and little less than a reconstruction of the social fabric can mend the matter now. It may be that things are no worse in England than elsewhere, but the call to purification and regeneration came to us half a century ago, and found only a partial response. "This is the judgement, that the light is come into the world, and men loved the darkness rather than the light."

Charles Kingsley's life was bound up with the struggle for the freedom of the working classes—the Chartist movement of his time—which represented the Labour and the Woman's Movements of our day. His prophetic poem is primarily a vision of the great uprising of 1848, and the hopes it inspired before its failure and collapse in 1849. He must have thrilled with hope and joy at the sudden triumph of Mazzini's high ideals when the brief Roman Republic was established in February, 1849, on the foundation of the motto of "Young Italy"—"God and the People!" But the end of that year saw a new enslavement of Italy, and the miserable failure of the Chartists, and Kingsley's poem also remained an unfulfilled prophecy.

Now, again, the "Day of the Lord" that he foresaw is upon us—the day of trial and of opportunity.

The nations sleep starving on heaps of gold,

The dreamers' toss and sigh—

Have not the capitalists and labourers already begun to awaken and realize their need of each other? Are not the dreamers who have tried in vain to rouse themselves and others from the hopeless and helpless apathy of a drugged sleep seeking to find practical interpretations for their dreams of ideal cities "wherein dwelleth righteousness"?

The night is darkest before the morn:
When the pain is sorest the child is born,
And the day of the Lord at hand!

Then the prophet calls upon the spiritual powers who are the helpers and guides of humanity—the great ideals ignored, blasphemed, and scorned by a world intoxicated with selfishness.

Gather you, gather you, angels of God—
Freedom, and Mercy, and Truth;
Come! for the world is grown coward and old,

Come down and renew us her youth.
Wisdom, Self-Sacrifice, Daring, and Love,

Haste to the battlefield, stoop from above,
To the Day of the Lord at hand!

These are the angels who should have been our guiding principles in peace—must we invoke them now, with the smoke of the hideous burnt-sacrifices of war? Is it not rather a fitting summons for the destroying angels—probably no less pitiful than the guardians—who shall purge and purify the nations of greed and falsehood and cruelty?

Gather you, gather you, hounds of hell—
Famine, and Plague, and War;
Idleness, Bigotry, Cant and Misrule
Gather and fall in the snare!
Hireling and Mammonite, Bigot and Knave,
Crawl to the battlefield, sneak to your grave

In the day of the Lord at hand!

The three hounds of hell are fearful of aspect, but they have their place in the economy of the worlds, visible and invisible. We have no right to condemn the Hindu belief that not only the Creator and Preserver of life are divine, but also the Destroyer who makes regeneration possible. The Hebrew prophets, who lived in times of testing and purification severe enough to shatter the faith of all fair-weather saints, had no doubt of the reality of that aspect of their God. "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire?" asked Isaiah, the prophet whose utterance had been purged with the symbolic fiery coal. It is a purification, a baptism, indeed, of blood and fire that must come in this day of the Lord, for sufferers and watchers and helpers alike. But the more thorough the cleansing the brighter the hope for the new era that is dawning. For the world must never be the same again. There are sins that must be done away with once for all—the barbaric crimes against the weak and helpless that have survived only half-hidden by the draperies of civilization. The sacrilege of war raging in a fair summer world "full of the glory of the Lord" is only the manifestation of many a hideous sacrilege of the human temple of the Spirit of God. Life ruined, profaned, wasted in humanity, not recognized as the divine Gift, but used by greed and cruelty for selfish ends—this is the real tragedy of the desecration of the world. The destruction of homes and churches, harvests and orchards and human beings is the outward symbol of the destroying power brought into action by the sin of the world in claiming for its selfish pleasure the gift of Life which is a sacred trust. Not merely the life of the body, but that of mind and soul and spirit—eternal life—all of these have been claimed as rights instead of duties, as prerogatives rather than trusts. Knowledge, Power, Happiness—these great gifts have been sought by the strong without regard or scruple for the rights of the weaker, and with equal disregard for the laws of the Almighty. Reverence and Pity have sunk out of sight in the struggle for Wealth and Pleasure and Power. And now comes the duel with the awful monster that the sin and selfishness of all the nations have helped to create—the giant of selfish Force.

It is great and terrible, but after all it is a phantom born of falsehood and wrong, a creature of darkness, a shadow which could not exist but for the light. This is not a night, but a dawn of conflict, and when the morn breaks upon a world washed clean by storms, new light, new power, new joy in life may appear, and it may be, indeed, the Day of the Lord.

Who would sit down and sigh for a lost age of gold,

While the Lord of all ages is here?

True hearts will leap up at the trumpet of God,

And those who can suffer can dare.

Each old age of gold was an iron age too,
And the meekest of saints may find stern work to do

In the day of the Lord at hand!

OUR SOLDIERS AND STRONG DRINK.

SIR,—Mr. Warren ought to know perfectly well that I shall not give him the information (either publicly or privately) for which he asks, as this would be to do the very thing which I have carefully refrained from doing, viz., bringing a charge against any particular persons. What I wrote about the officers was strictly parallel to what I wrote about soldiers' wives and soldiers themselves, and rests on quite as good evidence. That Mr. Warren should describe it as "a most improbable, indeed almost an impossible story" only shows how little he is acquainted with the actual state of things. The only point on which there could be the least difference of opinion relates to the meaning of the word "drunk," for that word covers many degrees of being the worse for liquor. My point is, that on certain occasions, possibly regarded as special, festive occasions, officers set their men a bad example which makes it all the more difficult for soldiers and their wives to see that getting drunk is not the right way to celebrate a festive occasion. My calling attention to this may seem to Mr. Warren "unpardonable," but I am not concerned at this, for I have no intention of asking his forgiveness.—Yours, &c., VIOLET SOLLY.

Parkstone, November 10, 1914.

SIR,—Pray believe there is a large body of your readers who are not "weary," but rather are rejoicing to find our journal keeps pegging away at the awful Drink menace. Because we do not plague you with letters, you must not fancy that your views are falling flat on our deaf ears. You have got hold of a vital point, and the more it is hammered home, the greater will our country be advantaged.—Yours, &c.

"ASSOCIATION SUNDAY."

SIR,—Will you allow me the hospitality of THE INQUIRER to again ask your numerous readers to support the annual Chapel Collections for the Funds of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which collections are to be taken on Sunday next, November 15? The Association, in times when individual subscriptions are liable to be reduced, looks with confidence to these combined Collections, when each can give what he can afford to the common Fund. The number of Chapel Collections has materially increased of late years, and my Committee trust that in this year of stress and trouble every congregation will return an increased collection. I shall be happy to receive and acknowledge any donations from those who are prevented from attending service on Sunday.—Yours, &c.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

TREITSCHKE.

Treitschke, His Life and Works. London: Jarrold & Son and Allen & Unwin, Ltd. 7s. 6d. net.

Selections from Treitschke's Lectures on Politics. Translated by Adam L. Gowans. London and Glasgow: Gowans & Gray, Ltd. 2s. net.

TREITSCHKE has been called the Bismarck of the Chair. He confessed himself that the patriot in him was a thousand times stronger than the Professor. For many years after his promotion to Berlin he was looked upon as more of a political pamphleteer than a serious historian. But his genius triumphed, and he won the twofold distinction at which he aimed. He has long been recognized as the most popular historian of modern Germany, and one of the chief formative influences in her national life. Here in England very few people had even heard of him till a few months ago. His brilliant political essays were unknown, and his great History, which Mr. Gooch has described as the nearest Continental equivalent to Macaulay, still awaits a translator. But his name has been buzzed about recently, and two publishers have rushed into print with translations which are plainly intended to appeal to the present taste for War literature. We regret exceedingly that a foreign teacher of such high standing—massive in scholarship and brilliant in intelligence—should be introduced to us under such unfavourable circumstances. We fear that he will be remembered chiefly for the bitter things which he said about England. Some of them have already filtered through into the daily press and become stamped upon our minds as typical examples of national prejudice and dislike. Certainly the two volumes before us will do little to remove this impression. The second of them is very slight, and consists of short passages arranged under convenient subject headings. The other is more ambitious, and contains a life of Treitschke by his intimate friend, Adolf Hausrath, and eight complete essays, including 'The Army,' 'International Law,' and 'Freedom.' Unfortunately the work of translation, which is anonymous, has been performed without a trace of literary skill. Page after page lumbers heavily along, and many sentences require a knowledge of German idiom to make them intelligible. There is here no trace of the style of "incomparable richness and power"—to quote the words of Mr. Gooch, who has given us in his 'History and Historians in the Nineteenth Century,' the most illuminating account of Treitschke's work which has appeared in English.

It is undoubtedly true that Treitschke must bear a large measure of responsibility for German Chauvinism. He gave the Prussian spirit driving power and a hard type of political idealism. The creation of the German Empire was as dear to him as a unified Italy to Mazzini, only he lacked the moral vision which was one of Mazzini's most conspicuous gifts. His degenerate pupils have magnified his hatred of "the sinking island kingdom," and forgotten his keen sense of legal obligation. In the essay on 'International Law' there are several passages which administer a severe rebuke to the ruthlessness of Germany in the present war. "War against private property, as such," he writes, "of which the laying waste of the Palatinate at the end of the seventeenth century by Melac, furnishes us with a dreadful example; the wanton burning of villages is regarded to-day by all civilized States as an infringement of the law of nations. Private property may only be injured in so far as such injury is absolutely essential to the success of the war." And, again: "It has also become a principle of international law that the great treasures of civilisation, which serve the purposes of Art and Science, and are looked upon as the property of humanity as a whole, shall be secured against theft and pillage." In our profound disagreement with the trend and purpose of much of Treitschke's political teaching let us remember to his credit that it was with him a matter of supreme concern that "a nation should keep the shield of its honour bright."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S SPEECHES.

Mr. Chamberlain's Speeches. Edited by Charles W. Boyd. London: Constable & Company, Ltd. 2 vols. 15s. net.

For all students of recent English politics these two volumes of Mr. Chamberlain's speeches contain documents of real importance. They illustrate every aspect of his long career, and they contain many utterances which at the time had a far-reaching effect upon public opinion. Mr. Chamberlain was a great administrator, a shining example of the success of the business man in politics, and he spoke with a view to getting things done. He was distinguished by shrewdness and common-sense, and gifts of plain, forcible expression, rather than by moral passion or imaginative vision. For this reason his speeches will not rank with the oratory which bears the unmistakable mark of literature. They have not the verbal splendour of Burke, the fervour of John Bright, or the distinction of Lord Rosebery. But they are none the less worthy of carefully study by all who desire to excel in the art of the platform, for they possess exactly the qualities—clearness of arrangement, precision of statement, and a rigid avoidance of the mannerisms of a too bookish mind—which attract and hold the attention of ordinary men. The speeches have been selected by Mr. Charles W. Boyd, and grouped—according to the period of their delivery—under six headings: 'Municipal and Early Speeches,' 'Radicalism and Reform,' 'Speeches on Ireland,' 'The Unionist Alliance,' 'Speeches in South Africa,' and 'Imperial Union and Tariff Reform.' The editor has also written a series of short Introductions, in which the note of the political apologist is a little too insistent. He would have done better if he had been content with a brief and impartial chronicle of events, leaving the speeches to create their own impression. Evidently Mr. Boyd has strong Anglican sympathies, and he would be a happier man if he could explain away the pugnacious Nonconformity of his hero in the early stages of his career; but it would have been better not to make the attempt. Mr. Austen Chamberlain has contributed a short Preface—warm with filial affection, but in perfect taste, from which we cull two passages. "He had a deep sympathy with suffering. He hated wrong and injustice in any form. He loved his country passionately, and had a great faith in his countrymen here and beyond the seas. These were the great forces working in his heart and shaping his career." "To him, as to Chatham, speech was a form of action. He valued the triumphs of the platform and of Parliament only as they formed opinion and led to action. And so the speech was the man—simple, direct, sincere, courageous, prompt in decision, and resolute in action." So much a son may be allowed to say without offending, but he could hardly desire to say more.

STUDIES IN THE SPIRIT AND TRUTH OF CHRISTIANITY. By William Temple, M.A. London: Macmillan & Co., 3s. 6d. net.

NOTHING is more baffling to the reviewer's pen than a volume of really good sermons. We shall pay Mr. Temple's new book the compliment of saying little about it, because all we wish to do is to advise our readers to get it and read it for themselves. Like his other books, it is marked by a singular freshness of outlook, a strong grasp of the realities of Christian faith, and a deep sympathy with human life. The school chapel at Repton, with Mr. Temple in the pulpit, can never have been a dull place. For one thing it is quite evident that he found keen enjoyment in preaching to boys; for another, he never talked down to them or lectured them, but always gave them of his best in a spirit of loyal comradeship. His complete frankness disarms hostility even when he speaks of the sins of wealth to the sons of rich parents, or warns them against the snares of stupidity and our national neglect and contempt of the intellect: "Not everyone is required to be brilliant in intellect, any more than everyone is required to be a saint. But we are all required to be honest in thought, word, and deed. The man who lazily accepts a prejudice is mentally dishonest, just as the man who borrows what he can never repay is financially dishonest; he is spreading deception around him; and on the whole mental dishonesty does the more harm of the two." The boys who were fed on such teaching are likely to go out into the world thoroughly awake to all the opportunities of noble living. It is no small thing for the life of the community that Mr. Temple has now exchanged the world of school for a London pulpit. We only hope that he is not marked down for early promotion to high office. He ought to be left free to unfold the spirit and truth of Christianity to all who care to listen for at least ten years, before the inevitable happens, and the big human world knows him no more.

A NEW set of five volumes in the "Home University Library" has just been issued by Messrs. Williams & Norgate, bringing the total of volumes now published up to 100. The new set comprises 'Political Thought in England from Bacon to Halifax,' by Mr. G. P. Gooch; 'The Ancient East,' by Mr. D. G. Hogarth; 'Wars between England and America,' by Prof. T. C. Smith; 'History of Scotland,' by Prof. R. S. Rait; and 'An Outline of Russian Literature,' by the Hon. Maurice Baring.

A CHILDREN'S PLAY entitled 'A Real True Christmas,' in three scenes, arranged for seven characters, appears in the November number of Young Days, and can be recommended to readers in search of something suitable of this kind for the Christmas season.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

A NOBLE RIVALRY.

ONE of the finest traits in the character of any human being is the willingness to sacrifice personal safety, or ease, or even honour among men for the sake of a cause or the happiness of another. We all know how splendidly this is being shown at the present time, but it is not only in war that brave deeds are done; if it were, we could have very little hope that people would ever do anything worthy to be recorded in history when the fighting days of mankind are over, and peace is established throughout the world.

I like to remember the story, for instance, which is told of those two great men of science, Charles Darwin and Alfred Russel Wallace. Darwin, the elder of the two, had been carrying on his studies and researches for many years before Wallace was old enough to tread the same path, and he had long been settled in London, after a wonderful voyage round the world, when the latter joined a party bound on an exploring expedition to the River Amazon. In 1836 Darwin suddenly hit upon an idea which seemed to throw a quite new light on the curious fact that some kinds of animals and plants are preserved, while others die out. It startled him at the time, as new ideas often do, but he at once set to work to find out if it could be proved to be true, making endless notes and experiments as he went along, and in 1844 he wrote an account of his discovery in an essay of 230 pages. But scientific men do not do things in a hurry, though they think rapidly enough, and it was not until 1858, when he had weighed all the evidence over and over again, and written out his views on a scale three or four times as extensive as the original sketch, that he published a book on his new theory which has since become very famous, having been translated into innumerable languages, including Japanese.

But here we come to an incident which almost deserves to be called romantic, and which certainly tested the character of two gifted men in a very remarkable way. Wallace, while lying ill with ague in the course of his travels, also began to think out the problems which had filled Darwin's mind twenty years earlier, and suddenly there flashed upon him, as he tells us himself, the very same idea which, all unknown to him, the elder of the two men had so long been preparing to give to the world. This was, indeed, a striking coincidence, and, strangely enough, Wallace's first thought was to send an outline of his theory to Darwin, asking him, if he thought well of it, to forward it to Lyell, the great geologist. Darwin must have read this letter with a keen sense of disappointment, for he realized at once that his own plans were overthrown. But he immediately did as Wallace asked him, sending the papers with this request: "Please return me the manuscript, which he does not say he wishes me to publish; but I shall, of course, at once write and offer to send to any journal."

Acting on the best advice he could obtain, Darwin agreed that an abstract of his own work should be read, together with Wallace's paper, before the Linnean Society. He did not willingly consent to this plan. "I thought," he says in his 'Autobiography,' "that Mr. Wallace might consider my doing so unjustifiable, for I did not then know how generous and noble was his disposition." Wallace was, indeed, too great an admirer of Darwin to think of his own importance, and all his life he claimed to be no more than a partner with him in the great theory which each had discovered independently of the other. Darwin, he felt, was the man best qualified to write a book on the whole subject, for he had untiring patience and skill, a vast fund of information to draw upon, and a clear and persuasive literary style. "I have since measured my own strength," he adds, "and know full well that it would be quite unequal to that task." In a letter written by Darwin to Wallace in 1870 are the following words, which, I think, sum up the characters of these two great men in a way that should make us proud to claim them as our fellow-countrymen. "We have never felt any jealousy towards each other," so the letter runs, "though in one sense rivals. I believe I can say this of myself with truth, and I am absolutely sure it is true of you." L. G. A.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR. ALFRED BOOTH.

It is with deep regret that we have to record the death of Mr. Alfred Booth, which took place on Monday, November 2nd, at the age of 80 years. He was the founder of the Booth line of steamers, and was closely identified with the business, educational, and philanthropic life of Liverpool. His early training and the ministry of the Rev. J. Hamilton Thom made a deep impression upon him, and he will be remembered chiefly by those who knew him best, not for his worldly success, which was considerable, but for an elevation of character and a quickness of sympathy which made themselves felt by all who came in contact with him. On his mother's side Mr. Booth was a descendant of Dr. Enfield, of the Warrington Academy. His brother, the Right Hon. Charles Booth, is the well-known writer on social questions. The funeral took place on Wednesday, November 4th. The service, which was held in Ullet Road Church prior to cremation, was conducted by the Revs. J. C. Odgers and C. Craddock. In his address Mr. Craddock spoke as follows:—

"It may be left to the Press and the various administrative bodies of the city to deal with the more public life of Mr. Alfred Booth. Here we think of his interest in the things of the imagination—poetry and the arts, of his passionate enthusiasms, his aspirations after the ideal life, his effort after conditions of society which seem like dreams to lesser men, his faith in the invisible things of God and the future life. . . . The value of Mr. Booth's life for the business, the commerce, the education, and the general philanthropy of this city has been exceptionally great, but a greater value is to be found in his high ideal temper, the justice and simplicity of his life, his reverence for moral powers, and the quiet witness he bore for God in man, and man in God. Besides those who will remember him for what he was in public life—his singularly fine sense of honour and uprightness—many would confess an almost affectionate attachment to him on the ground that they had found in him 'that best portion of a good man's life, his little, nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love.' He lived by admiration, hope, and love: admiration for things pure and lovely and of good report, for the beautiful in visible form and the lovely in human character; hope which refused to accept as final and irremediable such present conditions of society as its misery, wrongs, crimes, and unsightliness, but always kept in view something higher, as to which, however unattainable, there should be no folding of the hands in sleep and no closing of the eyelids in slumber; and love which bids us think of the good of all mankind, of those outside our faith, religious practice, politics, and philosophy, and live our life on their behalf. We thank God for this finished life of so rare a quality, by which the everyday humanities, which are the most beautiful, and the common love and goodness of the world of men, have gained an added beauty, and by which the great things of the soul, its consciousness of God, of its indissoluble union with Him, and of its immortality in Him, are seen to be the things best worth our striving for."

To these words we may add the following tribute by another friend:—

"The death of Mr. Alfred Booth removes a figure which was typical of all that is most upright in the commercial life, and all that is pure and sweet in the family life of Liverpool. His nature was of a rare refinement and dignity, with which those who knew him could associate nothing but the idea of good. A lifelong enemy to oppression and cruelty in every form, and a firm believer that society would in due time rid itself of all that is unjust and unsightly, he preserved to the end of his life of four-score years the most wide and liberal mind and the will to see eye to eye with the younger generation. It may be said that he never grew old in mind, while in body he was spared almost all the ills of old age, enjoying form and colour, music and books, duties of philanthropy and pleasures of friendship to the last. He has left behind him a tradition of character, humanity, and public service which will not be lost."

MISS ELIZABETH REID.

WE regret to announce the death on the 6th inst. of Miss Elizabeth Reid, at her home of recent years in Eastbourne. The greater part of her life had been passed in Hampstead, the place of her birth in 1829. She was always a staunch supporter of the Unitarian cause, following in the footsteps of her father, Thomas Whitehead Reid, who had joined the Red Lion Hill, now the Rosslyn Hill Congregation there in 1819. He was of Scotch descent, and a convert from Calvinism to Unitarianism. Through her mother, a daughter of the Rev. Timothy Kenrick, of Exeter, she inherited the traditions of a long line of Nonconformist ancestors, and in the early days of Hampstead Unitarianism the Reid family supported and assisted a small struggling congregation, the services during the rebuilding of the chapel in 1828 being conducted in Mr. Reid's dining-room. Thus initiated, she continued a consistent supporter of the chapel, and once at a serious crisis collected a large fund towards its enlargement. On her removal to Eastbourne, after her mother's death, she took an active part in liberal movements in the town, helping many causes which appealed to her sympathies. She was for a long time Hon. Sec. of the Women's Liberal Association. But it is not in public work that she will be chiefly remembered. Her memory will live in her personal circle as the devoted nurse and guardian of the invalids of her household; the unselfish, ever-helpful daughter, sister, aunt; the sympathetic cheerful friend whose smile and welcome never failed even when the infirmity of her latter days prevented her taking the active part in life she had always loved. Her funeral took place at Highgate Cemetery on the 11th inst. The Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead, conducted the service.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

AUTUMN MEETING.

THE autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society was held on Friday evening, November 6, at Essex Hall, the President, Mr. A. Savage Cooper, in the chair. The special choir was under the leadership of Mr. T. F. Wood, organist of Unity Church, Islington. The chairman, in the course of his address, dealt specially with the temperance question, which has been raised in an acute form as a result of the present war, and instanced the way in which a despotic government can sometimes bring into effect a great measure for the welfare of the community more successfully than a democratic one. China, for instance, had by a stroke of the pen put an end to the opium traffic, which was becoming a national curse, and Russia, profiting by the lessons learnt at the time of the Japanese war, had, at the beginning of the present war, prohibited the use of alcohol in order that she might send her armies sober into the field. Was democratic rule really less powerful to bring about great social movements than the benevolent despotisms of China and Russia? The matter was a serious one, and they were forced to consider it when they realized what would be the result, in the wished-for event of the return of the British troops in the flush of triumph after the war, if nothing is done to decrease the facilities for drunkenness. Upon the answer to the question he had put to the meeting—a question which he admitted he was unable to answer himself—depended the future of the race, for not merely the moral well-being of individuals was at stake, but the moral and spiritual progress of the people as a whole. Unless they were prepared to see temperance enforced by the total abolition of the use of alcohol, which he personally did not wish, they must give the subject its proper place among the problems with which the churches were intended to deal. In all the churches throughout the land it had been left largely in the hands of separate organizations, and treated as a thing apart from the peculiar work of the pulpit. As a society they themselves might well give a lead in their propagandist work by making their grants for special services extend to a course of lectures or sermons on temperance in its moral and spiritual aspect, and particularly in relation to the present war. In this way they could do much to mitigate what might become a grave national scandal.

The Rev. Dr. Walsh, after expressing his great pleasure at being present at the meeting, and associating with representatives of a society that owed so much to the thought of men whose spirit had influenced him all through his adult life, said it was difficult to find a definition of a church, but he thought one of the best definitions that he had ever come across was that attributed to the late Mr. Stead—"the union of all who love in the service of all who suffer." It must be admitted, however, that this left out of account any reference to spiritual realities which most of them felt to be the essential part of religion, and therefore of church life as religion organized. A shorter definition would perhaps serve the purpose better, and he would himself prefer to define the church as "the expression of love organized." Love had been organized more or less successfully in all the Christian and non-Christian churches of which they had any knowledge; he believed it to be true to say, as a matter of historical fact, that all religions, considered in the light and in the lives of their founders and teachers, were endeavours to express the religion of love in terms of social, sometimes of political progress; to gather up the impalpable sentiments and spiritual emotions which flow without recognition from soul to soul, and to abate the hatreds and prejudices which are the greatest enemies of mankind. Dr. Walsh went on to emphasize the fact that no consistent ethic had been evolved by Christendom in regard to peace and war to guide the nations at such a crisis. The most perplexing differences of opinion existed, the sayings of Christ being quoted on one side as confidently as on the other, and the task for the future was to put all these conflicting ideas into the melting-pot, in the hope that some clear teaching might be evolved which would be accepted by honest people and applied to their social and international relationships. The church must become a sacrificial institution, living for the well-being of the whole. The reason why the great masses of the people were outside it was because Christian people had not realized this, and organized their activities in such a way as to abolish the injustices in their own country. A sacrificial church, not extorting homage, and living by sacrifice, would have commended itself to the conscience of mankind and been accepted as an organ of the divine will and love. It was his hope that they might look up through the red rain descending on the battlefields of Europe to a higher ideal, and that those whom he addressed would be successful in their efforts to evolve new principles which would make for liberty, and for intelligent and clear thinking, through the "love of God unspent."

The Rev. R. Travers Herford, in a speech full of reminiscences of his work among the churches of Lancashire, gave some practical suggestions, which he thought the Society might well take into consideration for the benefit of the churches they were helping. They might never make a great splash, or do tremendous things, but he believed in the solidity of the work that was being done for good. He did not believe, as Dr. Walsh appeared to think, that Christianity had failed, unless it is failure not to reach an ideal which has never been attained before. The truth was that there had never been in the history of the world till now a really Christian nation, and the nation is now realizing what its ideal should be. There is a wide difference between what we are, and what we ought to be. They were experiencing the birth-pangs of the coming time, and there was opening upon them a heavenly vision such as they had never beheld before. They were beginning to see the spiritual heights to which they must climb with their hearts set on the living God.

The Rev. J. A. Pearson gave some details of the work of individual churches, some of which—like Woolwich, Deptford, South Norwood, and Leytonstone—were achieving excellent results, often with inadequate accommodation, and in face of many other difficulties.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Auckland, N.Z.—A correspondent has sent us the following extract from a private letter for publication: "Our congregation is noticeably taking a keener interest in all Church matters since the arrival of Mr. and Mrs. Williams, to whom we are all sincerely attached, and since the opening of this awful war we have had very large congregations indeed; the people probably feel the need of comradeship in worship as they never did before. "A great wave of enthusiasm is sweeping over Britain's Colonies, everybody is helping, even little children; and all our young men are clamouring to be allowed to go to the front. Many have gone already, and many more are to leave shortly, some of them personal friends of mine. What an abominable crime it is that they should have to fight! God grant that good may come out of this evil."

Blackpool.—Lytham Road Church, South Shore, began its series of week-night Winter Meetings with a Sunday School Social, October 28, followed on November 2 by an excellent lecture on 'Shakespeare's Women,' from the Rev. J. Horace Short. The Annual Meeting of our South Shore Branch of the League of Unitarian Women, November 5, reported, amongst other matters, the sending of bales of new and second-hand clothing, amounting to 180 articles, to the Manchester Belgian Refugees' Relief Committee.

Chester.—The 214th anniversary of the founding of Matthew Henry's Chapel was celebrated on Sunday, November 1. The Rev. Dr. Mellone, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, was the preacher morning and evening.

Clifton.—Miss A. Leigh Browne has generously arranged to supply copies of the sermon delivered by Dr. Martineau on the occasion of the opening of Oakfield Road Church in 1864, and with it the one preached by Dr. L. Estlin Carpenter at the Jubilee Service last month, together with a dedicatory ode by Sir John Bowring. Copies will be sent on receipt of stamp by C. Cole, 35, Manor Park, Bristol.

Liverpool.—On the invitation of Lady Bowring, Mrs. R. Crooke, Mrs. J. Grimes, and Mrs. H. D. Roberts, a very large audience of guests assembled in the Parish Hall, Grassendale, Liverpool, for a Dramatic and Musical Recital in aid of the Belgian Fund. The Belgian Consul attended, and was most sympathetically and warmly received. He commented with acute feeling on recent events and the present condition of his country, and the Vicar of Grassendale emphasized the boundless debt of Britons to Belgium. Sir Edward Russell, who had shown much kind sympathy with the effort, was unfortunately prevented from being present, as was also the French Consul for Liverpool. Many talented ladies and gentlemen, including Mr. Wilfred Shine of the Repertory Theatre, kindly gave their services as entertainers. A collection for the Belgian Fund was taken in the course of the evening, and amounted to £73 11s. 3d.

London: Bethnal Green.—The new Mansford House at Birchington in connection with the Mansford Street Church and Mission was duly opened last Whitsuntide, and has proved in every way most successful. The number of visitors during the summer months testifies to its usefulness, and the visitors themselves speak in the highest terms of all the arrangements made for their comfort and convenience. All alike are grateful for the opportunity to spend their holidays in such pleasant surroundings, and for the kindness and consideration shown to them by the Matron. From May 30 to the middle of October eighty-two visitors stayed at the Home, and of these thirty-four spent a fortnight there. Owing to the war, some thirty intending visitors had to cancel the arrangements made for their holiday, and the Home itself was closed for a week in August. At the outbreak of the war, the Committee offered the Home to the Red Cross authorities for use, if necessary, as a hospital or convalescent home. The offer was gratefully accepted, and all arrangements made to convert the rooms into a hospital at the shortest possible notice. On October 15 the first batch of wounded—seventeen Belgian soldiers—arrived, and there are at present twenty-five being cared for in the Home. How long the Home will be wanted for the wounded, and when it will be possible to resume our own holiday and convalescent work, cannot at present be determined. Meanwhile we rejoice that the Home is being put to such excellent use, and express the earnest hope that all the wounded may speedily recover their health and strength. The 47th Old Scholars' Gathering in connection with the Mission was held on Wednesday, November 4. An excellent musical programme was arranged by some members of the Ilford Orchestra.

London: Limehouse.—There has been another enlargement of the premises at Durning Hall, a handsome room having been built for the purposes of the girls' club. The extension has been carried out under the direction of Mr. Arnold S. Tayler and the last available bit of ground has been used. The Rev. John Toye presided over a large meeting of members of the Mission, and called upon Miss Dora Lawrence to speak. In a brief address Miss Lawrence spoke of the purposes which the new room was intended to serve, and then, in the presence of as many as the room would hold, declared it "open." Returning to the assembly room, short addresses were given by Miss Winnie Jones (granddaughter of the late Rev. Robert Spears), Revs. Alexander Gordon, J. Arthur Pearson, and F. Summers.

Nantwich.—On Wednesday, November 4, the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool, gave a lecture at the Unitarian Church on the question 'Is this the Last War?' While justifying the action of the nation in entering upon this campaign, he pointed out that peace as the only worthy ideal must never be lost sight of. The chair was occupied by Mr. Wilfrid Harlock, J.P., a prominent member of the local Society of Friends. After the address there was a keen discussion in which the chairman, Messrs. J. Storey, T. Harlock, Revs. J. Park Davies, and Alfred Hall, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, took part. There was a good audience, and a substantial collection was taken in aid of the Belgian Relief Fund.

North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association.—The Annual Meeting was held on October 20 at the Great Meeting, Leicester. Morning worship was conducted by Mr. H. W. Stephenson, of Loughborough, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. R. Nicol Cross, of Leeds. At the luncheon in the school, the Rev. E. I. Frupp, on behalf of the congregation, gave a welcome to the visitors. The Mayor of Leicester, Mr. J. Russell Frears, who is a member of the Free Christian Church, also said a few words. The report showed that the churches of the district were full of activity and doing their best to meet the needs of their neighbourhood. The officers were elected: President, Mr. E. Wilford, of Nottingham; Treasurer, Mr. G. A. Royce; Auditor, Mr. J. R. Gimson; Secretary, the Rev. A. Leslie Smith. The retiring President, Mr. J. T. Perry, was heartily thanked for his services. The National Conference and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association were represented by the Rev. James Harwood, who gave an address mainly on the national crisis. After tea, the usual conference was held, when the Rev. John C. Ballantyne read a paper on 'Experiments in European Unity.' It was a vigorous call to our churches to help in preparing the hearts and minds of the people for the true unity of nations which must be accomplished after the war. The paper has been printed for general circulation.

Southend.—The Southend and Westcliff United Unitarian Church held its first social gathering on November 4 at the house of Mr. T. Sloman to inaugurate the newly-formed Social and Literary Society. An excellent musical programme was given by members and friends of the congregation, and a cordial vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Sloman as chairman, and Miss Sloman, who acted as hostess.

Woolwich.—The military authorities having commandeered the hall in which the Unitarian services have been held recently a new hall was secured by the Rev. Delta Evans at very short notice on Saturday, the 7th inst., and arrangements made for holding services on the following day. The new place of meeting is the Large Hall, the Links Branch, Royal Arsenal Co-operative Society, Plumstead Common Road.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

WOMEN AND THE LAND.

The problem of increasing unemployment among women is being faced energetically by the National Political League, an organization directed by educated women which has evolved a promising scheme of constructive social reform in connection with the land. The intention is to create co-operative industries which will give an independent living to both men and women, special attention being given, however, to the problem of women of the professional class who cannot obtain work at the present time. Co-operation has been established between the Land Council of the League and the Government, and in addition to affiliation with several important bodies such as the Vacant Land Society, and the Allotments and Small Holdings Association, the help of the Studley and Swanley Horticultural Colleges has been enlisted in training students in poultry farming, dairying, market gardening, and other occupations of special value from the point of view of food supply.

THE ISLAND OF CYPRUS.

The island of Cyprus, which has just passed out of the nominal control of Turkey, is a place of some importance, being the third largest island in the Mediterranean, and having a population of over 270,000 inhabitants—Greeks, Turks, Armenians, Maronites, and some Jews. From the days when it was conquered by Richard Cœur de Lion up to the present time it has figured a great deal in the pages of history, though its early glories came to an end when it was given to the Republic of St. Mark, and starved of its revenues by the Venetians. Between the years 1200 and 1571 its wealthy nobles lived amidst surroundings of unbridled luxury and magnificence, and many splendid buildings and castles were erected, but cruelty and corruption prevailed. Its native church, says a writer in The Times, was cruelly oppressed under the Lusignans and the Venetians, but restored to some of its pride of place under the Turks, who, however, punished it severely in 1821 on the charge of sympathizing with the insurrection in Greece. The curious may be interested to learn that the Orthodox Archbishop, his Beatitude Kyrilles II., has the privilege of signing his name in vermilion ink, like a Byzantine Emperor.

A POSTER FOR THE TIMES.

A striking poster has been issued by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association setting forth, in white letters on a dull green ground, surrounded by an ornamental border, the memorable words of Abraham Lincoln, which have such special significance for our country at this crisis: "With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up this nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace." The price of the poster, which is very suitable for hanging up in schoolrooms and public halls, is 2d., and it can be obtained at Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

THE TIPPERARY LEAGUE.

The movement which has resulted in the opening of recreation rooms for the use of working-women in different parts of the country—the Tipperary Rooms in Hammersmith, opened a fortnight ago by Lady Jellicoe, were the first of the kind—is being recognized by the authorities, and it is hoped that something permanent may come of it. The idea of the Tipperary League—which, we learn from The Manchester Guardian, has registered its name—is that the work that is being done now shall not be regarded as an emergency expedient during the war only, but that it shall take firm root and become part of our national life. At present the need for social intercourse and distraction, which it is left solely to the public-house and the cheap picture palace to supply, except in the case of those who are attached to some religious organization, is greatly increased, and in no way can the cause of temperance be better served than by urging the wives and mothers and sweethearts of the men at the front to visit these informal clubs, where they can be sure of meeting with sympathizers and friends, and of finding relief from the black cloud of anxiety caused by the War. Much depends, of course, on the way things are managed, but if the movement is organized on right lines, it ought to do a great deal to brighten the lives of the hard-working women from whom the country is demanding such heavy sacrifices.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

FOR a few brief hours the death of Lord Roberts in France has almost eclipsed our interest in the War. His great services to the country have received a glowing tribute in Parliament and the Press, and his stately burial in St. Paul's was the fitting close to a career which was crowned long ago with national honour and affection. We are not in our hearts a military people, and there was nothing conventional in the feeling which Lord Roberts aroused. We recognized in him not only a born leader of men, one of the adventurous spirits who greet the hour of danger with matchless courage, but also a character of singular uprightness and modesty, for whom the country and its cause were always more important than himself.

PERHAPS even greater than his victories was the work which he did for the common soldier. He knew his men, and he desired that they should be good men. Accordingly he waged unceasing war against the temptations which beset them. He warned them in plain terms against the danger of drink and other vices; and by the reforms which he promoted, and above all by his own example, he made it easier for them to stand firm. The source of it all was to be found in his religion, for, like many other great soldiers, he was a humble-minded Christian. In his speech in Parliament on Tuesday Lord Curzon quoted the following words, written by him a little more than a fortnight ago: "We have had family prayers for 55 years. Our chief reason is that they bring the household together as nothing else can." Not less interesting as a revelation of character are the words which he spoke to a friend just before he started on his last journey: "I am going over to France. I must go and see the Indian soldiers. It is the most useful thing which I can do at this moment."

ON Tuesday Mr. Lloyd George made his financial statement in the House of Commons, and received the assent of men of all parties to his policy of an immediate increase in taxation. We are glad that he brushed aside the specious plea that for the moment we should rely upon our power of borrowing, without placing fresh burdens upon our own shoulders. To do so would be bad finance, but it would be worse morality. Everybody in the country ought to bear some part of the common burden in a way that can be felt. The case for prompt and liberal payment is simply this, to adopt Mr. Lloyd George's own words: the vast majority of us cannot, owing to age, or infirmity, or physical disability, share the toils and dangers of those who are risking their lives, but we can display the same readiness to render all the help in our power to our country in her need.

A SELECT COMMITTEE of the House of Commons has been appointed to reconsider the scale of pensions and allowances to soldiers and sailors and their dependents. There is a widespread desire to be generous in the matter, and there will be a good deal of disappointment if it is not found possible to recommend substantial increases in some directions. The sum of 7s. 6d. weekly for a childless widow has called forth a great deal of criticism, and it is hoped that this may be raised to 10s. It is not, however, a matter which can be settled by sentiment alone, and the sad fact must be remembered that nothing we can do will place a family which has been bereaved by the War in the same position in which it was before. It is also a mistake to speak of the men in our army as though they were simply hired servants, who are fighting on behalf of somebody else. They are serving their country, which means that they are doing their best to uphold their own cause and fighting in defence of their own homes.

THIS sentiment of the common country has been expressed admirably by the writer in The Times Literary Supplement, to whom we are indebted for a series of articles dealing with some of the deeper issues of the present crisis. In an article on 'England,' which appeared on Thursday, he contrasts German patriotism—which is largely idolatry for an abstraction conceived as perfect and without blemish—with the Englishman's more practical and common-sense attitude towards actual human beings. "We are always aware," he writes, "that institutions consist of human beings. The country itself consists of them, and we cannot separate it from them, from the Englishman whom we meet in the street and the train, and who are obviously very imperfect creatures like ourselves. To the German Deutschland is something that does not consist of Germans. It is over all—over the Germans, as well as every one else. It is an abstraction which can do no wrong, and of which it were blasphemy to speak ill.” “One is inclined to wonder,” he continues, “whether the Germans worship their abstract Deutschland so hard that they have no energy left to love the real Germany; whether, indeed, it exists for them at all, except as a means of performing the will of that abstraction. But there is no doubt that for us the real England does exist, and that we love it all the more because we have not forgotten it to go and worship an idol. It means for us people and concrete things, and a past and a future of people and concrete things. We know it so well that we are always a little astonished at what it has done, as people are surprised by genius when it appears in their own family.”

* * *

It is not for us to say whether Germans would accept this description of their “Deutschland, Deutschland über alles” as the idolatry of an abstraction, but we think that this writer shows true perception when he says that we love England the more because we love her this side of idolatry, and retain our right to criticize one another’s faults. What admirable good sense there is in the following words: “For all of us now this little land is abundant of meaning, and we seem to each other to be all of one family in our ancient home that is neither prison nor palace. We are men fighting, or ready to fight, for no idol that sanctifies even her own crimes, but for the English of the future, who will do better, we hope, than we have done, and make this home of ours fairer than we have made it; and besides that we fight for certain things that seem good to us, as kindness, freedom, and good faith. They are modest virtues, not fit for a towering idol, but men cannot be happy without them. They are not always our virtues, perhaps, but we wish that they were, and we listen to no professors who tell us that they are vices. We have been at ease in our home for so long that we did not know how much we loved it until it was threatened; and now we are surprised by our own passion and by the speaking beauty of our country-side and the grey churches in it and the villagers that seem to trust so quietly in our defence of them.”

PERHAPS it is in this spirit that we had better speak of Mr. Bernard Shaw’s strange effusion in The New Statesman last week. He has long been our chartered libertine of criticism, and often when his sarcasm has been most savage and reckless there have been signs that he was only dissembling his love. Indeed, why should he take so much trouble with our faults, and gird at our shallow hypocrisy with such tiresome iteration, and continue to make London his home, if we are only fit for mocking laughter? So when he tells us that in most things Germany is more democratic than ourselves we suppose he is only trying to provoke us by a jest into removing some of the blemishes which still annoy him. But this long and sprawling pamphlet called ‘Common Sense about the War’ is a poor exhibition of his skill. It would have amused us and irritated us, and bitten into the public mind, if its satirical humour had been condensed into a few pages. As it is we grow weary before we are half way through its tangled maze of forced witticisms and inconsistent statements. No doubt Mr. Shaw is quite convinced that he is the only wise man who can discern between truth and falsehood in a world of hypocrites; but fortunately there are few people foolish enough to take him at his own valuation.

UGHT we to pay our debts? Apparently the answer of some people is, Not in war-time. There ought to be severe public condemnation of the simple dishonesty of some fashionable people who refuse to pay their tradesmen’s bills because they are spending their money on objects connected with the war. A writer in The Manchester Guardian gives an instance of a business woman in London who felt herself forced into writing to ask for payment of some of the longest outstanding accounts in order to meet her private and business liabilities. Here are two of the replies which she received:—

“You have,” said one, “my keenest sympathy in your temporary financial difficulties, but as I have so many demands on my purse from the different funds which must be supported, I cannot possibly send you a cheque, but shall be glad if you will let me have the list of things enclosed and put them to my standing account. I will come and see you again as soon as I can find the time.” Another wrote: “I am so sorry to hear that you are hard up like the rest of us, but am sure you will understand how one has to put one’s own concerns on one side when there are so many poor people, besides our soldiers and sailors, needing all the money we can give. I will send you a cheque as soon as I can spare it.”

IN another case, quoted by the same writer, a dressmaker was compelled to press for payment of accounts long overdue. One customer who owed from £60 to £80 wrote most indignantly, saying that she “was greatly surprised to receive a letter asking for even part of the amount, as Madam — must know the urgent demands upon both her time and money with committee meetings and funds to support. Until these ceased her dressmaker’s bill was the very last thing she should think of paying.”

The writer who quotes these shameful cases of refusal to pay lawful debts on the part of wealthy women deals very leniently with them. “One cannot class such women amongst the absolutely selfish. It is just a failure to look at circumstances from a really practical point of view.” The whole proceeding is described as “thoughtless generosity,” surely far too gentle a term of rebuke. If poor people did this sort of thing they would be treated as flagrantly dishonest.

* * *

Among the numerous pamphlets which have been issued lately we desire to call special attention to ‘The Allies of Faith,’ a sermon preached in the Chapel of Manchester College, Oxford, by Dr. William Adams Brown, of Union Theological Seminary, New York, and published by Mr. B. H. Blackwell. It strikes a deeper note than many war sermons, and ends with a confident appeal to faith in the future.

“What will it avail to disperse the armies on the field if the forces that inspire them remain unsubdued? Our most dangerous foes are within—selfishness and pride and fear, which have dogged man’s footsteps in all his upward struggle from the brute, and which are even now trying to drag us from the vantage ground of faith. We must meet these enemies in our own hearts, and conquer them there first of all, if we are to have any hope of conquering them elsewhere. We must close our ears to the voices that would persuade us that goodwill and confidence are impossible between the peoples of mankind, and that the final law of nations must remain in the future, as in the past, the law of the jungle. We must win from the very tragedy of the time one more proof of the lesson which Christ taught so many centuries ago, that love is fulfilled through sacrifice, and that God, man’s great fellow-sufferer and unconquerable ally, is never nearer than in these inner crises of the soul which make supreme demand upon faith and love.”

THE CHEERFUL TAX-PAYER

It is the privilege of every true-born Briton to grumble at his taxes. We hope that we shall all be too patriotic to grumble at the present time. We have all known that it was coming, for a war which costs one million a day has to be paid for; but now that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has spoken there is likely to be a mood of momentary consternation in many quarters. Less money for ourselves and more for the State means a revision of habit, the curtailment of comforts to which we had grown accustomed, a simpler and harder way of living. We may be forgiven if we take a short time in order to adjust ourselves to a policy of retrenchment; but then we ought to face the issue bravely and cheerfully, and to despise ourselves as slaves to the costly apparatus of living if we fail to do so. Here we wish to consider the matter from the point of view of religious principle, and to suggest a few plain thoughts to our readers for their consideration.

First of all, we have to consider the public object for which we have to pay. For people who agree with the attitude which we have supported—and they are the vast majority of the nation—this is a War in which we are in no sense the aggressors. Obligations of honour and the imperative needs of self-defence left us no alternative. Every one whose judgment is clear on this matter must be prepared to pay the terrible cost in blood and treasure. This country is likely to see far less of the devastation of war than any other of the combatants. We are paying in hard cash for the privilege of helping Belgium and France, and we are glad to do it. We are also paying for the security of our own land. If we can keep our fields unravaged, our homes inviolate, our towns free from the spoiler, small indeed is the ransom which we have to find for these priceless blessings. Let every man and woman in these islands look this alternative plainly in the face, and there will be no trumpery abuse of the new taxation simply because it affects our own pockets.

But there is another way in which it is natural for the Christian heart to face the situation. The demand which is made is one for personal sacrifice, but it is sacrifice in a direction which is, comparatively speaking, unimportant. The homes which have laid their dearest affections on the altar of the country's need will not turn rebellious at the thought of giving their money as well. When the call comes day by day for men, the demands of the tax-collector are quite trivial. We know that for many of us it is hard to feel this quite sincerely. Anything less than the style of living to which we have been accustomed has the appearance of poverty; and poverty to the civilized man seems one of the worst of evils. All the self-conscious cultivation of the simple life has done little to weaken our attachment to money, because expensiveness is inseparable from artificial simplicity. The only thing that can do it is vital Christianity. "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." We repeat these words without really believing them, and our daily habits and ambitions, even in matters of religion, cry out against their truth. Our whole life has been coarsened and degraded by its devotion to money. We should be keener thinkers, nobler lovers, better servants of God, if we thought less about it, and gave less pride of place and power to the rich man simply because he is rich. We hope that enough Christianity remains in our hearts to enable us to accept financial burdens quite cheerfully, without the moaning and dismay which would only be fitting if the citadel of the soul were threatened. To a few people there may even come a feeling of gladness, as they realize that for themselves and others luxury will become a little more difficult. It is not only high thinking that goes with plain living. There is also more room in the heart for God.

Everything, however, will depend upon how we decide to order our lives under the pressure of new financial burdens. This is the practical task which all of us have to face, and it will be a searching test of character. It is the things about which we care least which will go first. Many people are likely to try the experiment of maintaining their purely personal expenditure at the old level while they effect a drastic reduction in their subscriptions to charitable and religious objects. The plea that they cannot afford to do anything else will be accepted in many quarters as quite reasonable, but it is an excuse which reveals them in their true light as chiefly lovers of themselves. A policy of this kind, if it were adopted widely, would be fatal in two directions. It would lead to a serious degradation of personal character. If we do not bear the sufferings of this present time together, and accept their discipline in a noble spirit, they will simply make us coarse and hard. No man can be a trifler in the day of visitation without losing his own soul. And selfishness of this kind would inflict terrible wounds upon society as a whole. It is a policy of making the church, the hospital, the orphanage, and all the other institutions which we equip and support by common effort for the common good, pay for the war. Few men of humane feeling would continue to clothe themselves in purple and fine linen, and fare sumptuously every day, if they could be brought face to face with the hard fact that niggardliness in giving because of the new taxes must mean the gradual extinction of many of the things which ennoble our national life. Private retrenchment, more modesty in their needs, greater strictness in personal desires, will not do them any harm, but public retrenchment in the institutions of love and Christian service will mean widespread impoverishment just in those directions where wealth is life. We do not mean that those who derive their income from service in these institutions—clergy, doctors, teachers, and many other servants of the public—ought not to suffer with their fellow-citizens when money becomes scarce. If they are worthy of their calling they will be the first to offer to do so. But at all costs the philanthropy of the world must be kept going and its pursuit of high ideals encouraged. For our own part we can make up our minds that we will go forward to meet our hardships with cheerfulness, determined that so far as in us lies we will do nothing by word or deed to limit public beneficence, or to clip the wings of religion, or to quench the charity which suffers long and is kind.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

IN A GLASS DARKLY.

THAT is best for me which Love itself, my heavenly Father, designeth and chooseth for my good. I hope I may never dare to think again that He wanteth wisdom or love; or that I could choose better for myself than He doth, if He had left me to my choice.

And now as ever Thou helpest mine infirmities; for though but a little portion of Thee can be heard by human ear, and the thunder of Thy power who can understand? Yet parts of Thy ways Thou teachest me, that I may learn to trust Thee in that which I see not.

Thou teachest me that Thou hast laid Thy hand upon me to humble me; that the planting of the Lord, the tree of righteousness, needs a twofold growth, a downward growth of root, as well as an upward growth of branch; that downward growth of a deeper sense of sin and weakness, of struggle and difficulty which wraps our roots about the Rock of Ages, and makes us cry: Lord, do Thou save me, or I perish. Did the tree grow upwards alone, how could it stand in the day of windy storm and tempest? Ah, Lord God, in that which, judging as human feelings persuade us, seems to us like the absence of growth, and going back from Thee—the sense of sin and shortcoming; the weakness which would, but knows not how to perform; the loss of joy, and the presence of sore conflict—perchance Thou seest the truest growth, the roots striking down through all vain and perishable things to take hold of a diviner strength, even the everlasting strength of the Lord God, a strength which shall enable us hereafter to bear a greater weight of blossom and fruit unto Thee, without being overthrown by pride; and to be as a tree planted by the waters, and which spreadeth out her roots by the rivers, whose leaf fadeth not.

What else is dark to me in my life, and seems to me stunting and laming, I must leave unto Thee, who watchest over me, not to pluck up, and to break down, and to destroy and to afflict, but to plant and to build; and who hast promised to make darkness light and crooked things straight.

May I learn to say with one of Thy servants, who being asked in his anguish of pain, whether he saw any reason for his suffering, answered: "None but God's will, and God's will is the perfection of reason." The reason of much that Thou doest I may now know not at all, or know only in part, but Thy will I know, which is the perfection of reason; and though I cannot understand, I can love and suffer and submit. Now I see Thee by means of a glass darkly in dim reflections in Thy word, in Thy works, and in Thy providence. But when the veil of the flesh is rent, then in that great hereafter, I shall see Thee face to face, and know even as I am known of Thee.

Much in our lives, looked at from this world alone, may seem dark and meaningless, like a stained glass window seen from without; but if they be faithfully built into the living temple whose cornerstone is Christ, then when death places us on the right side of them, and we look at them from behind the veil, their darkness shall resolve itself into Thy light, and they shall be seen to be bright with the glory of martyr, and saint, and angel, and celestial radiance.—From 'Christ the Consoler,' by Ellice Hopkins.

SYMBOLS OF VICTORY.

YELLOW leaves on the ash-tree,
Soft glory in the air,
And the streaming radiance of sunshine
On the leaden clouds over there.

At a window a child's mouth smiling,
Overhung with tearful eyes,
At the flying rainy landscape
And the sudden opening skies.

Angels hanging from heaven,
A whisper in dying ears,
And the promise of great salvation
Shining on mortal fears.

A dying man on his pillow,
Whose white soul, fled to his face,
Puts on her garment of joyfulness,
And stretches to Death's embrace.

Passion, rapture, and blindness,
Yearning, aching, and fears,
And Faith and Duty gazing
With steadfast eyes upon tears.

I see, or the glory blinds me
Of a soul divinely fair,
Peace after great tribulation,
And victory hung in the air.

WILLIAM CALDWELL ROSCOE.

O GOD, thou only refuge of thy children! who remainest true though all else should fail, and livest though all things die, cover us now when we fly to thee. Rebuke within us all immoderate desires, all unquiet temper, all presumptuous expectations, all ignoble self-indulgence; and feeling on us the embrace of thy Fatherly hand, may we meekly and with courage go into the darkest ways of our pilgrimage; anxious not to change thy perfect will, but only to do and bear it worthily. May we spend all our days as in thy presence, and meet our death in the strength of thy promise, and pass hence into the nearer light of thy knowledge and thy love. Amen.

THE SECRET WAY.

"Meum secretum mihi."—St. Bernard.

MYSTICISM is a word of fear, unpleasing to the ear of the average Englishman. He vaguely believes that it represents superstition, idolatry, spiritualism, asceticism, and other practices and phenomena which the true mystic repudiates. The mystic way is, indeed, a secret way, known only to those who are in it, and "hidden and shut off from Men who are purely Scholastic, unless they be humble" (Molinos).

But although it is unknown to the materialists and the worldly-wise, the idealists—philosophers, theologians, poets, artists, and scientists—often stumble upon it, and sometimes walk in it unconsciously, declaring meanwhile with the average man that it is a byway leading to destruction, or that it does not exist at all. Nevertheless, it is a great highway through the "field full of folk," and is made up of the imperceptible blending of innumerable single tracks, going straight onward to a goal visible to each individual pilgrim. Men may run, walk, crawl, or adopt fantastic methods of progression, but the Way is the same, and so long as they live they move—forwards or backwards. They may choose to walk amongst or apart from their fellow-travellers, but there is always a strange free-masonry between the mystics, though they cannot reveal their secret knowledge even to each other. It is always a personal revelation — ineffable, incommunicable; and it may come through love, joy, pain, loneliness, sorrow, fear, despair, success, or any emotional experience strong enough to bring the soul into the mood of receptiveness. There are many angels to guide the soul into that Valley of Humiliation which lies near the Interpreter's House.

The mystic's way of life is essentially paradoxical. He is scorned as a selfish, ineffective dreamer, but in reality his ideal is self-forgetful service, and he may be dimly aware in a subconscious manner that he is a leader as well as a discernor of the thoughts of other men. The mystic is a channel through which spiritual power is poured into the world, and thus his influence is almost irresistible. Usually it is quite intangible, and the results cannot be tabulated in the ledgers of revivalists, preachers, teachers, or societies. The unrecognized ministry of women in the Church is a witness to its power. Probably no great work has ever been begun without the mystic, and the vision of the seer, though his task is that of inspiration rather than actual performance, and his only instrument may be prayer and meditation.

Mysticism has been described as "the raw material of all religion" (W. R. Inge). It is also called the love, the knowledge, or the vision of God, according to the individual soul's emphasis upon love, light, or life. But whether it appears to the devout soul in one or all of these aspects—practical, emotional, or intellectual—the experience is always individual, immediate, and incommunicable; yet the mystic seldom refrains from endeavouring to guide his brethren into his own way of peace.

The phase which is called "conversion" is, then, the state in which the self becomes conscious of its own power of determination, and, turning to the Good, becomes aware of a definite response. The mystical state is more than a "consciousness of illumination" (W. James), for the soul receives not only light, but life and love, and a sense of unity which dispels for ever the apparent duality of life and death, spirit and matter, or even (in the largest sense) of good and evil. There is a stage when the individual must be intensely dualistic, while the great determination is being made, and a strong reaction may occur, involving a period of struggle with temptation and a strict course of self-discipline. But this exercise, in which the will is developed for the future service of the spirit, should be only a temporary stage. Nevertheless, there are many devout persons who never pass beyond it, and it is this which often makes the lives of saints painful reading. The disciplinary period is very necessary and fruitful, but "purgation" is not the only state of the spiritual life, any more than the ecstatic joy of vision and rapture. The mystic's life is chequered with nights and days and grey dawns and twilights, but no one state should be continuous. To the true mystic "purgation" is a part of the educative process, and its duration depends on the individual, though its results persist throughout the life. Pain is a great mystery, but to the mystic it may be revealed as a sacrament, a sharing of the divine life in the suffering yet triumphing Christ, who is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Other worlds may have a different dispensation, but this one has been, and is still being, redeemed from the sin of self-will through the suffering by which the conflict between good and evil is realized, while life and being conquer death and destruction. The true mystic, in conscious relation with a spiritual sphere and spiritual powers, may rise to a vision of the unity of life in which all experiences are transfigured, and sorrow is felt as "a solemn kind of joy." To such souls, because of their relation to the Infinite, the "exterior life" may be intensely significant and symbolical or else a matter of indifference, and these two phases interchange without inconsistency. There are many hours when the world is intensely real—when the heart aches with the world's sorrow, mourns for its sins, and rejoices with its joy, and works for the coming of the Kingdom of Heaven on earth as if man's temporal progress were an end, instead of the means to a spiritual goal. But above and pervading all is that Eternity in which the mystic lives and moves and has his being, and therefore the material world is all or nothing as the Divine Will may seem to command at the moment. It is possible, even essential, to work whole-heartedly in the humblest service of humanity, and yet to have the power to withdraw into the silence of that hidden temple which awaits the pilgrim at every resting-place upon the secret way. "In the time of trouble he shall hide me in his tabernacle: yea, in the secret place of his dwelling shall he hide me," wrote the Hebrew psalmist, and not in trouble and danger alone, for "whoso dwelleth in the secret place of the most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." The temple in Jerusalem and the highway described by the prophets were earthly symbols of that secret way and hidden sanctuary of the mystics which are in all ages the same, and yet to each one, "My Secret to myself."

THE CENTENARY OF ANGLO-AMERICAN PEACE.

SIR,—It had been the intention of this Committee to have commenced the Celebration of the Centenary of the Treaty of Ghent and the completion of One Hundred Years of Peace among English-speaking peoples by appropriate Religious Services of Thanksgiving in all the Churches on Peace Sunday (the Sunday next before Christmas) of the present year. To this end a meeting of representatives of the Churches was held at Central Buildings, Westminster, Lord Shaw of Dunfermline presiding, on July 10 last, when a common policy in regard to the participation of the Churches in the Celebration was unanimously agreed upon. The following decisions were then arrived at:—

(1) To invite all the Churches to hold special Thanksgiving Services on December 20, 1914, for the Century of Anglo-American Peace.

(2) To request them to take offerings at these services on behalf of the British Peace Centenary Fund.

(3) To ask the several Churches to send Fraternal Messages to their corresponding denominations in the United States.

(4) To invite them to consider the question of offering some permanent Commemorative Gift to a central church or building of their connection in America; and

(5) To suggest a general exchange of pulpits with American divines (so far as possible) for that or some other convenient date.

Since the above meeting took place this Committee has received many indications of the interest of British Churches in these proposals, and of their readiness to co-operate.

The unhappy outbreak of the great European War has, however, created an entirely new situation, and has made advisable a substantial alteration of existing plans which it is the object of this communication to indicate.

Although the Old World is ravaged by war, the great achievement of a completed century of Anglo-American Peace still remains a source of profound thankfulness and encouragement, and the British, the American, and the Canadian Committees for the Celebration still hold that the Celebration should take place, though its date will have, of necessity, to be postponed. They are, therefore, holding their organizations together, and as soon as a favourable opportunity presents itself they will make public announcement of the revised arrangements for the holding of the Celebration.

With regard, therefore, to the participation of the various British Churches in the Celebration, we ask that the programme of activities agreed upon by the representative meeting of July 10 shall be regarded as postponed, but not abandoned. Amidst the present preoccupation of the religious world in the tasks of healing and succour made imperative by the incidents of war, we feel that it would be improper to make the demands upon the energies and resources of the Churches on behalf of our Celebration at this moment which were originally contemplated. But we ask them to bear in mind the great and glorious pacific achievement which the Celebration is intended to mark, and when the proper time arrives to give us again their valued support and goodwill.

In the meantime we venture to request that a full reference to the Hundred Years' Peace be made from the pulpits of the British Churches on Peace Sunday (December 20), in order to keep the subject of the Celebration fresh in the public mind, whilst at the same time affording grounds for confidence and encouragement in these days of trial, suffering, and the disappointment of so many hopes for the pacific development of our civilization.

On behalf of the British Committee for the Celebration,

SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE,
Chairman of Executive.

THE PUBLIC-HOUSE AND THE ARMY.

SIR,—I trust we shall not drift into recriminations about words, &c., but keep to the question of the danger of the public-house to men in uniform; whether officers or men does not matter, nor is it of importance to give chapter and verse where the facts are so widely known. Here in Newbury, where we have a training camp, and prisoners' compound with troops in charge, we have illustrations enough. It is an old charge, well-worn, that temperance advocates are intemperate in speech. Let it pass. The danger is real enough, and intemperate language does not exaggerate it. Lord Roberts, Lord Wolseley, were not teetotal fanatics, nor is Lord Kitchener, and they realized the evil of the public treating the soldier to drink. They are ably supported by Sir Thomas Barlow, Sir Victor Horsley, Sir Frederick Treves, Surgeon-General Evatt, Dr. Sims Woodhead, and others at the head of the medical profession, who together make an earnest patriotic appeal to the public to avoid the practice. Lord Kitchener asks us to give the soldiers every assistance in resisting the temptation. He also suggests that where soldiers are stationed, committees should be formed to educate public opinion on the subject, and bring home its importance to those who prevent our soldiers from being able to do their duty to their country in a thoroughly efficient manner.

I am pleased to be able to say that we have succeeded in meeting the evil to some extent in our town: the hours for the sale of drink have been curtailed; we have a women's organization looking after the wives of the men gone to the front, who have rather more money to spend than usual; we have also a servants' club, to look after servant girls sent adrift on to the streets by parsimonious employers; and we are trying to provide evening entertainment, &c., without the drink for the soldiers. This is work that churches should attend to, and the purpose, I believe, of your own editorials, and of the correspondence in your columns is to stir up our churches to this special war-time responsibility.—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD NEWELL.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—May I ask your help to let the teachers and others know that, owing to the war, the usual autumnal meeting has to be given up, though the Officers and Committee are sorry to lose the opportunity of meeting many old and new friends this year. While long journeys are difficult at present, they hope that the District Unions will by their activity do the work of the central meeting. The members of the Summer Session who were at Oxford when the war began will remember gratefully that the bond of their common purpose made it easier to go on with the work in spite of the war. District and local meetings can in the same way do much to encourage and cheer. Religious education in these times has a great responsibility to keep the loftiest ideals before the scholars. The children are the greatest treasure of the Church, and not one of them ought to lose any teaching that we have power to give.

The President has kindly agreed to send a New Year's Letter to all the young men in the Army or Navy who are connected with our Schools as teachers or scholars. May I therefore ask that lists of these be got ready with full details of unit or ship. A form to be filled up and returned to me with this information will be sent out with the Committee's Annual Letter in about a fortnight's time.—Yours, &c., T. M. CHALMERS,

Hon. Secretary.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

EAST AND WEST.

Appearances: being Notes of Travel. By G. Lowes Dickinson. London: J. M. Dent & Sons, 4s. 6d. net.

MR. LOWES DICKINSON's short articles on Eastern travel were delightful when they appeared in The Manchester Guardian. We are doubtful whether they are quite so good in the form of a book. They are simply impressions of men and towns and vast spaces of country gathered hastily and coloured by the passing mood of a highly sympathetic mind. Mr. Dickinson went avowedly to learn, and it is evidently his own reflections on religion and racial characteristics which he values most highly. But the philosophy of his book, if such it may be called, rests on too slender a foundation of experience, and is coloured by the inclination to regard his own countrymen as rather stupid and superficial. Perhaps the latter trait is almost inevitable in a writer who tries to face many of the problems of civilization without any of the familiar shibboleths about East and West. Those nations he regards as civilized that "can live and express life," and from this point of view he inveighs against the prejudice that the Japanese, and all other Orientals, are "inferior" races. We are in cordial agreement with him, but the insight and appreciation which he uses so deftly in his descriptions of India and Japan are sadly lacking in the crude sarcasm meted out to English Christianity. In these passages Mr. Dickinson ceases to be the observant traveller, and writes as the clever don in revolt against Anglican forms. The concluding essay, written at home in a later mood of reflection, is one of the most interesting things in the book. The spell of India has ceased to work so powerfully, and he sees quite clearly that a religion which places no value upon activity in Time has simply ignored a precious element in human experience. "The West," he writes, "is adventurous; and, what is more, it is adventurous on a quest. For behind and beyond all its fatuities, confusions, crimes, lies, as the justification of it all, that deep determination to secure a society more just and more humane which inspires all men and all movements that are worth considering at all, and, to those who can understand, gives greatness and significance even to some of our most reckless enterprises. We are living very 'dangerously'; all the forces are loose, those of destruction as well as those of creation; but we are living towards something; we are living with the religion of Time." Between this religion of Time and the religion of Eternity, as taught by Indian sages and most Western mystics, he finds an impassable gulf. To his mind the two things are altogether incompatible. He leaves us with a creed of noble action plus agnosticism, which we are convinced can never bring satisfaction either to the intellect or to the affections. But we cannot enter into these profound questions at the end of a review. The book, except for the intrusive chapters on America, is full of pleasantness, and, as we have tried to show, rich in material for thought.

WITH POOR IMMIGRANTS TO AMERICA:
By Stephen Graham. London: Macmillan & Co. 8s. 6d. net.

IT is odd to think of Mr. Stephen Graham in America, for he has won his laurels as the interpreter of the peasant mind of Russia. Has he fallen a victim to the itch of book-making, and begun to plan strange adventures simply for the pleasure of describing them? There is, we confess, some suggestion of journalistic globe-trotting and a deliberate pose in his latest book. He has been to America and walked about in it for a short time, and he is full of impressions for which he is anxious to find a public; but it does not follow that he has anything very new or original to say. He draws the life on an emigrant ship with a vivid pen; he conducts us into many queer holes and corners; he travels from place to place as an amateur tramp; and then he is ready to describe for our benefit exactly how American life in town and country reacts upon his own mind. But he leaves us wondering why he thinks it worth while to anatomize a great nation on such a casual store of knowledge. He is, of course, much too good a writer not to say many acute and some brilliant things. We like the remark that there is danger that civilization itself may become America's superman. There is also a warning in the following words which some people in this country would do well to lay to heart: "What is called religion is a sort of ethical rampage. The descendants of the Puritans are 'probing sin' and 'whipping vice.' The rich are signing cheques, the hospitals are receiving cheques. The women of the upper classes are visiting the poor and adopting the waifs. But seldom did I come in contact with a man or a woman who stood in humble relation to God or the mystery of life. Even the great passion to put things right, lift the masses, stop corruption, and build beautiful cities and states is begotten in the sureness of science rather than in the fear of the Lord." If we have been a little niggardly in our praise, it is because we believe that Mr. Stephen Graham is capable of better things than hurried magazine articles. His new book will hardly add to his reputation, but it is picturesque and animated, and much fuller of human interest than most novels.

A SECOND series of A SOWER WENT FORTH, Sermons by the late Rev. T. W. M. Lund, of Liverpool, has just been issued (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 5s. net). It will be treasured by those who can hear the preacher's voice and feel the touch of his personality in the printed words. The volume contains fifty sermons—Mr. Lund had evidently learned the value which is attached to brevity by a modern congregation—and it is pervaded by what he himself called "Broad Church" ideals. By this phrase, however, he meant tolerant sympathy rather than heretical theology. He was a humanist in the pulpit, keenly interested in art and literature and the joys of social intercourse in their connexion with the higher life of a great city. The title of one of his sermons, 'The Hospitality of the Mind,' expresses exactly his own attitude and his unfailing joy in the catholicity of life.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE SEA FIGHT.

I THINK I see him, the famous British admiral, fighting his daily battle. The sun has not long risen, and there is a whistling wind—the piper of a coming gale. But he is in his cabin standing before a table, resting his weight upon his outspanned fingers. His lips are firmly closed, and he is gazing intently at two fleets of diminutive brass models of warships. From time to time one hand is raised, then the other, as he moves now one, now another ship, now all the line. He is fighting his morning battle, which he never omits, and the imaginary foe must haul down his colours before the Admiral breaks his fast.

In his cabin, in his imagination, in his heart is the daily battle fought by the dauntless seaman.

THE ARTIST AND THE LION.

HE is a Japanese artist who lives in a paper house in the midst of a charming, fantastic garden with pools of water-lilies and goldfish, toy bridges and dwarf trees, peach and cherry in lovely pink-and-white blossom in the Spring; and chrysanthemums of many colours in the autumn. He has risen from the mat on which he sleeps, and after he has bathed he enters his studio. The artist kneels upon a small rug, and having spread on the clean, white floor a sheet of thin rice paper, takes his pencil and begins to draw. Thin, curving lines like fine waving hair seem to be combed out gently upon the surface. Then bold, massive strokes. See what is coming! It is the head of a lion, his great mane erect, his bearded jaw, his kingly, terrible eye. Pillars of strength the legs. The two forepaws grip forward at the earth. A glimpse of the muscular haunches and of the nervous tail curving dangerously behind. The great beast recoils as though surprised, and stands on guard, defiant.

The artist lays down his pencil, folds his hands, and looks passively at his own creation. Presently he rises; his face is calm and strong. He picks up the drawing and lays it aside upon a pile of others—slain lions in every conceivable attitude of attack and retreat. Now he returns with paints and brushes to work upon a beautiful landscape that is but half-finished.

No morning passes but he first looks his lion in the face and makes himself master.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. WILLIAM ROSLING.

EARLY on Sunday morning, November 7, there passed away in Bradford one who for eight years had been in the ranks of the Unitarian ministry, but remained almost unknown outside the county of York. Born in a Lincolnshire village in 1853 of humble parents, Scottish by descent, and Roman Catholic in religion, the spiritual pilgrimage of William Rosling forms one of those romances of the religious life that are unrecorded by ecclesiastical historians. Driven by need as a child of seven to shoulder the burden of a breadwinner in a large family, his early education was secured only through much perseverance and self-denial. Becoming acquainted with Methodism during a brief residence with an aunt, at the age of 17 he was a local preacher, and six years later entered the regular ministry of the Primitive Methodist Church. A careful inquirer and conscientious student all his days, after four years of circuit work he felt the need for more preparation for the ministry. Being now estranged from Methodism, he became in 1880 a student of Glasgow University. Here and at the Free Church College he studied four years, maintaining himself by teaching and mission work. From 1889 to 1902 he was in the Congregational ministry in Glasgow, Belfast, Oban, and Ryan Street, Bradford. Whilst in Scotland he formed a close friendship with David Macrae, by whom he was much influenced. In Bradford his bold liberal doctrine and intrepid advocacy of Temperance led to dissent and division in the congregation and a violent controversy in the local press. Throughout this troubled time William Rosling indulged in no rancour or vituperation, but maintained the sweet reasonableness which always marked his utterances. Together with fifty members of his congregation he withdrew from Ryan Street. The resolution to enter the Unitarian ministry quickly followed, and the generous assistance of Yorkshire friends led to the erection of the Broadway Avenue Church. To build up a new Unitarian congregation in the working-class district of a city conspicuous for liberalism was no light or easy task, but William Rosling surrendered himself to it with unremitting zeal and enthusiasm. No work was too great and none too small for him if thereby the welfare of school or church might be promoted. The respect he won from men who differed from him in opinion was shown by the spontaneous offers of ministers and lay-preachers of "orthodox" churches to supply his pulpit during his illness. William Rosling was a man of remarkable modesty, animated by a rare spirit of self-sacrifice. Kindly and good-humoured, tolerant and forbearing in disposition, he was fearless in speech and act when fighting for truth, liberty, or religion. One who has known him intimately for half-a-dozen years may be permitted to express his personal obligations to a brother minister whose life and labours have been a constant source of inspiration. "Sit mea anima cum illo."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

THE following manifesto, addressed to "the Women of the Empire," and signed by a large number of representative women, has been issued by the National Council of Public Morals:—

Nelson's words to his men before battle have rung down the ages, still waking an answer in every Englishman's heart. The present national crisis has a similar message for women—a message which will never be uttered with deeper and more serious intent—the Empire expects every woman to do her duty.

The great rally to voluntary service on the part of women throughout the country is sufficient evidence that women are willing and eager to answer the call. What they have not, perhaps, wholly realized is that work is not the only interpretation of the word 'duty.' The influence a woman exerts is far greater by virtue of her personality than of her work, and it is given to every one of us to exercise an influence by personal example.

Let us then examine what we conceive to be a woman's duty at this time of national crisis. It is not for us to fight a temporal foe—woman's duty and woman's work consist in fighting the armies of disorder, want, impurity, and vice, and it is to this end that our spiritual forces must be directed. Lord Kitchener's admonition to the army on the eve of war evokes a feeling of gratitude in every mother that so high a standard of English manhood should have been set before our men.

The duties then enjoined are doubly strong in their appeal to women, for it is by our personal example that we can help the men to live up to the required standard. By living purely and temperately at home, we can set a fine example of duty and self-control to those whom we ask to respect women in other lands.

The present crisis is revealing conditions of demoralization and drink in some parts of England, among men and women, which lead us to the conclusion that the great part which women can and should play in this war has not yet been fully understood by all. The miserable consequences caused by alcoholic excess and sexual irregularities should be explained to young women, and older women could, by kindly and sympathetic teaching, help many girls to realize that vices not only mean disease in those who are guilty of them, but that they bequeath a terrible legacy of blindness, deafness, insanity, and death to the innocent children who are born as a result of irregular unions.

Knowing as we do from the evidence recently given before the Royal Commission that all attempts at regulation and revival of the Contagious Diseases Acts would not only be morally wrong, but also medically valueless, we beg to record a very strong protest against any attempts at regulation.

Never was a supply of healthy, vigorous children more necessary to our nation. We are suffering to-day from the effects of a birth-rate which has fallen rapidly; we are also suffering from the ill-health and feeble-mindedness of many children who are the innocent victims of their parents' sins.

Will the women of England unite in a great movement towards a finer and higher ideal of national duty?

This is the moment to begin. We are called upon to help our soldiers to fight the enemies of demoralization and drink at home, we are called upon to crush these enemies in our own lives and homes, and we are called upon so to live as to bequeath a heritage of health and happiness to the children we shall eventually give to the nation.

MISSIONARY WORK IN ITALY AND THE WAR.

THE Italian Free Believers' Association was started four years ago. Like every work of serious study and enlightened propaganda, it does not arouse much emotional enthusiasm, but proceeds through its selected channels slowly, but surely. Our monthly magazine, La Riforma Italiana, has lately improved in form and substance. Each issue contains two or three articles on Unitarian doctrines, critical studies on current events, sociological questions, bibliographical notes, a sermon, and a monthly letter for the Women's League. Among the contributors are two leading Modernists, namely, Hon. Romolo Murri and Mrs. Luisa Giulio-Benso. The publication is now more and better appreciated. The Postal Mission has always been active and promising. Among the letters received I wish to quote from one of Sig. Torquato Gigli, Professor of Chemistry in the University of Pisa. He writes: "I appreciate very much the purposes and the work of the Association and the religious sentiment inspiring it, which I consider so beneficial to our country. I think the Free Believers ought to try to reform the existing religious organization especially, which since it has lost its temporal power has much improved."

The work of the Women's League is especially entrusted to Mrs. Giulio-Benso, who maintains a considerable correspondence. Her personality and her knowledge and experience have opened to us the way to the mind and heart of the Modernist women. She is preparing a series of meetings to be held at her home, and a Circulating Library of Modernist works, which will undoubtedly prove useful. Mr. Murri's co-operation has also exceeded my expectations. His articles in the Riforma are, of course, very much appreciated. He holds weekly meetings at his home in Rome, where he has a select and scholarly attendance. No doubt if lectures were delivered by him throughout Italy, they would prove beneficial to our work, and we shall have them as soon as the war is over.

In Florence we have organized the Brotherhood Club. Several resident Americans and Italians have joined. Its motto is: "For the truth, in brotherly spirit, for the good of our neighbours." The purposes of the Club are:—

(a) To make more and more cordial the relations already existing between Anglo-Saxons and Italians, trying to remove prejudices and misunderstandings which sometimes lessen their mutual sympathies.

(b) To welcome, advise, and, in any way possible assist Anglo-Saxon visitors in our city, who, ignorant of our laws, customs, or language, may find themselves in some difficulty.

(c) To co-operate in the diffusion of noble ideals of life and in advocating civic and religious reforms.

We have also organized a small Italian Unitarian Church, composed of the few resident Unitarians and those scattered over Italy. If we recognize in other Free Believers the right to keep faithful to their own church, no doubt they will recognize the same right for us. We hold a Sunday afternoon meeting; and in order to reach those Unitarians who are not in Florence, we hope to publish a little paper called The Unitarian Herald, a very modest enterprise, setting forth the principles and faith of our little Church.

While we were looking with great expectations to the new season of work, the war has paralysed Italian life, and, of course, to some extent also our work. As every one knows, Italy is neutral at present; but we suffer greatly, for the war affects everybody. Seven hundred thousand soldiers have already been called up; many stores do not sell anything; savings banks give only 5 per cent of the deposit; there is unemployment all over the country; and the coming winter will undoubtedly be the hardest we have experienced. There is every expectation that the whirlwind of the war may bring Italy into it before long. While this will distract people from the study of religious and civic questions, it will open to us the way to new duties which we shall try to fulfil. We are already planning to do something for the children of those who have been called to the war and for the wounded—if the war should come. More than ever we feel it our duty to promote a Unitarian propaganda; and the best arguments and the greatest opportunity will be given us by the present cruel war and its many atrocities.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

A ROLL OF HONOUR, in booklet form, has been issued in connection with Willaston School, which has already been able to offer more than half of her old boys for the service of their country. It contains the names of thirty-five Willastonians who have joined the colours, and details of the work undertaken by several others in different capacities. The next list will be given in the December number of the Chronicle, and other issues will follow as occasion requires. The Roll of Honour has been sent to all old boys with a prefatory letter. The Head Master, Mr. H. Lang Jones, will be pleased to send a copy to any one who is interested.

THE Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, the Rev. Lewis G. Wilson, some weeks ago informed the readers of The Christian Register of the war distress work at Essex Hall carried on under the direction of the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, particularly among people heard of through Liberal religious channels in different parts of Europe. In response to Mr. Wilson's appeal, the Treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, Mr. H. M. Williams, has received and forwarded in all the sum of £132 4s. 7d. This generous and practical expression of sympathy is deeply appreciated. The money will prove of great service in mitigating, here and there, some of the horrors and sufferings caused by the European War. It is only befitting that the aid from America should be employed internationally, that is, without respect to whether the persons in distress are technically allies or enemies.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Barnard Castle.—A Sale of Work in connection with the Unitarian Church was held in the Schoolroom, Newgate, on Thursday, Nov. 5. The opening ceremony was performed by Mrs. W. H. Lambelle, who was supported by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle (Middlesbrough) and others. The proceeds of the sale amounted to between £50 and £60.

Belfast.—A Conference of Temperance Workers was held in connection with the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church of Ireland in the Minor Central Hall on Wednesday afternoon, November 11, when a paper on 'Drink and Poverty' was read by the Rev. E. H. Pickering, which evoked a good discussion. In the evening, at 8 o'clock, a Public Meeting was held in the Domestic Mission Church, Stanhope Street; the Rev. H. J. Rossington presided. Addresses were delivered by the Chairman, Dr. W. R. Hayden, and the Rev. G. J. Slipper.

Blackpool.—The Rev. J. Horace Short writes as follows:—"Thousands of troops are being billeted in Blackpool. The men are drawn chiefly from Lancashire. On Sunday last we had a good number of soldiers at our services who come from various Unitarian churches, as Bolton, Liverpool, &c. I should like to have the names and the Blackpool addresses of all Unitarian soldiers so that my people and I may be able to do our best for them whilst they are here. If the secretaries of churches and Sunday Schools from which soldiers have gone could provide me with such lists I shall be very glad to have them. Our schoolroom is to be thrown open as a reading and recreation room for the troops."

Chatham.—The following statement by the Rev. Dr. Hitchcock has been issued with the November Calendar of the Unitarian Church:—"In view of the Recognition Meeting to be held on the 26th of this month I may be pardoned for a personal note. Sixteen years ago the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie presided at a meeting to recognize me as Minister of this Church. For about four years and a half I worked here among the people, whom I loved, and have always loved beyond any other congregation. Then I became a Catholic, passing if you will from freedom to absolutism. But it was also from Individualism to a Church. For more than eleven years I availed myself of Catholic Churchmanship as I had of Unitarian freedom. But the opposition between Freedom and Churchmanship became intolerable. How was it to be reconciled? To accept one horn of the dilemma, 'Unitarianism or Catholicism,' is to rest satisfied with a fragment of reality. To combine the two is to rise above partisanship. And such a synthesis is found in the ideal of a FREE CHURCH, embodying both Freedom and Churchmanship. The basis of a Free Church, like that of science and philosophy, must be Unitarian. For the unity of God and that of the world must be confessed, else we fall into intellectual confusion. But in their building the Free Churchmen are more Catholic than the Catholics, for they look to a Church of all the living and all the dead. And they avail themselves of all that God has given through Catholic, Protestant, and Unitarian. Therefore, the Free Churchman is neither anti-Catholic nor anti-Protestant. But he represents a stage beyond Catholicism and Protestantism. To realize it we must be serious thinkers, developing every spiritual power of our complex human nature, and sanctifying all our relationships with a charity, Christian and Divine."

Cirencester.—The congregation at Cirencester mourns the loss of Mr. Bennett in his 81st year. A member for forty years he had also acted as Treasurer and Churchwarden.

Edmonton (Canada).—The Rev. Charles F. Potter, minister of the new Unitarian movement at Edmonton, Canada, writes:—

"The American Unitarian Association sent me here from Boston in February, 1914. I found a brave little band of Liberals struggling against notable odds. Their pluck won my admiration at once, and as for their feelings toward me they simply were forced to make the best of matters, for their last despairing cry to Boston had been, 'Send anybody.' The outstanding need was for a place of worship, and we applied ourselves at once to the task of providing one. The roof is already on our new building, and we expect to be worshipping there in November. Instead of recognizing the need of economy by erecting a small frame structure, we secured the same end somewhat more happily by building the basement portion of the fine brick edifice originally planned. We are placing on this substructure a temporary roof, and are finishing the exterior in stucco, with white window sashes and dark brown trimmings, producing a rather pleasing bungalow effect. We had despaired of securing anything architecturally acceptable until this solution presented itself. It is not so overpoweringly charming, however, as to prevent our wishing to complete the building at the first favourable financial wind. The generous provision by the Church Building Loan Fund of the American Unitarian Association makes possible our having anything at all. The present structure is costing five thousand dollars, but is really worth at least a thousand more, for the contractor is one of our own members who is virtually donating us the latter amount. The other tenders revealed that fact. We are getting an audience room about 45 ft. by 30 ft., and a very attractive reading room (22 ft. by 13 ft.), with a large fire-place. There is also a kitchen, a furnace room, and toilet rooms. Our services are still being continued in the old church at the corner of Third Street and Jasper Avenue. They are well attended, as a rule, although during the summer the attendance was poor. The Forum has started again, and is very much alive, one of the few good results of this war. We shall start a Church school for the children as soon as we occupy our own church home. The Roman Catholics are to build a $300,000 cathedral within two blocks of our new church (startling contrast in several ways), but lack of funds is delaying them, and we shall be the first church in the beautiful residential Garneau district. This university neighbourhood was wisely chosen, as the future will testify. The present financial stringency is increasing the difficulty of that part of our work. Owing to bad combinations of circumstances two of our largest contributors have been unable to give us a dollar since the beginning of the year. We are hoping for a better time, however, and there are already indications that the war may ultimately benefit Canada to a considerable extent. With the completion of the new building we expect to leave our state of suspension and stand firmly in our place, sending out roots and growing to power."

Heywood.—The ministry of the Rev. J. Worthington, formerly of Mountpottinger, Belfast, at Britain Hill Chapel was inaugurated on Saturday evening, November 14, when a large and enthusiastic meeting was held in the School-room. The chairman was supported by many of the ministers of the district and several of the Free Church ministers in the town. Speeches of welcome were made by Councillor Healey, the Revs. A. Fox, E. D. P. Evans, O. Binns, J. Evans, Principal Mellone, W. H. Drummond, and several others. The next day the Church Anniversary was held, the preacher being the Rev. W. H. Drummond of London.

Liberal Christian League.—Many of our readers who have met Miss A. H. Alleyne, the Hon. Secretary of the Liberal-Christian League, will be sorry to hear of her heavy bereavements through the war. Besides three other relatives, a very dear cousin was killed in action about a month ago, and last week she learned the loss of her brother near Ypres, who only returned from South Africa with his regiment a short time ago. The King and Queen have sent their condolences to Mrs. Alleyne.

London: Finchley.—In spite of very bad weather, the Sale and Social Evening organized by the Women's League held on November 11, the second anniversary of the opening of Granville Hall, was in every way successful. League members from other branches, and several local friends besides members of the Finchley congregation, came to show their practical sympathy, and the result was that over £50 was realized.

Scottish Unitarian Association.—The Annual Meeting of the Scottish Unitarian Association was held in the Universalist Church, Stenhousemuir, on Saturday, November 14. Dr. J. K. Wood, Dundee, President, presided, representatives being present from Aberdeen, Dundee, Kirkcaldy, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Perth, and Stenhousemuir. The Annual Report submitted by the Secretary showed that a great deal of hard work had been done by the Executive Committee. The churches at Kirkcaldy, Stenhousemuir, and also at Glasgow Ross Street, are still without ministers, and in the first two instances the work of carrying on pulpit supply had fallen on the shoulders of the Executive Committee. As an experiment, for six months, Mr. T. A. Williams, of Bristol, has been appointed as Missionary Lay Preacher, to carry on services particularly in the churches where there is no resident minister. The Rev. E. T. Russell, McQuaker Trust Missionary Minister for Scotland, has also carried on during the past year a large number of well-attended meetings. Dr. J. K. Wood was re-elected as President, Mr. A. MacLaren (Glasgow) Secretary, and Mr. V. G. Jennings (Glasgow) Treasurer. Later a conference was held upon the present position and future prospect of the various churches in Scotland.

Whitechurch.—The Autumnal Meeting of the South Cheshire District Association was held on Wednesday, Oct. 28, at the Church of the Saviour, all the churches of the Association except Newcastle being well represented. At the Business Meeting the chair was taken by the President, the Rev. Dr. W. Griffiths, and at its conclusion the position of the churches at Newcastle and Whitechurch, both of which are still without a minister, was discussed. At the Conference a paper on 'The New Unitarianism' was read by the Rev. W. Stephens. A discussion followed in which the Revs. Dr. Griffiths, D. G. Evans, J. Park Davies, G. Pegler, and others took part. At the evening service the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Park Davies.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

FRENCH PROTESTANTS AND THE WAR.

A well-known French Protestant pastor, the Rev. C. Merle d'Aubigne, of Paris, points out in a letter to a clergyman in England—from which The Challenge quotes—that the Protestant pastors are doing their duty at this crisis no less than the Roman Catholic priests and nuns, of whose brave work we hear more frequently. Two-fifths of them are serving as chaplains, ambulance orderlies, officers, and soldiers. Already a missionary and a theological student have laid down their lives for their country. The pastor of Rheims—whose church has been wrecked by German shells, and who had to flee from his house empty-handed—holds divine service in the cellars of a large champagne firm, and continued to visit the remnant of his flock while the shells were falling in the streets. "In several of our parishes the wives of our pastors are taking the place of their husbands called away to military duty. My own niece has conducted service, with the usual preaching, in the hall adjoining the church." Elsewhere the wife of a pastor, in the absence of the mayor, has taken in hand the civil affairs of the commune. Yet another has been made chaplain to the military hospitals of the town.

DAYLIGHT SAVING AGAIN.

Mr. Willett has found a new argument to support his Daylight Saving Bill, which he sets forth in a letter to the press. If, he says, the War is going to be as long as Lord Kitchener prophesies, it is surely desirable that when the days lengthen—say, after March—we should not be compelled to waste the early morning light, and prolong the general inconvenience produced by darkened streets in the evening. "Why should not the Government, by administrative order, give effect to the proposition, for which so much public support has already been secured, that it is desirable that we should spend one hour more in daylight in the ordinary working day? The result would be a total saving to the nation of about £2,500,000 next year, and this saving would increase in succeeding years in proportion to the increase of population."

GARDEN SUBURBS IN WAR TIME.

The garden suburb movement which has done so much good in providing for the better housing of the people, and their effective co-operation in everything that ministers to social well-being, has also created common centres from which useful work can be carried out in times of national stress and emergency. Many, including the Hampstead Garden Suburb and the pioneer Co-partnership Suburb at Ealing, are receiving bands of Belgian refugees; at the Co-partnership farm in Norfolk work has also been found for some of these people, and everywhere efforts are being made to promote local relief funds to help the families of those tenants who have joined the army, and in other ways to demonstrate the reality of the brotherly spirit which has been developed in times of peace.

INFANT MORTALITY IN LANCASHIRE.

The infant mortality rate has risen in Lancashire, according to the report of the Medical Officer of Health (Dr. Sergeant) from 104 in 1912 to 124 in 1913, while the birth-rate is declining. No fewer than 4,850 of the total deaths, virtually one-fifth, were those of children under one year. In two of the county districts the infantile rate exceeded 200 per 1,000 births, and in forty-two districts the rate fell below 100. The urban district of Kirkham (population, 3,838), had the unprecedented rate of 348 per 1,000 births, and this is attributed to stuffy and ill-ventilated rooms, and dirty and insanitary conditions. The fact is once more emphasized in this report that the chief cause of the numerous deaths among babies under a year old, is due to the employment of women in factories, where they frequently continue their work almost up to the time of their confinement. This is a matter which calls for serious consideration, especially in view of the fact, which Dr. Sergeant does not refer to, that while it is in every way desirable that the prohibitory clauses of the Factory and Workshop Act in this connexion should be enforced, if not strengthened, no provision is made for the maintenance of the mother, and very often the family she supports, during the periods in which she is debarred from earning.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE has been a good deal of outcry in the Press against the proposal of the Government to secure powers "to prevent the spread of reports likely to cause disaffection or alarm." In the House of Commons, on Monday, Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Bonar Law, and other members took up the cudgels against the clause, pointing out that it might be a serious menace to the right of public criticism, and that the powers claimed by the Government were altogether too wide. Mr. Bonar Law maintained that "it is the right, not only of every member of this House, but of every newspaper in this country and of every speaker on every platform, if he honestly believes that a member of the Government is incompetent or is not properly doing his work, to try to get rid of that member, even though his trying to do so does create a want of confidence in the Government."

* * *

THE principle is perfectly sound, and the Opposition has done a useful public service in championing the sacred cause of freedom of speech and the freedom of the Press. There is no reason to suppose that the Government intended any such sinister meaning to be read into the clause, or were likely to use it in the way suggested, but they were wise to accept the amendment of Lord Robert

Cecil on Wednesday evening. The clause now reads as follows :—

To prevent the spread of false reports or reports likely to cause disaffection to His Majesty or to interfere with the success of His Majesty's Forces by land or sea or to prejudice His Majesty's relations with foreign powers.

In these words there is ample security against the betrayal of military secrets or the spread of dangerous disaffection, while the rights of domestic criticism, which are vital both to Parliament and the Press, are fully maintained.

* * *

SOME important concessions to the taxpayer have been made this week ; but it is not a little disquieting to find a powerful section in the House of Commons more interested in beer than in income-tax. There is absolutely no ground for believing that Mr. Lloyd George has been trying to get in a piece of Temperance legislation by a side-wind. He has been guided entirely by the needs of revenue and the ease of collection. This was conceded in a handsome manner by Mr. Austin Chamberlain on Tuesday, but he pleaded that the burden is heavier than the trade can fairly be asked to bear. His position seems to us confused, for he argued almost in the same breath that it would be difficult to impose the additional half-penny on the half-pint upon the consumer, and that the effect of raising the price would be undoubtedly to give a great shock to consumption. The last statement leaves us quite unmoved. We hope that Mr. Chamberlain is right when he says that, while there would be a tendency towards recovery in succeeding years, the consumption would not get back to the point where it was before the additional duty was put on. If this should happen in any marked degree, we shall have done something to scotch a national vice as the result of the War, and the successors of Mr. Lloyd George will have to find new and better sources of revenue.

In the course of the same debate Mr. Henderson, on behalf of the Labour Party, took the bold line of suggesting an income tax for the wage-earner. He had come to the conclusion, he said, that the only fair way to treat the working-classes was by a graduated wage tax. In his reply Mr. Lloyd George rejected the proposal, not because he was out of sympathy with it, but because it was impossible to impose a direct tax on wages without setting up a gigantic machinery, and that could not be done between now and March 31. We have long held that it is a good thing for every citizen to pay a part of his dues to the State in the form of direct taxation. There are, moreover, many cases of real hardship. Income paid quarterly and the profits on a shop are taxed, while the skilled artisan with precisely the same income is allowed to go free. We have no wish to increase the burdens of poverty, but we are in favour of treating all citizens as partners in the privileges and duties of the State. It is very significant that a serious proposal of this kind should be made, not by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the look-out for new sources of revenue, but by a representative of the wage-earners themselves.

A GOOD many sinister rumours have been flying about in regard to War contracts, and rings of manufacturers who deal in war material, organized to secure abnormal profits from the Government. Unfortunately, this is a form of unpatriotic greed which threatens us, whenever the need of the country becomes acute; and Government departments are supposed to be fair and easy game. All we can say on the matter is that a good case for sifting and probing has been made out, and it rests with the Government to convince the public that they are taking adequate steps to cope with the danger. There is, we think, a growing feeling that they would do well to call in more trained business faculty in the great spending departments, and no doubt it could be had for the asking.

FURTHER official reports of the German atrocities in Belgium have been issued this week. There is no need for us to repeat the terrible details of murder and arson here. But we ought to read them and feel their horror burning in our hearts. They cannot be dismissed with the remark that these are the terrible things which always happen in War, and we are all jointly responsible for them, for that simply is not true. Nor can we acquiesce in the policy of silence, because here and there some detail may be incorrect, and to mention them in strong terms of condemnation may make it more difficult to repair our broken friendship with Germany when the War is over. Friendship cannot be restored by a sentimental evasion of reality. Political differences may be healed and forgotten, but the evil spirit of fierce cruelty and lust, which has made the German treatment of Belgium the most odious crime of modern history, must be driven out before there can be any mutual cordiality. For a Germany still proud of its shamefulness we could not pretend to have the liking and the trust, which friendship implies. In a Germany bitterly repentant and, through repentance, restored to its better mind, we hope still to find much to love and admire.

FEELING this as we do very deeply, and knowing that we cannot keep the integrity of our own conscience on any other terms, we associate ourselves entirely with the noble plea of M. Romain Rolland, that there must be no policy of retaliation.

When the War is over! [So he writes in his appeal to the Young Men of All Nations, which appeared recently in the Journal de Genève.] The evil is done now, the torrent let loose, and we cannot force it back into its channel unaided. Moreover, crimes have been committed against right, attacks on the liberties of peoples and on the sacred treasuries of thought, which must and will be expiated. Europe cannot pass over unheeded the violence done to the noble Belgian people, the devastation of Malines and Louvain, sacked by modern Tillys. But in the name of heaven let not these crimes be expiated by similar crimes. Let not the hideous words "vengeance" and "retaliation" be heard; for a great nation does not revenge itself, it re-establishes justice. But let those in whose hands lies the execution of justice show themselves worthy of her to the end. It is our duty to keep this before them; nor will we be passive and wait for the fury of this conflict to spend itself. Such conduct would be unworthy of us who have such a task before us. Our first duty, then, all over the world, is to insist on the formation of a moral High Court, a tribunal of consciences, to watch and pass impartial judgment on any violations of the laws of nations. And since committees of inquiry formed by belligerents themselves would be always suspect, the neutral countries of the old and the new world must take the initiative.

* * *

THE campaign against people with German names, which has been running a brisk course in some of the newspapers, is silly and mischievous. It is, indeed, difficult to resist the conclusion that the writers who are responsible for it are aware that they are trifling with truthfulness for the sake of a cheap popular sensation. In a message sent from Washington last Sunday the Correspondent of The Times holds up Mr. Jacob H. Schiff to English dislike as a new agent in the German Press campaign. Mr. Schiff, if we may judge from the passages quoted by The Times, has expressed himself in terms of moderation in favour of trying to bring the war to an early conclusion. He urges that the American newspapers should begin to stimulate public opinion in favour of rational adjustment of the points at issue, and that the interests of the neutral nations, who are being terribly harmed by the War, should be given some consideration. He does not want, he says, to see either England or Germany crushed. All this idealistic doctrine The Times correspondent treats as clever German propaganda. He proceeds to make the following comment: "The peace campaign already launched by enterprising journalists, amiable pacifists, financiers worried by heavy German commitments, and by German propagandists will sooner or later gain inconvenient strength."

* * *

THIS attempt to label Mr. Jacob Schiff, who is a highly respected American citizen, as an insidious agent of the German Government, has inspired the following letter from Mr. Israel Zangwill:—

The interview with Mr. Jacob Schiff reported by your Washington Correspondent—the proposal for a permanent peace that shall end not only this war, but war—comes as the one gleam of light in the world's darkness. But why almost extinguish it under the head of 'German Press Campaign'? And why does he speak of Mr. Schiff's "brief for Germany"? As one associated for many years in philanthropic work with this noblest of millionaires, I should like to testify that, despite his early associations with Germany, he is one of the most patriotic Americans I have ever known. Descended from a long line of Jewish Rabbis and scholars—one of his ancestors was Chief Rabbi of the Great Synagogue, London, in the eighteenth century—Mr. Jacob Schiff might himself have sat to Lessing for the portrait of 'Nathan der Weise,' and in proposing a conference to end Prussian militarism—and every other—he speaks not as the mouthpiece of Berlin, but with the voice of Jerusalem.

ONE of the indirect benefits of the War is our discovery, so late and tardy, but now so enthusiastic, of M. Emil Verhaeren, the Belgian poet. He ought not to be unknown to our readers, for discriminating criticism of his genius has appeared in our columns. But added to the English prejudice against poetry in the French tongue there has been the difficulty of access to his work, for many of his poems could only be obtained in rare and expensive editions. Now, owing to the enterprize of the Mercur de France, this is no longer the case. M. Verhaeren has been to Manchester, and lectured before the University on 'L'Esprit Belge.' Here is a vivid description of the impression which he made upon one of his audience. We take it from The Manchester Guardian:—

The greatness of Verhaeren did not take one by assault, but it grew upon one with rapid strides. One felt that that conquest and occupation would never retreat. As the grey, heavy head bent deeper and deeper over the manuscript, and the long tormented fingers shot in and out from the perfectly still hand, the impression was being made. We were coming under the undentable imperious mastery of character, and even at the end, when we were all conquered, one still felt that Verhaeren was greater than anything he has done. So many men are just the opposite, and generally when one has loved and admired a book it is best not to know the man who wrote it. But Emil Verhaeren is not like that. He will wear better than his books. He had read his lecture seated. He stood up and recited us his poems with gestures like flame, and yet one still remained more impressed with the force which he reserved than with that which he spent—this quiet grey-haired man in the rich and mellow autumn of his days.

THE HEROIC APPEAL.

At a recent meeting in Manchester Lord Hugh Cecil showed a sound insight into human nature when he appealed to young men to enlist because danger calls.

He did not blink the fact, he said, that great sacrifice was needed. Rather he emphasized the hardship and the danger, because he wanted them to feel that they must not leave those who were in the trenches to bear the dangers without help. He was persuaded that if they could really bring home to the minds of all the available men a realization of the immense gravity of the occasion the problem of recruiting would be solved. Let every one be worthy of having lived in a day of such terrible crisis. Let all who were able do the right and self-sacrificing thing, and so prove themselves worthy to call themselves the children of the country of the free.

There is here no pandering to the easy excuses which often lead to the refusal of a difficult duty, and there is no attempt to hypnotize men into running risks which they would not accept with their eyes open and their senses about them. It is a straight challenge to heroism, spoken in the quiet confidence that what is noblest in human nature will respond. It requires both courage and faith to use this simple language. The man of smaller mind shrinks from such plain dealing with the lives of his fellows. They must be attracted, he thinks, by the glory rather than the danger of war. If the glittering prize of victory is dangled before their eyes, and the whole scheme of pensions and allowances is arranged satisfactorily beforehand, then perhaps it will seem worth their while to come in. But if a man is comfortable and prosperous, and the country appears to be getting on pretty well without him, it seems a vain and foolish thing to tell him to accept terrible risks and to speak of the soldier's choice as an exalted privilege. We get, accordingly, a school of prudence and a school of faith, using very different methods in the pursuit of the same practical end. If the problem is to get as many efficient soldiers as possible, had we better lay stress chiefly upon the business side of the bargain and the security of a contract with the State? or shall we bid men face sacrifice and danger without flinching because it is a noble thing to do?

When we put the matter in this blunt way there can be little doubt about our answer. It is not that pay and pensions are not important. It is quite right that they should occupy a good deal of our attention. We cannot accept the sacrifice upon which our national existence depends on easy terms for ourselves. But ten men will spring forward eagerly to join the fighting line because their hearts have been stirred for one who will consent to go after he has settled his bargain with the State. "High heaven rejects the lore of nicely calculated less or more"; and the spark of heavenly fire which is in every one of us is equally impatient of limited terms of self-surrender. It is the danger which is really dangerous, the duty which is really hard, the sacrifice which is really costly, which calls out all our reserves of faith and love and endurance. If we love our country as much as we profess to do, and believe with deep and solemn conviction that it is the most precious things of life, its justice, its liberty, and its joy, which are at stake, we shall never shrink from making a direct appeal to an illimitable capacity for sacrifice in the young manhood of the nation. They will respond to it with exultation. It is only by this spiritual method, as those who are skilled in reading the hearts of men are well aware, that we can obtain splendid results, the shining heroism and the unswerving faithfulness, which are the moral conditions of victory.

The simpler and less sophisticated men are in their ways of dealing with life and its duties, the more readily they will respond to the heroic appeal. For many of us it is blunted by the anxiety for the future and the love of ease which are the fruit of our education, or by the social pledges and entanglements from which we cannot cut ourselves loose. A large sum of money seems a better thing to leave to our children than a noble example or a deathless name. For a drawing-room view of existence the reckless audacities of heroism are out of place. But all the time we are in secret revolt against motives and ambitions which never demand of us our best. It is not the easy thing which really attracts us. There are capacities of loyalty and sacrifice in our nature which begin to glow with expectation when the trumpet calls to the battle. No man can be bribed or cajoled into facing danger with a stout heart. To conceal the risks is to court defeat. In the service of goodness a bold policy always pays. Tell men that they are only wanted for a small occasion and a safe post, and they will probably refuse to go at all. Warn them that they may have to lay down their lives for their friends, and the duty which must be done at such tremendous cost seems infinitely worth while.

Many people are looking anxiously for a revival of vital religion as a result of the strange and terrifying discipline of war. Life will be stripped bare of its illusions and left alone with God. And then love and pity and immortal trust may come flooding back into the soul, and with them the feeling which we had so nearly lost, that Christianity itself is an heroic thing, and its difficulty part of its attraction. For who will be bold enough to plead that for most of us there has been much of the heroism of love or the mystery of greatness in our Christian faith? We have been very busy explaining it. We have reduced it to its simplest terms. We have tried to persuade men that it is a very easy thing to be a Christian, if only they will allow us to instruct and to guide them. But somehow the charm has not worked. In making it simple we have often only succeeded in making it ordinary, and an ordinary religion has little about it that the soul should desire it. We have shrunk from recognizing that truth, and our neglect of it has led us to the brink of spiritual disaster. For suppose it were possible for us to take this living thing which we call Christianity, and to clip its wings so that it should never range beyond our own fenced enclosures; suppose we could make it abdicate the high tasks of thought, and compel it to provide a smooth path for our feet, and bid it cease to challenge the conscience with quixotic duties and impossible demands; who can say that it would not still survive as an impressive memory, even as the name of our country may linger in our hearts long after we have grown too degenerate to sacrifice ourselves in its cause? But it would cease to create saints and martyrs, and to make us into good soldiers of Jesus Christ. Nothing but the heroic appeal and the vision of illimitable love and sacrifice can do that, whether the battle be in Flanders or with the enemy entrenched in our own hearts.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

A JUST CONFIDENCE.

AFTER a long silence occasioned by the war I have lately had one or two notes from Ruskin—the last came in the same mail with your letter, and was in very striking contrast to it. He writes very sadly, and his letters bring sadness to me especially as indications of his failure to understand and sympathize with the ideal side of America. “The war,” he says, “has put a gulph between all Americans and me, so that I do not care to hear what they think or tell them what I think on any matter.” It is vain to try to bring him to comprehend that in spite of all that is wrong and base in our present conditions, in spite of all the evil passions which war has worked, in spite of all the selfishness and conceited over-confidence generated by our marvellous material prosperity—there is in our national life a counterbalance of devotion to principle, of readiness to sacrifice whatever is required for the maintenance of liberty and human rights, and a real advance towards the fulfilment of the best hopes of man for men. He fancies that our happiness is a delusion, our efforts vanity, and our confidence folly. I believe that we have really made an advance in civilization, that the principles on which our political and social order rest are in harmony with the moral laws of the universe, that we have set up an ideal which may never be perfectly attained, but which is of such a nature that the mere effort to attain it makes progress in virtue and in genuine happiness certain. The character and principles of Mr. Lincoln were essentially typical of the character and principles of the people. The proposition that all men are created equal—equal that is in certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness—equal as moral and responsible beings—has sunk deep into the very hearts of this people, and is moulding them in accordance with the conclusions that proceed from it. It is the inspiration and the explanation of our progress and our content. To embody it continually more and more completely in our institutions of government and of society is the conscious or unconscious desire and effort of all good men among us. It is as Mr. Lincoln admirably said: “A standard maxim for free society, which should be familiar to all and revered by all; constantly looked to, constantly laboured for, and even though never perfectly attained, constantly approximated, and thereby constantly spreading and deepening its influence, and augmenting the happiness and value of life to all people of all colours everywhere.” The war has given us a right, such as we had not before, to trust in the fidelity of the people to the principles of justice, liberty, and fair play. And it is because of this just confidence that one need not be disheartened when, as now, there are signs of moral slackness and decline. After the exertions and excitements of the last four years one need not be surprised at a reaction of feeling; and if the high standard of effort is somewhat lowered. The millennium will not come in our time; and peace will not bring rest to those who fight for “the cause” and not for victory.—From a letter written by Charles Eliot Norton to Miss Gaskell, Oct. 2, 1865.

MOTHER AND SON.

It is not yours, O mother, to complain,
Not, mother, yours to weep,
Though nevermore your son again
Shall to your bosom creep,
Though nevermore again you watch your baby sleep.

Though in the greener paths of earth,
Mother and child, no more
We wander; and no more the birth
Of me whom once you bore,
Seems still the brave reward that once it seemed of yore.

Though as all passes, day and night,
The seasons and the years,
From you, O mother, this delight,
This also disappears—
Some profit yet survives of all your pangs and tears.

The child, the seed, the grain of corn,
The acorn on the hill,
Each for some separate end is born
In season fit, and still Each must in strength arise to work the almighty will.

So from the hearth the children flee,
By that almighty hand
Austerely led; so one by sea
Goes forth, and one by land;
Nor aught of all man's sons escapes from that command.

So from the sally each obeys
The unseen almighty nod;
So till the ending all their ways
Blind-folded loth have trod:
Nor knew their task at all, but were the tools of God.

And as the fervent smith of yore
Beat out the glowing blade,
Nor wielded in the front of war
The weapons that he made,
But in the tower at home still plied his ringing trade.

So like the sword the son shall roam
On nobler missions sent;
And as the smith remained at home
In peaceful turret pent,
So sits the while at home the mother well content.

DAY-BREAK OFFICE OF THE EASTERN CHURCH.

FROM the night our spirit awaketh unto thee, O God, for thy precepts are a light unto us. Teach us, O God, thy righteousness, thy commandments, and thy judgments. Enlighten the eyes of our mind, that we sleep not in sins unto death. Drive away all darkness from our hearts. Vouchsafe us the Sun of Righteousness. Guard our life from all reproach by the seal of thy Holy Spirit. Guide our steps into the way of peace. Grant us to behold the dawn and the day with joyfulness, that we may send up our prayers to thee at eventide. Amen.

THE DOGMATISM OF MR. BERNARD SHAW.

MR. BERNARD SHAW has written a most mischievous attack upon England. His statements are not true, they are not reasoned, and they are not consistent. The mischief consists, as always with him, in witty dogmatism. Even dull dogmatism without argument has an effect on many minds, but witty dogmatism is the most dangerous of all. It makes men feel superior and clever in agreeing with its unproved assertions. It appeals to those who enjoy thinking most other people fools or knaves: it is prurient and debasing in the sense that it evokes the mean quality of scorn. Great popular emotions and convictions are treated as hypocritical. Mr. Shaw poses with impertinent audacity as a serious, true man among a nation of hypocrites.

The most amazing thing is that he would have us regard him as a hero for so doing, and that even some of his critics call him brave. There is no courage in cynicism. A man who loves gibing and sneering, and who is a master of gibes and sneers, is not brave for indulging himself in his favourite pastime. If Mr. Shaw were in Germany, and were to write of German convictions as he has written of English convictions, he would certainly be put in prison, and would probably be shot. There might be an element of low courage even in sneering under such circumstances. But in the England which he condemns he is perfectly safe, as he knows. He can give expression to his spleen, he can abuse us to his heart's content. At a time when our young men are facing death every day by sea and land, and when those who love them are trying to keep a brave heart under agonizing anxieties, we ought to know better what true courage means. Mr. Bernard Shaw's dogmatism is the cowardly attack of a restless egotist who has nothing to fear from his attack. He cannot bear to be forgotten even in a time of great national danger and emotion. He must be talked about at any cost, and his only method, since he is incapable of sharing any great emotion, is abuse. It is a cheap bid for notoriety and for the applause of our enemies.

Sir Edward Grey, according to him, is more of a militarist by his actions than the Kaiser. England is as responsible for this awful war as Germany. The suggestion that we were influenced by an honourable feeling of obligation to preserve the neutrality of Belgium is pure hypocrisy. It is difficult to treat these statements seriously, especially as presented in the peculiar manner of Mr. Shaw. If we were arguing with Mr. Ramsay Macdonald or the Hon. Bertrand Russell we should be dealing with serious if mistaken opponents. In Mr. Shaw we are dealing with a man who gives the impression that he enjoys perverting the truth.

He condemns Sir Edward Grey for not telling Germany in the beginning that if war began between Russia and Germany, and France came in, we should certainly come in on their side. Sir Edward Grey on July 29th said to the German Ambassador: "If Germany becomes involved and then France, the issue might be so great that it would involve all European interests: I did not wish him to be misled by the friendly tone of our conversation—which I hoped would continue—into thinking that we should stand aside." The suggestion that from the first Sir Edward Grey should have said to Germany we shall fight you if you fight Russia was absolutely impossible for an English statesman to adopt. There was no contract binding us in all events to fight with Russia and France. Parliament and the nation could not have been justifiably committed by Sir Edward Grey and the Cabinet to any such course. If they had dared to do such a thing, and war had followed, and the nation had been told they had been committed to it from the first, we should have felt an intense and justifiable indignation. The principles of English democratic government would have been outraged.

Mr. Shaw refers to a conversation between Sir Edward Grey and the German Ambassador in which it is suggested that the German Ambassador offered England any terms she liked if only she would stand aside. "Will you remain neutral if we promise not to invade Belgium and to respect the integrity of France and her colonies?" The fact, of course, is that there was no offer at all. It was an attempt to make Sir Edward Grey bind the nation beforehand without making any offer in return. It was an attempt to limit freedom of action in changing circumstances to which it was impossible for a democratic statesman to agree.

Sir Edward Grey replied: "All I could say was that our attitude would be determined largely by public opinion here, and that the neutrality of Belgium would appeal very strongly to public opinion here." Such language is a strange reason for the assertion that Sir Edward Grey is a greater militarist and autocrat than the Kaiser.

Mr. Shaw goes on to assert that England wanted war just as much as Germany, and that our policy has been just as aggressive and our literature just as provocative as hers. One of his proofs is a book called 'The Battle of Dorking,' published in 1874, in which a German invasion was repelled. There was no suspicion of Germany in those days, and it was just on that account that the invading foe were called Germans; but even if there had been, it is unconvincing to compare a book concerned with repelling an invasion with General Bernhardi's incitement to World Power or Downfall. It was not until the beginning of the present century that the menace of German militarism began to be realized. The Entente, first with France and then with Russia, was a purely defensive measure caused by the knowledge that Germany threatened the peace of the world.

Mr. Shaw seems to think that the feeling among many Englishmen that this war "was bound to come" was based on a love for fighting and a desire for Imperial expansion. The feeling that this war was bound to come, so far as it existed, was based on the knowledge of Prussian ambitions and preparations. Our statesmen have tried over and over again to make some arrangement as to a reduction of armaments. They were forced reluctantly to realize that Germany meant war and conquest, and that she would take the first favourable opportunity for fighting!

It was only as a result of such knowledge that our navy was increased, and even this knowledge on the part of some did not persuade the country to increase its army.

The charge of hypocrisy with regard to Belgium is a commonplace in Germany. But the Germans have more respect for argument than Mr. Shaw. They say that France had invaded Belgium, or that she was preparing to invade Belgium, and that England had agreed to permit her to do so. We all know it is not true, but if it were true, as many Germans believe, there would be a real reason for condemning the hypocrisy of England. Mr. Shaw does not trouble about argument. He merely asserts that England cared nothing about Belgian neutrality except so far as her own interest was concerned, and that she used the German invasion of Belgium as a fine-sounding excuse for fighting Germany. It is, of course, true that we have not always gone to war on behalf of treaties to which we were a party in defence of little nations. We did not do so in the case of Bosnia. In considering whether to fight in defence of a treaty nations must consider the power they possess and the likelihood of making their will avail. It would be wild Quixotism if we were determined to fight always and anywhere, and against any powers, on behalf of any treaty to which, in common with many other nations, we have signed our names.

Whether we were right or not in abstaining from declaring war on Austria and Germany on behalf of the independence of Bosnia, there is no proof in such refusal that we are hypocrites now because we defend the neutrality of Belgium.

Any one who felt the general emotion at the beginning of this war knows perfectly well that it was the German invasion of Belgium which was the predominant influence on a peace-loving people, persuading them against their inclination and their will that this war was a hateful duty. It was not an excuse for fighting. It was the main reason for it.

To tell us that we are hypocrites because we determined to stand by our bond with Belgium, and to resist the German invasion with all our strength, is to say something which is ludicrously untrue. We know ourselves better than Mr. Shaw knows us. He has an eager eye for evil. He seeks for it as greedily as the miser seeks for gold. He is always telling us we are deluded and ignorant of our own knavery. After all, the most deluded men are not those who seek for good and believe in good, but those who seek for evil and believe in evil. No doubt there is an element of self-delusion and sentimentality in many popular emotions and convictions, especially as expressed in the newspaper. There is less of it than usual in our resolve to keep our word with Belgium, and in the national faith that we are fighting an aggressive military power on behalf of the peace and security of Europe. We need to watch ourselves very closely, to avoid exaggeration and vainglorious utterance. The temptations of war are terrible, not only on the plane of the senses, but on the plane of the spirit.

But we shall not conquer these temptations by a cynical disbelief in the worth of our motives and ideals. We believe that we are fighting for justice and peace and the independence of little peoples. The more we love these ideals the better we shall fight, and the more ready we shall be to recognize good in our enemy and to be magnanimous and without bitterness in defeat or victory.

DIVERTED CHARITY.

SIR,—Some days ago a letter appeared in the press headed 'Diverted Charity.' The writer referred to the diminution of income of one old-established charity since the beginning of the War. We are requested on behalf of a very large number of the principal Metropolitan charities to draw the attention of the public to the serious danger which menaces, not one or two, but practically all the old charitable societies and institutions, if their funds are allowed to suffer through the generous response made to the ever-increasing number of appeals in connection with the War.

Many of these appeals are necessary to meet abnormal conditions for dealing with which the country had no special equipment, and the response to these cannot be too generous. Some, on the other hand, must undoubtedly lead to overlapping and waste of energy, and careful discrimination is called for on the part of the subscribing public. We particularly desire to urge that special needs call for special efforts, and not merely for the transfer of gifts from one channel to another. Contributions made to Emergency Funds at the expense of institutions which are permanent should be looked upon with the same suspicion as the large employer who dismisses his workmen while signing a substantial cheque for charity.

The following extract, taken from the report of a Society which for thirty years has done admirable work, describes the situation of many others besides itself:—
“...with succeeding weeks the strain has increased, and our income has fallen to the extent of some hundreds of pounds.”

It is possible that in the multiplication of new activities two facts connected with existing Societies are overlooked: first, the volume of special War Relief work which they have themselves undertaken; second, the increased demands which, as a consequence of the War, are now being made upon their ordinary channels of assistance.

We submit that the country has needed these Societies in the past, needs them more than ever at the present time, and will still need them when “crises” are over, and the normal life of the nation is resumed. We ask that, in spite of the innumerable claims upon the generosity of the public at the present time, the last economy effected may be in subscriptions to charities established before the War began.

Yours faithfully,

THE EDUCATION OF REFUGEES AND “ALIEN ENEMIES.”

SIR,—The presence of so many Belgian refugees and other foreigners—including “alien enemies”—in our midst is raising questions about the education of their children: What are their duties? what are their rights? and what are the obligations of the National and Local Authorities towards them? It is desirable that as far as possible these children should not lose any of the years or even months of school-life, and a very general goodwill is being shown; but difficulties have arisen, and many people are asking what are the exact legal rights and exact legal duties which the Education Acts establish. Of course, this is not the time to stand punctiliously on either “rights” or “duties,” but if we know what they are it is more easy to arrive at a friendly accommodation in dealing with exceptional circumstances. In reply to numerous requests we have drawn up a very brief summary of the actual law, which we believe to be strictly in accord with the letter of the Education Acts and in harmony with their spirit. A copy is enclosed.—Yours, &c.,

A. J. MUNDELLA.

National Education Association,
Caxton House, Westminster, S.W.

[The important clauses in the Memorandum referred to by our correspondent are as follows:—

The Education Acts know no distinction of race, creed, language, or nationality. Any child residing in any part of Great Britain for no matter how short a time is under a statutory obligation to receive efficient elementary instruction, at school or elsewhere; every child has a right to attend any public elementary school for the purpose; and every Local Education Authority must provide sufficient school accommodation in all parts of their area.

The “parent” (which means “every person who is liable to maintain or has actual custody of any child”) may withhold the child from school on reasonable grounds: the reasonableness of which a magistrate will decide if the parent is prosecuted. And a school may refuse to admit any child on reasonable grounds: the reasonableness of which the Board of Education will decide if the parent appeals to them.

The right of every child to school accommodation is a right to accommodation without payment of fees or any other charge. Religious instruction, differing from school to school, is given in practically every public elementary school in the land, but any child attending such school must not be compelled to receive the religious instruction if the parent or person responsible for the child objects.

Any “parent” (as defined above), whether British or foreign, who finds any deficiency of school accommodation in his district, or meets with any refusal to admit a child to the public elementary school of his choice, or is asked for a fee or other charge, or is pressed to receive religious instruction against his will, may complain in writing to the Secretary of the Board of Education, Whitehall, London, S.W. The law provides severe penalties for neglect by the parent on one side or by the Local Education Authority on the other.—Ed. of INQ.]

THE DISMISSAL OF SERVANTS.

SIR,—It is to be regretted that Mr. Newell should launch a gratuitous libel upon his fellow-men by saying that in his town “a special club has become necessary to look after servant girls sent adrift on the streets by parsimonious employers.” It is true that some families have suffered terribly from dislocation of business and finance; we most of us know sad enough cases of the kind. It is terribly unfair to reproach them with parsimony and worse.—Yours, &c.,

S. F. DUFTON.

Leeds, Nov. 24.

[Perhaps our correspondent will allow us to remind him that circumstances alter cases. We fear that there have been cases of thoughtless dismissal of servants. There are, of course, other cases where the policy of dismissal has been adopted from sheer necessity with great reluctance.—Ed. of INQ.]

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

RELIGION IN SOCIAL AND NATIONAL LIFE. By H. D. Roberts. London: at the Lindsey Press. 2s. net.

THIS is a very live book, and forms a valuable contribution to the literature of the subject. It is the outcome of a genuine passion for social reform and of deep study and many-sided experience of the work. The cry of the distressed and downtrodden has haunted the author "like a remorse," and with a prophet's ardour he pleads their cause and points the way to their emancipation. He writes mainly from his knowledge of urban conditions of life and labour, and we are glad that he has incorporated in the volume his striking pamphlet on women's work and wages which was published by the Liverpool Anti-Sweating League in 1912; this has proved a revealing document to many readers, and as embodied here will prove such to many more. He has done well to emphasize the fact that the establishment of a minimum wage is not only welcomed by the workers, but also proves "a source of real joy to those employers, who, uncomfortable about the rate of wages they are paying, are yet prevented by stress of competition from giving more." Mr. Roberts, however, does not confine himself to the consideration of urban distress; he is hardly less concerned with the age-long hardships of the agricultural poor. He sketches with some detail the history of the land system which has dominated the countryside since the Reformation, and pours scorn on the Church's attitude of acquiescence in the evils arising from it. But while he is almost fiercely resentful of the manner in which the Christian Church in practically all its branches has evaded its responsibilities as regards the miserable and soul-destroying conditions in which so many of the people both in town and country have been compelled to live, it is to religion he looks for the enthusiasm and idealism that are needed to bring about the better order of things. Of that enthusiasm and idealism his book is full, and so his readers will not only be impressed by his courageous exposure of the evils to be grappled with, but will be stimulated to earnest and hopeful effort for the removal of them. The book is itself a sign that the Churches of one communion at least have begun to take the social implications of their faith with fitting seriousness.

THE NEW TESTAMENT AND MODERN KNOWLEDGE. By H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D. London: at the Lindsey Press. 2s. net.

MR. MCLACHLAN proves himself a well-informed and interesting guide over the ground traversed in this volume. Even those who have been often that way before will find him worth listening to, and all the more so because he is fond of quoting as he goes along what distinguished scholars have said on the various points that come under discussion. On the other hand, those to whom the ground is new—and it is them he specially invites to accompany him—will, at the end of the journey, have an excellent idea of what has been done, and is being done, towards an understanding of the origin and nature of the New Testament. They will know something of the change which has been brought about in our views of New Testament Greek through the study of papyri recovered in recent years from the rubbish heaps of long-buried Egyptian cities; they will be made aware of the help that is now being derived from apocalyptic and apocryphal literature in tracing the origin of certain New Testament conceptions; they will realize the meaning of the controversy that is being waged as to the relative merits of the "Neutral" and "Western" texts; they will be able to appreciate the value of the various sources of our knowledge of the life of Christ; and they will have learnt what measure of agreement has not been reached as to the authorship of the Fourth Gospel. From the concluding chapter they will learn what has been the contribution of Unitarian scholars to the better understanding of the Christian Scriptures—a contribution which has not always received the recognition it deserves. It must be evident, therefore, that Mr. McLachlan has produced a very useful book, and we have pleasure in commending it to the attention of our readers.

THE UNKNOWN GUEST. By Maurice Maeterlinck. London: Methuen & Co. 5s. net.

MAETERLINCK has returned of late to the land of enchantment where he steeped his soul in mystery and snared frail dreams of haunting beauty in the early days of his fame. He could not do otherwise, for it is of very truth his native country, but he now treads it with a cautious step and critical air which betray his surrender to the scientific method. The brooding eyes of Mélisande, the wistful voice of Selysette, the shuddering agony of Ygraine, hold him spellbound still; but now, duly classified, as it were, in the language of the occultist, they obtain a fresh ascendancy over the trained mind as phantasms burdened with unhappy memories, or mediums in trance through whom the subliminal consciousness transmits its commands to the normal brain. Something has been lost, of course—everything, many will say for whom imagination has no message when she tries to be strictly truthful; but out of this recasting of old ideas and obsessions in the mould of modern psychology and the study of the unknown some vital facts are emerging of great significance for the future of mankind. Perhaps the most startling and enthralling chapter in 'The Unknown Guest,' which has so much to tell us about psychometry, telepathy, precognitions, haunted houses, and other "supernatural" matters, is that which gives a detailed account of a visit paid by the author to Elberfeld, where he made an exhaustive study of the now world-famed calculating horses. Quite apart from the deductions which Maeterlinck feels compelled to draw from his experiences in Herr Krall's stables, Muhamed and Zarif, the show-pupils of this equestrian college, are described with a sympathy and understanding, as well as humour, which are quite infectious. We are made to realize with an odd feeling of kinship what depths of consciousness are veiled by the eloquent eyes of our friends in the animal world, who draw, it would seem, upon the same inexhaustible reservoir of universal memory as ourselves. There is only one thing that we regret as we come to the last page of this extraordinarily interesting book—that in all the worlds of wonder which his eager mind is exploring, Maeterlinck can find no evidence of a supreme Spirit who is the source of the mysterious powers which he greets with such reverence. Religious hypotheses he carefully puts aside; he has emptied the heavens of deity; and the chill that has fallen on his heart in consequence has left its mark upon his writing.

A COLLECTION of modern Belgian verse, entitled 'Belgian Poetry, including Verhaeren,' has been published by the Walter Scott Publishing Company at the popular price of 1s. It is a representative collection, which will be read with special interest at the present time, and contains some of the best poetry of Verhaeren, Séverin, Mockel, Maeterlinck, Le Roy, Giraud, Gerardy, Elskamp, and other Belgian writers.

It is often said that the ideals of Christian life are giving way under the chain of modern circumstances. Prof. Francis G. Peabody, of Harvard, has written a book in which he shows how the situation, difficult though it is, may be met by the believer. The book will be entitled 'The Christian Life in the Modern World,' and will be published by Messrs. Macmillan next Friday.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE CHRYSANTHEMUM IN JAPAN.

JAPAN is often spoken of as the Land of the Chrysanthemum, because this beautiful flower, with its very long name and its innumerable petals, is the national flower of that country. It appears on the Royal standard, it is used as a crest, it is embroidered on the neck and sleeves of the loose garment which everybody wears. Once, when the people were engaged in a terrible civil war, it served as a badge, and the War of the Chrysanthemums has now become as famous as our Wars of the Roses. When you see the Japanese flag you are at once reminded of the sun; but although the red rays on a white ground with which we are becoming quite familiar in these days may have had something to do originally with the Sun goddess, Ama-terasu, in whose honour rice cakes are still eaten at the New Year Festival, they are really meant to represent the sixteen-petalled chrysanthemum which, in 1859, became the accepted national emblem.

It is quite fitting that this should be so, for the Japanese are passionate lovers of flowers, and of everything that is beautiful in nature. Some one has said that they can make the most wonderful little garden in a space no bigger than a soup plate, and, indeed, there is nothing they enjoy so much as laying out a miniature landscape on some tiny plot of ground. There will be winding paths through scraps of woodland, lakes and rivers, shrines and bridges, and everywhere a profusion of flowers—long trails of wisteria, glowing azaleas like living flame, great crimson peonies, and the bloom of the purple lotus, the sacred flower of Buddhism. When the cherry and plum trees are in blossom, then there is much rejoicing in Japan, and the people make holiday and go out in merry parties to laugh and sing and worship under the fragrant branches. In a quaint little story we are told that two very dignified Government officials, Kinto Fujiwara, Great Adviser of State, and the Minister of Uji, were once disputing whether the cherry was not the best among the flowers of spring, as the chrysanthemum among those of autumn. Kinto said, "How can the cherry blossom be the best? You have forgotten the plum." Their dispute came at length to be confined to the superiority of the cherry and plum, and of other flowers little notice was taken. At length Kinto, not wishing to offend the Minister, left off arguing, and gently said: "Well, have it so; the cherry may be the prettier of the two; but when once you have seen the red plum blossom in the snow at the dawn of a spring morning, you will no longer forget its beauty."

Among the legendary tales that have been woven round the chrysanthemum, perhaps none is prettier than the one which narrates how Kikuo, a faithful retainer, having escaped from a fierce enemy with his master, Tsugaru, and found safety in the mountains, spent much of his time during their enforced exile in cultivating chrysanthemums to cheer Tsugaru, who was very fond of them. After a time the latter died, and Kikuo planted a great border, thirty yards wide, of the lovely flowers—red, white, yellow, and bronze—round his tomb, which became the wonder of all who passed that way. One autumn night Kikuo, who was now over 80, became very ill, and as he lay in his weakness thinking of the sweet flowers dedicated to his master which were just now in their full glory, he saw the faces of a group of children, not like "the children of this world," who had gathered about him. Gently the little ones drew near, and began to tell him that they were the spirits of his chrysanthemums, and that they had come to say how much they appreciated his loving care of them, and how sorry they were about his illness. A wonderful knowledge had they of the workings of the gods, for they also told him that, in spite of all efforts to save him, he would die within thirty days. Kikuo took the news very quietly, expressing the hope that he might die in peace. But one thing troubled him—he did not like leaving his chrysanthemums behind. "Ah!" said one of the flower-spirits, "but we all love you for what you have done for us, and when you die we shall die too." Kikuo died within the thirty days, and when the people came, as of old, to admire his wonderful chrysanthemums, they found that every one had vanished. Others were planted on his grave, but these all died as soon as they were put into the ground. How could they do otherwise when the winsome little souls that could alone give them life and beauty had gone into the spirit-world with Kikuo to keep him company?

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

MEETING OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT SOCIETY.

A WELL-ATTENDED MEETING of the Women's Local Government Society was held last week at the house of Miss Leigh Browne, Hon. Secretary; Mrs. Theodore Williams, Chairman of Committee, presiding. The idea of the League (said the Chairman) was that women as well as men should uphold the honour of their country with strength and dignity. Lady Bunting, who addressed the meeting, emphasized the necessity laid upon them of helping those who are tempted. The terrible calamity of the War had drawn people in different circumstances closer together, and it was to be hoped that this would be a permanent thing. To lessen the separation between classes should be one of their objects. She had been told that in the neighbourhood where she lived there was an increase of drunkenness among women. On going round to the public-houses near by, and looking in at different times in the day, she found 10 in one small public-house, 11 in the next one, and 13 in the next—all in the same street. There was, Lady Bunting continued, a very serious increase in the numbers drinking in the poorer places, but she did not find this the case in the better class public-house. Many of the wives and mothers go in with no idea of committing themselves, but for fellowship and for news. In one instance a wife who began to drink because she was lonely and wanted sympathy led her husband—when he came home from the front, wounded—to drink also, and both became drunkards. Many young girls who are not among those who habitually tempt soldiers are foolish and ignorant, and easily excited at the present time; it was the duty of those who were stronger to hold out a hand to the weak. A good deal could be done in factories and work-rooms, and among young servants; but they did not want the surveillance of the police, and such an incursion must be steadily resisted. The women must be given some opportunity for social life. Little centres could be opened, clubs (an empty shop might serve) where tea and coffee could be had for a small sum, and where some one could tell them something about the war with the aid of a map, and open their eyes to the moral questions that lay at the root of this awful struggle. Everything should be done to cheer and interest and entertain them, and it would be found that some would like to know about first-aid to the injured or sick cooking. Those helping in this work must not talk about temperance; they must make friends, and through the clubs new members might be drawn into the League of Honour.

A discussion followed in which many took part, and the following resolution was then moved by Miss Hessel, seconded, and carried: "This meeting heartily thanks Mr. Henderson, M.P., for opposing in the House of Commons the proposed police surveillance of the wives and dependents of our soldiers and sailors—a surveillance intolerable in itself, and that could not fail to produce ulterior results of a mischievous character."

UNITARIANISM IN CANADA.

THE Unitarian Churches of Canada have taken an important step forward, with the object of deepening the sense of fellowship between their widely separated congregations and consolidating their work, by starting a monthly publication, The Canadian Unitarian Bulletin, as the organ of the Canadian Unitarian Association. "The national life of Canada," says the October number of The Bulletin, "should be saner, more wholesome, and more progressive because of the infusion of the influence of liberal religion." The new journal aims at bringing Unitarians in Canada into closer touch with one another by publishing news of the churches of an informal kind, something in the nature of an intimate letter circulated among the branches of a large family (many of whom, it must be remembered, have never met, and cannot expect ever to become personally acquainted). The churches have in many ways suffered as a result of the War, but the crisis is being met in a brave spirit, and, if we may judge from the stirring message reprinted from the Calendar of the Church of the Messiah, Montreal, the sense of national responsibility and of the great opportunities for more devoted service and triumphant faith, which has been quickened by the European war, is realized as fully as it is in England. It is a matter of some interest in this connection that the new Hymn Book of the American Unitarian Association, which, it is hoped, will appeal to Unitarians in Canada as well as the United States, frankly recognizes the common interests of these two countries. It is, so The Bulletin believes, the first hymn book to include 'God Save the King' and Judge Weir's fine hymn, 'O Canada,' as well as 'My Country, 'tis of thee,' and Huntingdon's 'International Hymn.' Although the book has only been on the market a few weeks, it has already been adopted by a considerable number of Churches in Canada and the United States. The Secretary of the Editorial Committee of this new Hymn and Tune Book is the Rev. Henry Wilder Foote.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

British Women's League.—The Executive Committee of the British Women's League have lately received many encouraging and interesting reports of work which is being done by branches in different parts of the country in aid of the soldiers and sailors and the Belgian refugees. The Ansdell Branch recently sent a supply of "comforts" to Essex Hall to be distributed by the Committee of the League. These articles have been sent by them to the places known to be particularly in need. At West Kirby, acting on the suggestion of Mrs. Roper, the President of the local Branch, the members of the League, with the help of the congregation, have secured a house rent free, cleaned and furnished it, and have nine refugees comfortably housed. The Ansdell secretary, in reporting this to the Executive Committee, says, "In efforts such as these one feels the benefit of the League." At Hackney the members have thrown open a room to girls who are registered at the Labour Exchange in the neighbourhood, and various ladies hold classes for their benefit.

Midland Guilds' Union.—A very successful United Guilds' Meeting was held at Dudley on Saturday, the 21st inst. Guild members from Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Walsall, Coseley, Oldbury, Tamworth, Handsworth, Lye, and Dudley assembled for tea at 5 o'clock, and at 6.15 the Rev. J. A. Shaw, of Wolverhampton, opened a discussion on Bernhardt's 1911 publication, 'Germany and the Next War,' in which the Revs. J. M. Lloyd Thomas and E. Glyn Evans and Messrs. T. Matthews and W. Price took part. The Guilds' Union in the Midlands is, notwithstanding the war and many new difficulties, in a very flourishing condition. All the Guilds are doing good work by keeping in touch with young men who have joined the new army or gone to the front.

Portsmouth.—In a recent issue of The Portsmouth Evening News Mr. Walter Gleave writes as follows:—"Whilst walking to Portsmouth Parish Church on Sunday morning I thought I would walk through Highbury Street and have a look at John Pound's house. I was very much surprised to find several windows smashed, and all the things in the old historic room upset and knocked about, also paper stripped off the walls. I do not know who is responsible for the upkeep of the place, or supposed to look after it, but in the past some one has been interested enough to put a tablet outside the house, describing who lived there and what it was used for, and I cannot think Portsmouth people would now willingly let the house go to rack and ruin if they knew it. Perhaps this letter through you will result in it being attended to."

Preston.—The Rev. Mortimer Rowe last Sunday concluded a course of six Sunday evening addresses on the subject of 'War, Civilization, and Religion.' Good congregations have attended the series, the aim of which was to show how war has often played a necessary part in the past, in preserving for the human race things vital to its progress. In passing certain aspects of the present conflict were noticed in their relationship to preceding decisive struggles. The subjects included 'The Conquest of Canaan,' 'Marathon,' 'Attila,' 'The Cross and the Crescent,' 'The Armada,' and 'Napoleon.' At the close of the last service a supplementary collection yielded £2 towards a Christmas Day Fund for the Army and Navy. A second parcel of knitted woollen goods has also just been dispatched. In the December Calendar a series of addresses on subjects connected with the present war is announced.

Stockport.—An exceptionally interesting address was given on Monday last by Mr. J. L. Paton on 'Germany' to the members of the Literary and Social Union in connection with the Unitarian Church. In a personal explanation of his attitude, Mr. Paton explained that for a portion of his education he was indebted to Germany, and he was deeply grateful to that country for all it had done in science, theology, and philosophy towards enlightenment and knowledge. But knowledge was not everything, and could be used for evil purposes as well as for good. Teach a man all about a lock and he could make it better, but he could also pick it more easily. The life and teaching of Bismarck were carefully dealt with, and it was shown how it led up to the later teaching of Treitschke, Bernhardt, and others. The lecturer, with his intimate knowledge of the country, was able to show how absolutely undemocratic Germany was in her methods. Everything was managed from the top, even to a man's religion, and it was all done with a set purpose—the material welfare of the country, the expansion of its commerce, and the enlargement of its boundaries. It was this materialistic view of things which was its undoing. There was little genuine religious life in the Protestant churches of Germany. Here, in England, we were still old-fashioned enough to think that right was always right, but over there the vicious principle that "the end justifies the means" had led them into the undue glorification of might. The State existed largely for military purposes. Mr. Paton made a special appeal to the women present to realize the horrors of a military system under conscription.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

FOOTBALL AND THE WAR.

THERE has been a good deal of correspondence about professional football during the War. It has been attacked on the ground that it is unpatriotic, and injures recruiting. It has been defended because the men who are keeping our industrial machinery going need recreation. There is a good deal to be said on both sides of the controversy; but we are not convinced that the defence is genuine. The trail of finance is over the whole thing. The syndicates and the professional players, who make large sums of money out of football, are putting up a stiff fight in their own interest. We are not prepared to go all the way with Mr. Maurice Hewlett, who describes the men who frequent football matches as loafers, but his words of scorn for the "two thousand gladiators in the pay of the football clubs" are not at all too severe.

A LOSS TO STUDENTS OF TOWN-PLANNING.

One of the most unfortunate results of the Emden's activity was the sinking of the Clan Grant, which had on board the unique town-planning exhibition arranged by Prof. Patrick Geddes, and shown by him at the Civic Exhibition in Dublin this summer. It is doubtful if it will ever be possible to replace the models and charts, ancient maps, diagrams, and engravings which went to make up the collection, for they represent the work of a lifetime, and much sympathy will be felt for Prof. Geddes, who has done so much to stimulate civic idealism. The exhibition was being taken to India for the display there in connexion with Prof. Geddes' visit to plan several Indian cities, but fortunately its promoter, with his son, had booked their passage on another ship. The Architects' War Committee has subscribed £50 for the preparation of fresh plans and diagrams, and an emergency equipment is being dispatched to India.

MADAME LOYSON'S HOSPITAL.

The Christian Register publishes an appeal for funds for wounded soldiers in Paris from the wife of Paul Hyacinthe Loyson, son of Père Hyacinthe Loyson, who is herself an American. To help to meet the present great need she decided to open a small hospital at her Paris home, after having spent nearly two months nursing in the Protestant hospital, as many more nurses and beds are required, and, to quote her own words, "though I have decided to give everything we have, still it is not sufficient." "My husband," continues Madame Loyson, "went off on the first day. By his position of interpreting officer on the army staff he is a non-combatant, so, thank God, will have to take no human life, though his own must necessarily be exposed often. But so far all is well, and one must live but one day at a time, else the load of anguish would be more than one could bear. The only joy one can still have is the joy of helping to lighten the pain and sorrow about one."

THE OLDEST LIVING NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

The Hartford Daily Courant, which started life in 1764 as The Connecticut Courant, has recently issued a monster number of forty-eight pages in celebration of its 150th anniversary. It is older than The Times, which gives it cordial greeting, and quotes some passages from its earlier pages which sound quaintly in modern ears. At the time when the Courant was started its readers were "loyal subjects of King George," Connecticut was still subject to Indian wars, and within her borders negroes were advertised for sale. Within four years after the first issue was brought out by Thomas Green, of Hartford, we read of tea as "the shame of wives and the disgrace of husbands," and a little later comes the following significant passage:—"We hear from Boston that last Thursday evening between 300 and 400 boxes of the noted East India Tea by some accident, which happened in an attempt to get it on shore, fell overboard. That the boxes burst open and the tea was swallowed up in the vast abyss."

* * *

Coming to a later period, it is curious to read how little attention was given to events which now have their place among the most vivid episodes of history. The Declaration of Independence was printed without a word of comment; the attack on Fort Sumter had only ten headlines and one column of description; and this is what happened after Gettysburg: The Courant said editorially that "a considerable battle was fought at Gettysburg, Pa., on Wednesday." The Courant was marked by strong Puritan tendencies, and seems to have played a considerable part in opposing theatres and circuses. In 1853 Emerson lectured in Hartford, but his utterances were not reported by The Courant. The editors were apparently too busy opposing the plan for Sunday mail trains.

NOT CHARITY, BUT GOOD MANAGEMENT.

An interesting description of a shop girl's restaurant in Copenhagen is given in The Cornhill Magazine by Miss Edith Sellers. "The Kvindernes Køkken is not a charity; this is a fact that must be borne well in mind," she says; "it is a self-supporting institution, one, therefore, to which even the most susceptible of the shabby genteel goes without a scruple. Its proprietors have always attached great importance to this point, and very wisely. From the first they set their faces determinedly, in the management of their concern, against everything that even smacks of charity; not only because they had no money wherewith to be charitable, but because they hold that for those who can work, and their restaurant is for workers, to receive charity is demoralizing. All who go there pay the full cost of every portion of food they buy, the cost of its ingredients together with the cost of making it, their fair share of the cost of the upkeep of the place, and the contribution to the Reserve Fund which is being formed as a security against rainy days."

"The price of everything sold is, however, the lowest price for which it can be sold if the restaurant is to be self-supporting and secure against misfortune; and it is, of course, lower than it could otherwise be, owing to the fact that no salaries for management have to be paid. The two proprietors who act as managers and devote the whole of their time, thought, and energy to their work, live out of the concern, it is true; but beyond that they derive no benefit from it. They pride themselves on being successful traders, and such they are; it is not they themselves, however, but their customers who reap the fruits of their success. Were a plebiscite to be taken to decide who among living women is doing the best work for her fellow women, I should give my vote without a moment's hesitation to these two women—half a vote to each—who organized and are still managing this Kvindernes Køkken in Copenhagen. For, thanks to them, hundreds of girls who otherwise would be living on cups of tea and bits of cakes, have as much well-cooked wholesome food as they can eat every day; and although it may be easy for a working girl who is well fed to lead a decent life—a life really worth living, for one who is half starved, or even underfed, it is far otherwise. If only a few Englishwomen could be induced to become successful traders, and do for London what Injer Kyer and Marie Thomsen are doing for Copenhagen, not only should we have fewer sanatoria for consumptives to build, but fewer homes for inebriates."

THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

The Bible Society is said to have issued already over three quarters of a million books since the outbreak of the war. In all countries effected by the struggle they have been given freely to the wounded and the refugees, and for the great mass of the troops it was felt that the society could not do better than provide abundant supplies of well-printed books, which they offer to those who are anxious to give them to the soldiers at a reduced price. From the Bible House alone 350,000 volumes have been sent, and in Germany, at the expense of German people, friends of the Society, 150,000 volumes have gone for the same purpose.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

How shall we celebrate Christmas Day this year? The question is already occupying many minds. We believe that the right thing to do will be to assemble in our churches, and hold our family gatherings, and observe our immemorial customs as usual, only with a deeper note of religious seriousness. At the service on Christmas Day it would be fitting that the offertory should be given to some work of succour and help connected with the War, and the presents which we make to one another may well be on a simpler scale than usual, so that we may give more generously to those in need. But let the Church itself be decked for a holy festival, and let our praise go up to heaven in honour of the Prince of Peace. The evil and misery in the world are always present with us as an element of discord in the midst of our Christmas joy. If this year they are more menacing than usual, we have all the more reason to thank God for the assurance of love and spiritual victory which his Gospel brings to our hearts, and to pray for the light and help of his Spirit in the darkness of our mortal life.

THE arrival of the Santa Claus Ship at Plymouth last week, laden with gifts for European children whose fathers have gone to the War, reminds us that our delight in the simplicity and beauty of childlike things is a real factor in the unity, peace, and concord of nations. The following resolution, adopted by the Executive Committee of the Peace Society on November 26, expresses our common feeling of gratitude to the children of America for their message of good will:—

"The Committee of the Peace Society, 47, New Broad Street, London, E.C., have heard with unfeigned pleasure the news just published that the children of the United States had sent to the children of the belligerent nations of Europe a cargo consisting of 8,000 tons of gifts, comprising 5,000,000 separate articles intended for British, Belgian, French, German, and Austrian children, whose fathers are fighting in the War, the ship having arrived yesterday at Plymouth, and that another shipload is now on the way for the Russian and other children.

"As representing the friends of Peace of the Old World, they venture to convey to President Wilson, and through him to the children of America and those who have assisted them in this magnificent service, the gratification and gratitude felt by all for this unique thoughtfulness and unprecedented generosity.

"They further acclaim this new and noble incident, as symbolic of the forces that alone will secure the World's Peace and a signal illustration of the spirit and method of true and effective Peacemaking and are glad that these have found expression especially through the children, who are the hope and potentiality of the future."

One of the weekly visitors which we have missed since the beginning of the war has been the Christliche Welt, the representative organ of Liberal Christianity in Germany, which, for many years, has been on terms of marked cordiality with ourselves. It was with no small sense of relief that we noticed the absence of the name of its large-hearted editor, Dr. Martin Rade of Marburg, from the manifestoes which have been published. Now it is with lively satisfaction that we learn that he has had the courage to apply Christian principles to public policy in Germany. In a recent article he refers in the following terms to the violation of Belgian neutrality:—

I can only deplore the manner in which the Chancellor in his speech of August 4, has treated the question of neutral countries, for there was no need for him to have recourse to the proverb "Necessity knows no law." With that proverb I cannot convince those who behold in the existence of neutral States a triumph of the rights of man. That is why it is a pity—for which it is hard, indeed, to make reparation—that the German Empire should not have abstained altogether, at the very outset, from the sin of violating rights, which it has committed against Belgium. Whoever accuses my view of being unpatriotic I challenge, by whatever test he likes, to show that he loves his Fatherland better than I do.

The only comment which we have to make upon this significant pronouncement is that, knowing something as we do of Dr. Rade and his work, it is just what we had reason to expect. We have other friends and correspondents in Germany who would probably express themselves in a similar way, if they were at liberty to do so.

* * *

THROUGH the kindness of Mrs. Anna Braithwaite Thomas, Hon. Secretary of the Emergency Committee organized by the Society of Friends for the relief of innocent "alien enemies," we are able to give our readers to-day some first-hand information about work which is being done in Germany on similar lines. Mrs. Thomas, being an American citizen, has been able to visit Berlin. She had an interview with Dr. Siegmund Schultze last week, and has brought back with her a copy of the German appeal for help, a translation of which appears in our present issue. The information will be received with deep interest and relief by those who are anxious about the welfare of English friends still resident in Germany. But it is even more important as evidence of the activity of those nobler elements in German life with which formerly we have been in such close accord.

* * *

WE hope that some people who have been a little doubtful about our treatment of "alien enemies" in the detention camps, will be reassured by the words of the Rev. Martin Kramer, for many years pastor of the German Protestant Church in Manchester, who has just left for Germany after a period of detention at Lofthouse near Wakefield. In the course of an interview with a representative of The Manchester Guardian, Mr. Kramer referred to his strange experience in the following terms:—

I feel no resentment whatever, on the contrary, I must say, the authorities treated me very courteously. They were all exceedingly nice. The colonel commandant, the captain, the doctor, and the censor were all I could wish in the circumstances. We were divided into companies, or messes, and we appointed our own captains. The captain of my particular company was, I think, a Manchester man. There were about 500 of us altogether, representing all sections of society. Among them were Poles, Ruthenians, and Hungarians, as well as Germans and Austrians. We had concerts occasionally, and on Sundays we had religious services. Mass was celebrated by a Catholic priest, and I conducted service for the Protestants. We had religious gatherings also in the course of each week. There was a Rabbi for the Jews.

THE publication of the French Yellow Book this week is an event of capital importance for all who wish to understand the forces of unscrupulous statecraft with which are contending in this War. The documents, which are now given to the world for the first time, reveal Germany as preparing for war with the utmost deliberation. An official German document, dated March 19, 1913, sets forth in detail the need of educating the people to regard an offensive war as a necessity. It is stated in blunt terms that in the next European war the small States must either be forced to do Germany's bidding or be cowed. There is also to be an elaborate system of well-chosen agents who should get into contact with influential people in Egypt, Tunis, Algiers, and Morocco in order to prepare the necessary measures in case of a European war. The dominating motives of the German governing classes are summed up in a most illuminating report based on the evidence of French diplomatic and consular agents, dated July 30, 1913. "They feel themselves humiliated," the Report states, "at having to discuss matters with the French, to speak of right and reason in negotiations or conferences where they have not always easily prevailed, when they have the more decisive force on their side."

* * *

WE are dealing here with a conception of the State as aggressive power, which is strange to English habits of political thought. For it international law, the obligations of morality, and the claims of pity do not exist, when they cease to be the convenient tools of its ambition. As a non-moral agent it will trade in falsehood and treachery; it will devastate Belgium in obedience to a policy of frightfulness; and it will advocate the crushing of other nations by brute force as a necessary step to its own dominance in the world. It is this conception of the State, elaborated with the utmost precision and promulgated with the dogmatic ferocity of the doctrinaire mind, which lies behind this War. If other countries adopted the same view of the State as a non-moral corporation with an insatiable will to power, civilization itself would disappear, and the whole world would return to the primitive savagery of warring greed. It is against that vision of desolation that the best friends of peace and international brotherhood have set their faces like flint.

* * *

WHEN we look this fact in the face it seems rather petty to argue that if here and there diplomacy had been different the War might have been avoided. Let it also be remembered that intimate knowledge of the danger which was threatening us and the whole of Europe must have tied the hands of our Government and strewn its path with difficulties for a long time past. It has had to live and act in a world which was mined with German secret agents, who were only too ready to foment disorder in one place in order to clear the ground for aggression elsewhere. Probably when all the facts can be made known it will be found that Sir Edward Grey was not free to act in Persia as many of us desired him to act. In view of all that has come to light lately it is ungenerous and unfair to assume that he was supine and indifferent, and simply did not care, when all the time he may have known that the watchful foe was only waiting till we had a difficult quarrel on hand in order to plunge Europe into war. The existence of a non-moral statecraft, armed with terrific force, in the heart of our civilization must always limit freedom of action and create extraordinary difficulties for a democratic Government like our own, for we can never deal with it on equal terms of honour and national obligation. The time has come when for our own and all men's good we can tolerate it no longer.

* * *

THE retirement of Mr. C. S. Loch from the Charity Organization Society may almost be said to mark the end of an epoch in our methods of philanthropy. In spite of the popular discredit which has overtaken the name and some of the activities of the society which he founded, he has impressed his mind permanently upon all our organized social effort. He was among the first to insist that it is not enough to desire to do good if we do not also will to do it in the best possible way. He introduced thought, scientific method, and an unlimited capacity for taking pains into a sphere where formerly the sentimentalist had reigned supreme. In all his work, even when it struck some people as unyielding and hard, there was also a deep respect for human nature. He knew how difficult it is to help a man without injuring his self-respect and his power to help himself. The passionate intensity with which he held the cardinal principles of his doctrine made him inflexible in their application, and more than a little blind to the danger of summing up human nature in a formula. He has been accused of dogmatism and pedantry; but his strongest opponents have sometimes exhibited the same qualities, and they owe more to his teaching and influence than they have ever acknowledged. He deserves to be honoured, and not least by the poor whom he has lived to help, as a great philanthropist.

* * *

WE receive many letters of appreciation, and, perhaps, an equal number of criticism, some angry, some amusing, some interesting, in the course of a year. Many of the latter it gives us great pleasure to publish. The former we reserve for the privacy to which they fitly belong. We think, however, that we may break this rule in regard to a communication which we received this week, because its human testimony may be helpful to others. "On Sunday [our correspondent writes], we had four soldiers here for the day, and I read them the first half of your article in the last INQUIRER on 'The Heroic Appeal.' When I had done there was a silence. 'It's nice, isn't it,' I said. 'Yes,' they said, 'and it's true.'"

THE SIN OF COMPLACENCY.

THERE are some people to whom admiration of their own country or a word spoken in her honour seems to be almost a vice. They are so much occupied with scourging her faults and exposing her weakness that they have no eye for anything else. Finding little either to love or to praise, they are suspicious of everybody who is of a contrary opinion. When other people refuse to join in the sad refrain, "All our righteousness is as filthy rags," and take pleasure in the thought that, at some crisis of fate, their country has been splendidly right, they have one word of withering scorn to apply to them. They say that they are complacent.

This word has been used so often lately that it is worth while to ask whether it has any precise meaning, and what is the source of the accusation. On the first point we may observe that it belongs to the vocabulary of abuse. It is intended to convey an impression of something foolish and odious. It implies self-righteousness and the moral dogmatism without deep moral conviction which is characteristic of the self-righteous man. It recalls the smug people whom we have known in fiction or real life, and says in effect, You are just like that. When a man writes to the newspapers and accuses England of complacency, let him remember that he is accusing whole battalions of the noblest and most enlightened men and women in the country of moral shallowness and incompetence in face of the most terrible ordeal which they have ever had to face. There is, at any rate, a chance that they may have studied the situation as carefully, and weighed the evidence as patiently, as their critic, and are not very far behind him in capacity for trained moral judgment. But they have come to the conclusion that their country is right, and they show that they are glad that it is so, and they proclaim their conviction with ardour. It is, we suspect, just this element of gladness and ardour which is the ground of their offence. If only they could have been a little sad about it; if only they would praise their country in one breath and scold her with the next, much might be forgiven. But this whole-hearted support of the country's cause, the critic does not know what to make of it. He has known so little of these generous emotions in his life. His profession of fault-finding for the good of the world makes it incumbent upon him to prick the bubble of our patriotic faith. His only defence against the vigorous and ardent people who crowd about him so uncomfortably is to accuse them of the sin of complacency.

A goodly number of the Adullamites is of this description. They find a melancholy pleasure in believing that most people are wrong. But we are aware that there are others of a nobler breed, with whom it is more worth while to argue. We have been taught by our Christian teachers that, without modesty, there can be no real goodness. His own virtues cannot be a source of pride to a good man. It is, however, wrong to infer that the emphatic declaration that his course of action is right is a breach of modesty, or that he ought to have the slightest doubt about his confidence in the rightness of what he is doing, because his judgment may be mistaken. That would be to trifle with the supreme verdicts of conscience. For the religious man his duty is the Will of God. He accepts it; he binds his life to it by irrevocable action; he proclaims it to others as true and good, without a doubt in his heart or a quaver in his voice. But so far from making him conceited or self-righteous, it deepens his sense of unworthiness of the trust committed to him, and fills him with the desire to grow richer in moral power. We believe that something precisely similar is taking place in the national consciousness at the present time. The verdict of conscience on the main issues is for most of us quite clear. We are entitled to say this with the utmost plainness of speech before the world; for it is the word of righteousness which is given us to speak. But it does not lift up our hearts in empty conceit. Here and there there are shallow fools, and we make a present of them to Mr. Bernard Shaw or any other of our national censors who cares to spend time in spitting them on his rapier. But most of us, the crowd of ordinary citizens, are far too much in earnest and too deeply sensible of the seriousness of this business which we have in hand for the dull pleasures of self-congratulation. We love our country more passionately than we have ever done before, and we want to make her more worthy, not of our affection—for that goes to her always as to the Mother who bore us—but of the high calling which God has given to her in the world. If smugness and self-complacency have been among our national faults in the past, it is the great emotions of the Day of Visitation, and not critical pamphlets and letters to the Press, which will cleanse our hearts of this perilous stuff.

But we know that the critic has still another arrow for us in his quiver. What business, he says, have we to say anything about right or wrong in international questions. Our own record is not clean. Upon this matter we have two things to say. People who bombard us with catalogues of the mistakes or crimes of England in the past, and without adequate knowledge put the basest possible interpretation upon everything that is done by our Foreign Office, are guilty of a singular lack of frankness. According to their statement of the case, there has been nothing noble in our national records, nothing which we can recall with pride, nothing which ought to attract the loyalty and affection of good men. Those of us who love our country enough to want to know the truth will dismiss this horrid nightmare of diseased brains, and seek to learn the lessons of our past truly and in their right proportion, tingling with shame at all the unworthy things that have been done, but rejoicing none the less that we are citizens of no mean country. Our other remark refers to the plea that we are disqualified from passing moral judgment because we have often done wrong ourselves. This is a valid argument against all the airs of superior virtue, but it is not valid against moral approval and condemnation, unless conscience is to abdicate its functions altogether. We are all sinful men, and have fallen far short of the glory of God, but alike in personal conduct and national affairs we do know that one thing is right and another is wrong, or that one policy leads to hell and another may at least ask for the blessing of heaven; and, knowing this, we must have the courage to confess it with all boldness. It is a fatal error to confuse clean, outspoken, moral convictions, held with the fervour which sends men to die for a cause, with self-complacency, a dull vice which blunts our sensibility to noble aims and takes the sting of heroism out of our blood.

And yet we are told by the little coterie of critics that we are so complacent. We are disturbed, anxious, determined, fully persuaded in our own minds, but complacent! No! Let these people beware lest the charge which they are so ready to fling at others should recoil upon themselves. We do not accuse them of playing the part of the superior person who takes to himself the cloak of self-complacency to conceal his lack of thought and heart and faith. But that is always the danger of the critic when he is face to face with things far too terrible and magnificent for his pedantic little methods. Perhaps we need look no further to discover the reason why certain people are so eager to warn us against the sin of complacency at the present time.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE VALUE OF GREAT MEN.

AMIDST the pettiness and narrowness of common life, in the presence of human weakness and baseness, the lives of great men do something to meet the misgivings which death forces on our minds. If all men were what, alas! a very large portion of humanity is, strangers to high thoughts and pure and generous emotions and noble and magnanimous aims, living a life petty and mean, or foul and evil, it would not be difficult to think that a being so mean, a thing of such sordid desires and contemptible pursuits, a nature so little worth preserving is destined to extinction, when, as has been said, "its brief term of fretfulness and folly has run out." But when we turn to contemplate human life in its nobler representatives, its beautiful, heroic, saintly spirits, refined and chastened by the discipline of life, growing to the last in purity and nobleness, it is impossible to believe, unless the world is governed by mocking Moloch, and not a God of wisdom and love, that all this abruptly terminates in a little heap of foul and smouldering matter, and that the end of these men is that of the beasts that perish. But the hope for humanity which such lives inspire is something more than this. Is there yet a better time coming for the world? Has the far future a Golden Age, a period of universal purity and happiness in store for humanity? Is the race destined to reach a glorious future? I answer, Yes. It is no wild and quixotic faith which inspires Christian effort for the regeneration of human society. The final emancipation of the race from imperfection and sin, the era of millennial purity and perfection, is no baseless dream of religious enthusiasm. We are compassed about with a great cloud of witnesses to the suppressed splendour that lurks in this poor nature of ours. There are latent resources in the least and lowest specimens of humanity which makes it brother, and might make it peer and equal, of the brightest spirit that ever breathed mortal breath. Yea, with reverence be it said, the very greatness of him who was emphatically Son of man was a greatness in which all men may participate. And if you would form some faint conception of what human society may one day become, think of a world in which the common life of all shall rise to the level of what the noblest and best of the sons of men at their highest moments of intellectual and moral exaltation have ever reached. Can imagination in its highest soarings surpass that, which I believe to be a hope based on most sober and solid grounds of fact—the hope of a future in which every human being shall be wise with the wisdom of the wisest and holy with the goodness of the best? Yea, for even that falls short of the sublime reality—the hope of an approaching time when, in words which, if they were not those of inspiration, it might seem daring presumption to utter: We shall "all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."—Principal Caird.

NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE AND LIBERTY.

It is not to be thought of that the flood Of British freedom, which, to the open sea Of the world's praise, from dark antiquity Hath flowed, "with pomp of waters, unwithstood,"

Roused though it be full often to a mood Which spurns the check of salutary bands, That this most famous Stream in bogs and sands

Should perish; and to evil and to good Be lost for ever. In our halls is hung Armoury of the invincible Knights of old: We must be free or die, who speak the tongue

That Shakespeare spake; the faith and morals hold

Which Milton held. In everything we are sprung

Of Earth's first blood, have titles manifold.

WORDSWORTH.

When I have borne in memory what has tamed

Great Nations, how ennobling thoughts depart

When men change swords for ledgers, and desert

The student's bower for gold, some fears unnamed

I had, my Country—am I to be blamed? Now, when I think of thee, and what thou art, Verily, in the bottom of my heart, Of those unfilial fears I am ashamed.

For dearly must we prize thee; we who find

In thee a bulwark for the cause of men; And I by my affection was beguiled: What wonder if a Poet now and then, Among the many movements of his mind, Felt for thee as a lover or a child!

Ibid.

O MOST LOVING FATHER, who wilt us to give thanks for all things, to dread nothing but the loss of thee, and to cast all our care on thee who carest for us; preserve us from faithless fears and worldly anxieties, and grant that no clouds of this mortal life may hide from us the light of that Love which is immortal, and which thou hast manifested to us in thy son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

O GOD, the sovereign Good of the soul, who requirest the hearts of all thy children; deliver us from all sloth in thy work, all coldness in thy cause; and grant us by looking unto thee to rekindle our love, and by waiting upon thee to renew our strength; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THEOLOGICAL RECONSTRUCTION.

SINCE the publication of 'Essays and Reviews' half a century ago many attempts have been made towards Theological Reconstruction, and many have been the volumes brought to birth in the effort of the Church to accommodate itself to new ideas.

'Bampton Lectures,' 'Lux Mundi,' 'Contentio Veritatis,' 'Foundations,' to say nothing of manifestoes by Mr. Campbell, Sir Oliver Lodge, and others, have all been put forth in the hope of providing some reconciliation between the new knowledge and the old faith. All these writers were impressed by a sense of the failure of the traditional theology to fit into the picture of the universe as revealed by modern science. They felt that if religion is to retain a hold on the minds of intelligent men, it must be given an intellectual articulation more in harmony with science, criticism, and experience than the antiquated and often misleading articles of ancient creeds and confessions. Anxious to save religion from perishing in the ruin and downfall which has overtaken the systems of thought in which it was long enshrined, they endeavoured, and not without some fair measure of success, so to restate the substance of Christian doctrine as to harmonize it with the growing knowledge of the new time. It must be remembered that this is no merely modern phenomenon. Theology has been always on the move. There has never been any standing still—no, not even in those Middle Ages which are sometimes regarded as a period of theological immobility. Each generation, while holding to the same prescribed form-words, has given them its own special significance. At last the time came when the new thought burst all the prescribed forms, and compelled men to provide a more adequate expression. The movement of change is inevitable. Theories and theologies are on the march, and always have been. What intelligence discerns is that the march is never a retreat. As the horizon broadens it shows, only more clearly, the outlines of our spiritual inheritance.

The vital thing of to-day in the great movement is the growing clearness with which men see the distinction between Theology and Religion. Men sometimes speak of the conflict between the "New Theology and the Old Religion." There is no such conflict. The issue is between the new and the old Theology. At the time of Copernicus an opponent might as well have lectured on "The New Astronomy and the Old Stars," oblivious of the fact that the stars are the same whatever astronomical theory be in the ascendant. For just as the Copernican astronomy made no difference to the stars, but was only a new theory of the heavenly bodies, so the New Theology is a new theory of the old religion. There is no antithesis between the old religion and the new Theology. For what is Theology? Theology is man's theory of God and man and the universe, and their relation to each other. Theology is the intellectual expression man fashions for his religion and his religious experience—an expression which is, and must be, largely shaped and coloured by the knowledge of his time, by its type of civilization, and even its social and political institutions. As knowledge widens and grows from more to more, men's theories of God and man and the universe are bound to change in the effort to bring theory and fact into some kind of concord. In this process many things disappear that once seemed to men of the essence of faith. Criticism and science make short work of mere formulæ. But the non-essential disappears only in order that the essential may be more clearly discerned and more intelligently held.

In no restatement of theology is this more adequately set forth than in Rev. T. Rhondda Williams's recent volume 'The Working Faith of a Liberal Theologian' (London, Williams & Norgate, 5s. net). Mr. Williams takes for granted the work of science and criticism in the disintegration of the old theology. He is content to leave that aspect of things to other hands. He is more concerned about construction than destruction. The value of his book is in its positive attitude. It is not what a man disbelieves that matters, but what is his real working faith. These ancient expressions of belief so fast disappearing enshrined, after all, certain abiding realities, and it is Mr. Williams's purpose to emphasize the truth and the need of these abiding things under the forms and conditions of our modern life. Many of the doctrines of Orthodox theology—Atonement, Election, Incarnation, &c.—have their roots in the soul. But they cannot find expression to-day in the language of dead-and-gone scholasticism. It is in a finely tempered spirit Mr. Williams deals with the eternal truths hidden within statements of beliefs that are now impossible. One instance from his chapter on Salvation will suffice:—

"The crude way in which the doctrine of Atonement has often been presented comes very near the child's description, 'God was very angry, and said he must kill somebody. Jesus said, Kill me!' But the essential inner meaning is another matter.... It is a fact that many old doctrines whose forms we have now discarded get their strength from the deeper consciousness of God out of which they sprang. This has been the strength of Evangelicalism, and the soul of Evangelicalism is eternally true. The tragic pity is that so many Evangelicals do not know what its soul is. The old prophet of Israel put the whole doctrine which Calvary exemplified, and which underlies Evangelical theology, into one sentence when he gave these words to God: 'I have made you; I will carry you.' The doctrine of Christ dying for men, carrying their sins in his body on the tree, is a symbol of this fact in God's relation with men. 'Well, here I am, not responsible for being here, but so set by Some One else; and the responsibility of the life which is too great for me is His.'"

Mr. Williams is much more concerned with Religion than with Theology. He is a real and skilful constructive, and he is wise enough not to attempt to build on the shifting sands of opinion. Saving faith, the substance of Religion, the Gospel within the Gospel, is something above and beyond theological opinions. They pass, but religion is permanent. Religion is liberating itself from worn-out formulas, preparing also for a freer and wider manifestation of its power. It declares that the truth of the heart is always greater than the truth of the intellect. It teaches us to find in its light, when we search the Christian centuries, a reality independent of and infinitely higher than all the dogmatic forms in which it is wrapped. Those forms were merely time-vestures suited to certain mental conditions. They were the earthen vessels which Time itself has shattered. But the treasures of love and trust, and hope, and holy ideals, and purity of soul, and enthusiasm for righteousness they contained are immortal. It is its intensity of faith in the things that cannot be shaken that gives Mr. Williams's book its great value, its noble fervour, and its persuasive power.

THE DOGMATISM OF MR. BERNARD SHAW.

SIR,—There must be many who, like myself, are very grateful for Mr. Gow's dignified and noble examination in your columns of Mr. Bernard Shaw's late deliverance in The New Statesman. We have lived for a long time now contentedly enough under Mr. Shaw's intellectual régime, joyfully following his impish genius of wit, with the lashing tongue and pitiless heart, through the pillorying of all sorts of slow-brained Philistinism. We have greeted with inextinguishable laughter his process of making the good and the bad equally ridiculous, and applauded his instinct "to attack every idea which has been full-grown for ten years." He helped us in our formation of judgments in every direction, and we agreed with him in questioning "The heroism of people who never do anything heroic." We watched him laughing in his sleeve, and were content to suppose him in a state of moral indignation most originally expressed. His method of taking this or that generous human sentiment and then turning it inside out and upside down seemed to us (as no doubt sometimes it was) a useful effort after reality. He did everything to the accompaniment of our laughter and cheers, and some shams have been laughed out of countenance, and some hypocrisies unveiled by his method. In any case, we will (in normal times) accept anything from a man who forces us irresistibly to laugh.

Yet even before the war some people, I think, were beginning to question Mr. Shaw's régime a little. One cannot live on laughter any more than one can live on champagne. When, in Mr. Shaw's protean personality, were the sage and the seer going to emerge? When was the constructive prophet to appear, who had been so long heralded and preluded by the destructive critic? We began to demand a gospel of our chartered libertine, and some serious illumination from our dancing will o' the wisp. We examined his superman and his life force to see if these, as a gospel, held together. But always when we tried to pin him down he slipped out of our anxious hands with the same shrieks of sardonic laughter.

Then we began to get, perhaps, just a little tired. We still laughed all through his plays, and chuckled all through his prefaces. But we began to feel at last that a tragedy would be preferable to a harlequinade. And it occurred to us, to our surprise, that the laughter of this imp of destruction left untouched the soul of the world, and that with whatever jargon he bombarded the things of the spirit, the things of the spirit remained unharmed. We had been "shocked, and shocked pretty often"; that was good for us, as he said; but there were certain eternal values which we discovered to be quite unmoved after the Shavian earthquakes. The good and the bad were not the same thing after all... And then came the war. The tragedy had arrived. We were face to face with the greatest and most terrible thing we had ever known; our hearts swelled with unspeakable and wordless emotions. In the midst of the malign conflict we became aware, as never before, of our own souls, and as never before we knew how right was right and wrong was wrong. The best and bravest among us arose and went out to die. As you say, sir, in your noble leader, they heard the heroic appeal, and with gladness offered the sacrifice. And Mr. Shaw? Did he express at last for us the pity and the terror and the grandeur of it all, and rise to the stupendous crisis of the world? No. He still laughed, and called us names, and went on with the harlequinade while we suffered and bled and died. And this time we did not laugh. It was as if a clown came and danced on the very altar of our hearts, and some of us will never forget the sacrilege. Yours, &c.

December 1, 1914.

SIR,—I hold no brief for Mr. Shaw who is quite able to conduct his own defence against yourself and Mr. Gow. What I wish to point out is that there is another side in his 'Common Sense about the War' which is almost entirely ignored in THE INQUIRER. He differentiates entirely between British diplomacy and the British people, and declares on p. 9 that "The nation had a clear conscience." On p. 11 he says that "even the wise who loathe war... had to admit that police duty is necessary and that war must be made on such war as Germany had made." He even goes as far as to say that had Jaurès been at the Foreign Office and Macdonald the Premier "we must have drawn the sword to save France and smash Potsdam." Finally, he is an anti-militarist whose remarks a year ago on that point would have won your praise instead of your silence and neglect as to-day.

Shaw would never have written his pamphlet had he regarded himself as Mr. Gow says he did, "as the only serious true man among a nation of hypocrites," for the simple reason that he wishes us to rise above our ignorance and our prejudice and intellectual sloth, and really think and act towards a clean, sweet, wholesome world state. He writes to and for folk who can be moved to do the right, not simply to lash hypocrisy.

We do not yet see our international relationships with regard to the future, but I earnestly hope THE INQUIRER will clear a space for helpful discussion along those lines, and if Mr. Shaw's stinging manifesto and Mr. Gow's indignant repudiation lead on to that, good must result. But for Heaven's sake let us no longer pose as faultless angels fighting against the myrmidons of Satan.

For instance, who would dream, when one hears so much of the violation of Belgian neutrality as the factor for British intervention as a protector of the existence of little peoples, that we, ourselves, are branded with the same shame? In 1907 Britain and Russia signed an agreement guaranteeing the independence and integrity of Persia, and Sir C. S. Rice, the Ambassador to Persia, said "The object of the two Powers in making this agreement is not in any way to attach, but rather to assure for ever the independence of Persia; not only do they wish not to have at hand any excuse for intervention, but their object in these friendly negotiations was not to allow one another to intervene on the pretext of safeguarding their interests." Yet in 1910-11 Russia marched in troops, occupied the capital, banished the American financial reformer, Schuster, hung Persian patriots, and has since then occupied northern Persia with Britain's consent! Mr. Brailsford's recent letter to The Nation shows a Russian army marching to the invasion of Turkey via Persia! Our noble (!) ally never even offered to compensate Persia as the Germans did Belgium. Yet neither you nor Mr. Gow have ever referred to this national disgrace and criminal connivance on our part. There are other instances of as gross a betrayal which space forbids one quoting. Is it any wonder that Mr. Shaw scours us for hypocrisy? If Britain must fight, she must, but she is as morally frail as Germany every whit.

THE DISMISSAL OF SERVANTS.

SIR,—It hardly seems necessary to reply to Dr. Dufton after your footnote to his letter, except to remark that if a true statement is a gratuitous libel—and I suppose the truth may be libellous—then I am guilty, and as further proof it will suffice to say that it has been deemed necessary by our Borough War Relief Committee (of which I am a member) to issue a letter to the press signed by Mayor and Secretary, protesting against the dismissal of servants by wealthy employers who could afford to keep them on. We had no doubt about the undiminished unearned incomes of certain of them. It is curious to see on the same page as Dr. Dufton's letter this, "The large employer who dismisses his workmen while signing a substantial cheque for charity," for I can match it exactly with a case in which I have myself obtained relief grants for the sufferers. I don't wonder that Dr. Dufton is surprised and indignant. I have been both surprised and pained at many things here; for instance, the Insurance Act meanness; and we Yorkshire folk cannot understand them as possible until we see them. But when one recalls what is known as the Speenhamland (Poor Law) Act, 1834, when heavy poor-rates were raised to subsidise the wretched wages of the poor, instead of increasing wages, and knows where Speenhamland is, then it is not very astonishing that such meanness has some lingering remains hereabouts.—Yours, &c. RICHARD NEWELL.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THOUGHTS ON THE WAR. By A. Clutton Brock. London: Methuen & Co. 1s. net.

THE short essays on the War which Mr. Clutton-Brock contributed anonymously to The Times Literary Supplement have aroused widespread interest and gratitude, and he has been well advised to reissue them in a collected form. Amid the flood of writing produced by the War, they stand out with a note of distinction. They are the expression of a temperament—reflective and a little detached, it is true, but with a rich sympathy for human frailty and clear insight into many of the causes of moral strength or decay. We like the essays all the better because we do not always wish to make their mood our own. The conception of Germans as marionettes may easily entangle us in the moral sophistry which refuses to blame because it can only pity. We also adhere to some criticisms on 'The Illusions of War' which we made at the time of its first publication. We wish, moreover, that a book which is so intimately concerned with moral perspective had dealt more adequately with the terrible problem created by the German treatment of Belgium. We know that many gentle and refined people are trying to put that problem away from them; but it is a ghastly reality, and must influence our feelings now and the difficulties which we shall have to face afterwards. Did Mr. Clutton-Brock avoid the subject because it would break the spell of his quiet reflectiveness and force from him a strong note of indignation? But these are minor points, which do not touch the warmth of our gratitude or the sincerity of our admiration. This is the kind of War literature which people ought to buy, and having bought it, they will pay the author the highest compliment if, instead of professing easy agreement with everything he says, they are provoked to follow his example and to do some patient thinking for themselves.

GATHERED FRAGMENTS FROM MANY YEARS. By H. W. Hawkes. From the Author, 59, Trinity Road, Bootle. 3s. 6d. net.

MANY friends who have known and honoured Mr. Hawkes as a faithful labourer for many years in the field of ministry, first at the North End Mission in Liverpool, and latterly at Bootle and West Kirby, will have a cordial welcome for this volume. It is a collection of verse, some of it already well known; and for the rest, while there are pieces which the author rightly describes as trivial, the book as a whole must by no means be taken as a mere gathering up of the "scattered literary pastimes" of which the Preface speaks. The contents are described on the title-page as "Epic, Legendary, Dramatic, and Miscellaneous, Serious and Trivial." About a third of the volume consists of four poems, which have already seen the light: 'The Man of Nazareth,' 1889; 'The Coming of Christ,' 1906; 'The Heretic,' 1908; 'Servetus, a Drama,' 1911. Of these, the first especially has approved itself as of really helpful value to seekers after religious truth and a clear understanding of the life of Jesus. Further interest will be found in the three essays in drama on Old Testament subjects, Abraham, Esau, and Saul, and there are also Christian legends retold in narrative verse. As adding value to the personal element in the book, we note the 'Memories of Travel' and 'Holiday Gleanings,' and if we had room for a quotation it should be of the verses on p. 279, with their happy defiance of death, in our judgment the most successful of all the pieces in the lighter vein. One complaint we have against the editing of the book. Why should the hymns, which are worth a great deal more than much of the other verse, be printed in smaller type? There are forty-five hymns in all, and several of them are likely to be remembered and used in our hymn-books long after the rest of these 'Gathered Fragments' are forgotten. We value much that Mr. Hawkes has said to us "in rhythmic cadence," but his hymns most of all.

THE British and Foreign Unitarian Association has issued a facsimile of the Abraham Lincoln poster, to which we referred recently, in the form of a post-card which can be obtained at Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, price 6d. per dozen, or 3s. 6d. per 100, post free. Many people may be glad to use it this year as a Christmas greeting. We have also received from Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons the national Christmas card which they are selling in aid of the Prince of Wales's Fund, price 6d. It conveys, both pictorially and by apt quotations, the patriotic spirit of the present time, and will doubtless have a ready sale, though we fear a good deal of the pleasure derived from receiving Christmas cards of various designs from our friends will be lessened if every one happens to select this particular one. The 'Bird of Good Omen' card, however, which is issued by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, provides an alternative choice, and will appeal to many people. The picture of the doves on the olive branch, outlined against a rainy sky spanned by the rainbow, has been specially designed by Mr. O. Murray Dixon, and brings a seasonable message of peace and goodwill. This card can be obtained, price 3d., at 23, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W., and postcards with the same design are to be had for 1s. a dozen, post free.

WE have received from Mr. Edmund New a copy of a general view of Florence, drawn in pen and ink, and printed in colotype by the Oxford University Press, uniform in size and manner with his print 'The Towers of Oxford.' The view is taken from the terrace, below the Church of San Miniato, and reproduces one of the noblest panoramas in the world with the accuracy of detail and the feeling for architectural form which give distinction to Mr. New's work. The ornamental border which surrounds the drawing is designed with great skill to act as a key to the principal buildings. Copies, price half-a-guinea, may be had from the Fine Art Society, Ltd., 148, New Bond Street, W.

AN excellent series of short addresses to children for the use of teachers and parents is comprised in Miss Lilian Hall's little book 'Helpers and Hinderers,' published by the Sunday School Association (1s. net). They appeared originally in THE INQUIRER, and many of our readers will be glad to know that they have been rescued from the obscurity of the "back numbers" in which so many good things are hidden away. Miss Hall has a cheery, sympathetic way of bringing home to the childish mind the lessons she wishes to teach, and it is clear that she loves both children and animals—a sure guarantee that she knows how to appeal to them successfully. Subjects which have become, for most teachers, hopelessly hackneyed, such as duty, obedience, patriotism, and happiness, naturally figure in these pages. They can no more be dispensed with in a book of this kind than they can be eliminated from our daily life. But they are dealt with in a pleasant, suggestive way, and the last-named receives fresh illustration in the fanciful imagery of the 'Blue Bird.' Two chapters are devoted to 'Shakespeare's Boys,' and two others to the story of Robert Dick, the geologist and collector of Thurso, which make good reading for young nature students.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE CHRISTMAS SHIP.

YOU have been hearing a great deal lately about battleships and the heroic way in which those who man them are protecting our shores. But have you heard of a battleship which has just made a voyage across the Atlantic for the purpose of bringing six million presents from the children of America for the children of the soldiers of all the nations engaged in the present war? That, surely, is one of the most remarkable uses to which a battleship could be put, and you can well understand that it has been the topic of conversation throughout the United States for weeks past among the boys and girls, living in safe and comfortable homes, who have been saving up their money, and collecting dollars from their friends, to provide it with this splendid cargo of goodwill. You see, they could not bear to think that so many of their orphaned and, in some cases, homeless little brothers and sisters in Europe, who have been learning recently with so much suffering what war actually means, should have no fun and happiness at Christmas-time to make them realize how much love there is still in the world.

The children of America have done a beautiful thing, and set a fine example to us who are so much nearer to these miseries of war than they. Of this we may be sure: that, whatever happiness they manage by their efforts to send across the Atlantic, they themselves will have a very happy Christmas. Every child who, by some bit of self-giving or spending has added a gift to the cargo of the Jason (that is the proper name of the Christmas ship) will know something of an open secret which, we are told, Jesus once passed on: It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Now, I wonder if you are thinking in any way of these poor little ones, whose case is so heartrending. Take the children of Belgium only; they concern us most, for they have had most to bear. And in a sense they have suffered for you, who are still safely sheltered in your peaceful homes, away from the terror of the great conflict. Some have lost their father, some their mother; some do not know where their people are, and may never find them again. It is true that numbers of helping hands are held out to them by merciful and pitiful people, and they will not be allowed to perish. But what about you? Christmas is coming, and with it, we hope, the old gladness for you. There will be Christmas presents waiting for you on Christmas morning, and kind friends to make the day joyful and unlike other days. Last year the children of Belgium, knowing nothing of what the dark year was to bring, woke up too with merry hearts. Are you thinking of their Christmas this year?

How good it would be if all the children who are rich in love and friends forgot themselves and their own pleasure for once, and, like those other children in America, determined to give a happier Christmas-tide to their little brothers and sisters of heroic Belgium. There are ever so many ways of doing it. I know some homes where there are too many toys for their owners to properly enjoy. Could they not determine to put aside so many presents to give again (and not the ones they liked least, either)? You could begin now to save up some pocket-money to buy gifts. You might even ask some of the donors of your presents if they would mind giving you this time the money instead, a little while before Christmas. Think how jolly it would be to go shopping for Belgian children in the wonderful toy-shops, and to wonder what it would really be best to buy! Don't think that you must get or make only what are called "useful" things. Other people will see to those. No; make up your mind that you will make Christmas happier for at least one Belgian child in exactly the nice and surprising way you like to be made happy yourself. I believe you would find it the most exciting Christmas you had ever spent. Suppose there were a League of children in England working and saving for the Belgian children's Christmas, just as the American children have been working for the Christmas ship! F. R.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. PHILIP H. HOLT.

IT is with deep regret that we have to announce the death of Mr. Philip H. Holt, which took place at his home, Croxteth Gate, Liverpool on Friday, November 27, at the age of 84. Mr. Holt was the last survivor of the remarkable group of four brothers who have conferred priceless gifts of public service and philanthropy upon Liverpool. "Liverpool's indebtedness to Mr. Holt [says The Liverpool Daily Post] cannot be measured, his principle of anonymity in benevolence having been carried out to the fullest extent. Never during his life, and in respect to his own easily-divined wishes, did the fact appear in print that he was the donor of the Wavertree Playground (at one time known as the 'Wavertree Mystery'), which is 108 acres in extent, and forms the finest personal gift ever made to Liverpool. The estate, strongly fenced and in perfect condition, together with some contiguous buildings, the rental of which was allotted for maintenance, was conveyed to the Corporation of Liverpool by a deed of gift dated May 20, 1895, and remarkable for brevity. The nominal donor, as the deed showed, was Mr. James Rhind, since deceased, architect and estate agent, who acted, it has since transpired, in his professional capacity, confidentially for Mr. Holt. When the Finance Committee of the City Council were paying a tribute to Mr. Holt's memory, Alderman W. H. Watts stated that whilst, as Lord Mayor at the time, it fell to his lot to receive the munificent gift of the Wavertree Playground, he had no knowledge of the name of the donor. In fact, the name had never been divulged officially to this day. Most of the Committee eventually came to know that Mr. Holt was the benefactor, and although again there was no official intimation on record, it would be known to some present that Mr. Holt extensively assisted the city with the abolition of slums by his secret purchases of insanitary property. Mr. Holt's valuable work for education included gifts of at least, £50,000 to the Liverpool Institute."

This modest anonymity was characteristic of Mr. Holt in many other directions, and was in strict harmony with the simple dignity of his home life. He was the quietest and most unassuming of men, gentle, kindly, always reticent on personal matters and religious experiences, doing an untold amount of good by stealth, an unfailing helper of our denominational and philanthropic societies in Liverpool and far beyond its borders. At the time of his death he was chairman of the Council of Ullet Road Church, and for many years he held a similar position at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth. When he was well he never missed a service. He was present both morning and evening at Ullet Road Church on the Sunday before he died. Mr. Holt married a sister of Mr. Alfred Booth, whose death we had to record a fortnight ago. Mrs. Holt died sixteen years ago, and the ashes of her husband were placed in the same grave in the little Campo Santo of the Ancient Chapel last Tuesday. A short service was conducted by the Rev. C. Craddock, and everything, by his own instructions, was kept as simple as possible; but the large attendance of friends and public men showed how widespread was the feeling of affection and gratitude which he had inspired. He had the power and the willingness to give with lavish generosity, and yet those who knew him best will think chiefly of his simple habits, his dislike of praise, his pleasure in doing good by stealth, the thousand unremembered acts of kindness and of love.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

DISTRESSED FOREIGNERS IN GERMANY.

AN EMERGENCY COMMITTEE IN BERLIN.

UNDER the leadership of Dr. Siegmund-Schultze a Committee has been formed in Berlin to look after the interests of foreigners in Germany. The Committee is working on lines similar to that of the Emergency Committee for the Relief of Alien Enemies, established by the Religious Society of Friends in this country. It has already done good work in helping men in the concentration camp at Ruhleben and assisting girls who needed money before they could leave the country. The following appeal for sympathy and help is being sent out in Germany:—

[TRANSLATION.]

OFFICE FOR THE INFORMATION AND ASSISTANCE OF GERMANS ABROAD AND FOREIGNERS IN GERMANY.

THE WAR has caused great distress amongst countless Germans in foreign countries. In helping our countrymen we have to rely almost exclusively on the benevolence of the Societies in those countries which for years have been in co-operation with us, especially our English and American co-workers in the religious societies for international friendship. In England, where great difficulties in the way of the Germans might have been expected from the exceptional conditions prevailing, a Committee was formed directly the War broke out whose object was to provide support for needy Germans and Austrians in England, and already many Germans have told us verbally or in writing of the valuable help given to them.

In consequence of many requests and complaints we have felt that it was our duty to interest ourselves in those foreigners who were in difficulties in Germany. At a time when the German people, from the highest to the lowest, have joined together in the consciousness of a stern defence against their enemies, and are fighting out the great struggle for existence and freedom, it may well appear to many that it is superfluous to render to the relatives of the enemy's people any more than the most necessary services. But there is not only the thought of those Germans who are now abroad, there is not only the fact that foreigners who are in need in Germany are for the most part Germany's best friends, and are bound to us by a thousand ties—beyond all this, the task is laid upon us by our own desire to render friendly service in these times of hatred to those who now find it so difficult to obtain help. Even in war-time he is our neighbour who needs our help, and love of his enemies remains the sign of him who keeps faith with Our Lord.

We have accordingly decided to establish a Berlin Inquiry and Assistance Office, which works with the corresponding offices at home and abroad, especially with the above-mentioned Emergency Committee in London, the Berne and the Stuttgart Peace Bureaux, &c. We beg for help and gifts, which may be sent to the following address: Berliner Auskunfts und Hilfsstelle für Deutsche in Ausland und Ausländer in Deutschland. Communications to be addressed to Fräulein Dr. Elisabeth Rotten, Berlin No. 18, Friedenstrasse 601.

Committee:—Geh. Regierungsrat, Prof. D. W. Foerster; Bankbeamter, Erich Gramm; Fürstbischöflicher Delegat, Probst D. Kleineidam; Eduard de Neufville; Prof. Dr. Rade; Prediger Jul. Rohrbach; Dr. Elisabeth Rotten; Dr. Alice Salomon; Lic. F. Siegmund-Schultze; Direktor D. Spiecker; Stadtpfarrer Umfrid.

WOMEN'S LEAGUE.

APPEAL FOR BELGIAN CHILDREN IN HOLLAND.

THE following Appeal has been forwarded to us by the Secretary of the Women's League, so that it may be brought as soon as possible to the notice of the women of our Churches:—

DEAR MISS HERFORD,—I am trying to collect clothing for the 25,000 lost or orphaned Belgian children now in Holland. They are absolutely destitute, but are being taken care of by the Dutch, who are unable to clothe them.

Many will be sent to England when clothing is forthcoming. Their need is very urgent, and only warm clothes are wanted. Everything I receive will be sent to the Women's International Relief Committee, one of whose members goes to Holland every week, and reports to her Committee in London. If any of your friends could help me by collecting or making garments, and sending them to me, I should be most grateful.—Sincerely yours, (Mrs.) E. M. AVES.

15, Thurlow Road,
London, N.W.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

THE public concerts at Willaston School were this year given in aid of the Belgian Refugees. The net profit was £12 12s. 6d., of which £5 was sent to the Daily Telegraph Shilling Fund, and the remainder divided between local Nantwich funds. Musically, also, the concerts were, perhaps, the best the School has given. The choir sang well, especially in choruses from the 'St. Paul,' with orchestral accompaniment; and the orchestra of nearly thirty (including a Belgian refugee) did itself full justice, and gave a rendering of the 'William Tell' Overture in particular which even satisfied the conductor.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE Sunday School Association has an excellent supply of books and publications, which can be obtained at the Book Room, Essex Hall, and those who are engaged in religious work among the children are invited to make purchases there, especially at Christmas time. A hundred schools already buy their reward books and prizes at the Book Room, and if others would follow their example all through the year it would help on the work of the Association considerably. The Book Room does not exist solely for the Sale of literature published by the Sunday School Association, but it fulfils the purposes of a general book-shop as well. The usual discounts are given, and anything that is not in stock can be obtained at a few hours' notice. This branch of the Association's activities has already proved a useful source of revenue, and it only needs to be more efficiently supported and developed.

CHRISTMAS APPEAL.

THE REV. F. SUMMERS writes as follows on behalf of the Domestic Mission, Dingley Place:—"Will you please allow me to appeal to those kind friends who at this season of the year help me? I need help for the Poor's Purse; new or cast-off clothing, boots, toys, and books. In addition to certain festivities for the young at Christmas, I feel sure that the distress through which we are passing will not be forgotten by generous friends. Letters should be sent to me at 4, Durley Road, Stamford Hill, N., and parcels to The Domestic Mission, Dingley Place, St. Luke's, London, E.C."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bridgwater.—On Sunday, November 29, the 226th Anniversary of Christ Church was celebrated by special services. The subject of the evening sermon was 'Our Trafalgar Monument,' the memorial tablet, on the north wall of the Church, to Capt. George Lewis Browne, which records the fact that "During many years of active service Capt. Browne obtained the trust and highest commendation of Admiral Lord Nelson, under whose immediate command he distinguished himself at the battle of Trafalgar." The congregation was reminded of an appeal by the editor of The Daily News and Leader for the 'Christmas Pudding Fund' on behalf of the men in the army and navy, and a sum amounting to £3 8s. was contributed.

Chatham.—A meeting was held on Thursday, November 26, at the Unitarian Church, to welcome the Rev. Dr. Hitchcock back to his old pulpit. Letters regretting absence were received from Mrs. Humphry Wood and Miss Tribe (lifelong benefactors of the Church), and from the Mayor of Chatham, who welcomed Dr. Hitchcock back to the town, and recalled his services in Poor Law Reform. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie presided, and speeches were delivered by Dr. Tudor Jones, Councillor A. Hudson (Secretary of the congregation), Councillor C. Offen (Chairman of the Choral Society), and Mr. W. Attwood (Secretary of the Sunday School). In his reply Dr. Hitchcock said that his phases of faith had enriched his life. He had learnt freedom from Protestants and churchmanship from Catholics. After his last struggle in the Catholic Church he felt too broken to face another period of storm and stress, and he hesitated even when his old congregation promised him a unanimous invitation. But he could not resist when some one said that not one of his old boys had gone wrong.

Chester.—Matthew Henry's Chapel has suffered a severe loss in the death of Miss Katherine Montgomery, only daughter of the late Rev. J. K. Montgomery. Miss Montgomery was widely known and respected for her public work, in Chester especially, in connection with Temperance and the Women's Liberal Association. But the chapel with which she had been connected all her life had the first place in her affections, and she threw herself into all the work of the congregation and Sunday School with an earnestness of purpose and a lavish generosity in time and thought and strength which it will be impossible to replace. At the funeral on Saturday, November 28, there was a large attendance of sorrowing friends. The service was conducted by the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans, minister of the chapel, and the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool.

Lay Preachers' Union.—By arrangement with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association affiliated members of the National Unitarian Lay Preachers' Union and members of affiliated unions can obtain copies of any books actually published by the Association at half price. Applications must be endorsed by the Secretary, N.U.L.P.U., Miss Francis, 128, Broadwall, E.C. The books recommended for study by the Union are:—The Bible: 'The Bible: What It Is and Is Not,' by Joseph Wood; 'Light for Bible Readers,' by John Page Hopps; 'The Fourth Gospel,' by J. Warschauer. Unitarianism: 'Unitarianism,' by W. G. Tarrant; 'Heads of Unitarian History,' by A. Gordon. Philosophy: 'Through Nature to God,' by John Fiske (note—not published B. & F.U.A.). Church History: 'Church Councils,' by A. N. Blatchford. It is further recommended that Lay Preachers be invited to visit the Sunday Schools, address the scholars, and generally to get into touch with the school workers when taking duty at any of the Churches.

Liverpool.—Among the list of officers lost on H.M.S. Bulwark is the name of Midshipman Reginald B. Treeby. He was a very popular member of the Ullet Road Church Sunday School. He served as a cadet on the Mersey training ship, and joined the Navy last July.

London: Rhyl Street.—A united service in connection with Clarence Road and Rhyl Street Sunday Schools was held at Rhyl Street Hall on Sunday afternoon, November 22, conducted by the Revs. W. H. Rose and F. Hankinson. The address was given by Mr. Ion Pritchard.

Merthyr.—On Sunday, November 29, a large stained glass window given by Miss Cicely James in memory of her father, the late Dr. Job James, of this town, was unveiled at the Unitarian Chapel. Alderman F. T. James, a grandson of Dr. Job James, handed over the memorial, and in his speech referred to the fact that his grandfather was a naval surgeon on H.M.S. Pegasus in 1809, after which he practised at Merthyr. He was a man of strong individuality, and was one of the original trustees of the chapel. The window has been executed by the firm of Clayton & Bell of London. The central figure is of Christ, the Good Shepherd. The Rev. F. Blount Mott, of Cardiff, preached at the morning and evening service.

Nantwich.—It is proposed to place in the Old Presbyterian (Unitarian) Chapel, Hospital Street, a tablet in memory of the late Philip Barker, who was a devoted member of the Church and founder of Willaston School. Any one wishing to be associated with the project will kindly communicate with the minister, the Rev. J. Park Davies, 87, London Road, Nantwich, Cheshire.

Unitarian Temperance Association.—Mr. E. F. Cowlin, Hon. Secretary of the Association, writes: "Temperance Sunday has been well observed in our churches, and, in spite of the many calls made upon them owing to the war, several acted upon our suggestion and took 'retiring' collections in aid of the funds of this Association; and several new members have been gained. May I take this opportunity of asking those who have not already sent reports of services held to be good enough to do so as early as possible? We are issuing as a leaflet the article 'Temperance is a Moral Question,' which appeared in the November number of the Sunday School Monthly. Copies may be had on application to me at 19, Northwood Road, Forest Hill, London, S.E."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A LIFE OF ROBERT COLLYER.

The Rev. John Haynes Holmes, of the Church of the Messiah, New York, has undertaken, at the request of the Collyer family, to write the biography of Robert Collyer. "This biography, I am convinced," he says in a letter to The Christian Register, "will have the interest and value which should attach to so rare a personality and so great a teacher, just to the extent to which the doctor himself is permitted to tell his own story in his own inimitable words. The 'Life and Letters' must be mainly 'Letters,' or a 'Life in Letters,' and thus a kind of extended and glorified edition of the 'Some Memories.' To this end may I herewith ask any of your readers who may have letters from Dr. Collyer in their possession to send them to me? I am particularly eager to have early letters from his pen, covering his life in England and Pennsylvania. Such letters as are sent to me I shall have to retain for quite a period, as my time for this work is extremely limited; but I can promise that they will be carefully safeguarded and returned. Other material bearing upon Dr. Collyer's life, such as pictures, newspaper clippings, circulars, church notices, rare copies of sermons and lectures, &c., will be welcomed. The more this biography can be made the work of those who loved Dr. Collyer in his lifetime and now revere his memory the better."

CHANNING AND MILITARY DESPOTISM.

Writing in The Christian Register, Dr. Wendte gives a little personal reminiscence of his own of which he has been reminded by reading an extract from The Times of 100 years ago. The quotation runs as follows: "On this day [Oct. 18, 1814] is published, price one shilling, 'A Discourse, delivered in Boston, North America, at the Solemn Festival in commemoration of the Goodness of God in delivering the Christian World from Military Despotism, June 15, 1814. By William Ellery Channing, Minister of the Church in Federal Street, Boston. London: reprinted by J. & J. Hardy, 164, Shadwell High Street; and sold also by Messrs. Black, Parry & Co., Leadenhall Street.'" Dr. Wendte goes on to say that during the Spanish-American war he preached to his Los Angeles congregation a sermon in behalf of international peace, pleading for patience and fairness of judgment, which brought him a good deal of abuse in the local press. A few days later an aged man with white locks called at his house and introduced himself as the only son of Dr. Channing. He expressed his entire sympathy with the sentiments of the sermon that had been so vehemently criticized, and to emphasize this presented Dr. Wendte with the manuscript of the great sermon which his father, nearly a century ago, had preached in behalf of universal peace and the delivery of the Christian world from militarism. This MS. has since been presented to the American Unitarian Association, to be handed down to future generations as one of its treasures.

THE SILVER JUBILEE OF THE KHASI HILLS MISSION.

The Indian Messenger gives a sympathetic account of the work of Babu Nilmani Chakrabarti, whose name will be familiar to many who are interested in the Brahmo Samaj, among the backward people of the Khasi Hills. Mr. Chakrabarti has grown old in the service of a cause to which he has given his best energies for a period of twenty-five years; his health is seriously impaired, and the doctors recommend a change to a drier climate; but he will not give up his solitary post until some one can be found to take his place. He has, indeed, become the friend, guide, and philosopher of the people of the Khasi Hills, and when he is away from them, as he occasionally has to be on their business, letters are continually reaching him in which his advice and comfort are sought. And yet the difficulties which met him in his early days of exile among them were such as would have proved well-nigh insuperable to a man of less resolute mind and enterprising zeal. He had to pick up the Khasi language from conversation, since it had no characters or written symbols. The Welsh Calvinistic Mission had adopted the Roman characters in reducing it to writing, and published a translation of a portion of the New Testament and a few other pamphlets; the few books available at the time were defective. Babu Nilmani Chakrabarti, however, managed within a few weeks after his arrival to publish his first pamphlet in the language on the Brahmo system of worship. This was followed by a booklet on Brahmoism, and a number of tracts and pamphlets succeeded this. The Khasi language is now recognized as one of the vernacular languages in the Calcutta University.

UNITARIANS IN HUNGARY.

Letters containing warm expressions of sympathy from American Unitarians to their co-religionists in Hungary have been returned as "undeliverable," and an appeal has now been made to the Government at Washington for help in forwarding correspondence and money for the payment of missionaries in the Balkans, Hungary, and Germany. Dr. Wendte, writing in The Christian Register, gives the information that the Unitarian College at Kolozsvár has been converted into a hospital for the wounded. The danger which menaces the group of liberal religious thinkers should the Germans and Austrians be defeated, lies in the fact that Roumania would then in all probability annex Transylvania, the most easterly province of Hungary, and it is to the Magyars, who are the ruling race there, that the Unitarians belong. Although Roumania is Greek-Catholic in religion, it would doubtless extend entire freedom of worship to the Hungarians, who are mostly Roman Catholics; but the annexation could not be accomplished without a terrible struggle, both moral and physical, and the liberal Christian faith, which has maintained itself against hostile influences for nearly four hundred years, might have to undergo the severest trial in its history.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN his message to Congress on Tuesday, President Wilson maintained his attitude of cautious neutrality upon all matters relating to the War. The desire not to offend anybody may be pushed to such an extreme as almost to destroy the noble detachment of mind of the just judge. Evidently President Wilson has a pleasant vision of himself acting the part of the international peace-maker at the opportune moment:—

We are, he says, the champions of peace and concord, and should be very jealous of this distinction, just now particularly, because it is our dearest hope that this character and reputation will presently, in God's providence, bring an opportunity such as has seldom been vouchsafed to any nation—an opportunity to counsel and obtain peace in the world with reconciliation and healing and the settlement of many matters that have cooled and interrupted the friendship of nations.

This is a worthy ambition, though there are few signs that it is ever likely to be fulfilled. On the other hand there is real danger that the United States may lose some of her moral prestige with other countries by her attitude of academic aloofness in matters like the devastation of Belgium, where the strong moral protest of the neutral country is greatly needed.

WE are not surprised that the daily press has grumbled pretty loudly against the censorship. It is always unpleasant to be deprived of exciting news, and the newspaper man is our chartered libertine of criticism. It is the habit of his mind to take for granted that he knows what is good for the country far better than military experts or stupid heads of departments. We are as jealous as any one can possibly be of the freedom of the press and dislike anything in the way of censorship most heartily, but we do not regard the Censor, who is performing unfamiliar duties under circumstances of great difficulty, as the proper butt for public scorn and ridicule. On this matter Sir John Simon spoke with his customary directness and good sense at Bolton on Tuesday:—

I am not at all sorry, he said, that the British people do not like the Press Censorship. I hope they never will. It is a good and healthy sign that they should dislike it. We have only adopted it for strategic and military reasons. Let us remember that those who are discharging the Press Censorship have undertaken a most unpleasant duty. There they are in the trenches, day and night, without ever getting any rest, working under the greatest pressure, and they are being shot at by friend and foe from every point of the compass. They cannot explain—it would not be in the public interest that they should explain—what is the precise reason why they apply this rule or that, and I think they are entitled to appeal to the British people and the British press to endure this inconvenience as we are enduring many greater inconveniences, and to determine that this is only one of the small sacrifices we have to make in carrying this war through to a successful conclusion.

BUT the Press is better occupied in exposing the supposed follies of the Censor than in playing the nasty game of German-baiting. Unfortunately, a noisy section is dragging its patriotism through the gutter in this way. Everybody with a German name is to be regarded as an enemy in disguise, and treated with rudeness and contempt. Even citizens of renown, who have had the good fortune to enjoy the friendship of German universities and German public men in the past, are to be denounced as unworthy of public trust. The Globe has started a campaign against

Lord Haldane on these grounds. Here is a specimen of the silly stuff with which it regales its readers:—

Now, on public grounds alone we are bound to record the fact that a considerable body of opinion in this country is profoundly disturbed by the reports that Lord Haldane is assisting Sir Edward Grey at the Foreign Office. What is Lord Haldane doing there? His whole judgment and frame of mind on any question affecting Germany is to be distrusted. He has been closely identified with Germany in thought and friendship for many years. Indeed, he has confessed that Germany is his spiritual home. He has an immense enthusiasm for the Kaiser, who has publicly referred to him as "my friend Lord Haldane," and in Germany itself they regard the Lord Chancellor's omission to follow Mr. Burns and Lord Morley into retirement as an act of treachery.

Men who write like this are playing the game of the enemy as effectually as an army of spies.

THINGS in Belgium seem to be going steadily from bad to worse, and the whole country is now in the grip of starvation. The difficulties of sending adequate food supplies and getting it properly distributed are enormous, and the most practical thing to do seems to be to remove a much larger number of refugees to England, and at the same time to relieve Holland of part of her burden, which is greater than she can bear. This is the view of Sir Gilbert Parker, who has just returned from a visit to Holland, where he made careful inquiry into the condition of the Belgian refugees on behalf of the American Commission for the Relief of Belgium.

Around Belgium, he writes in The Times, is a ring of steel. Into that vast graveyard and camp of the desolate only the United States enters with adequate and responsible organization, upon the mission of humanity; but the fugitives from Belgium, numbered by the million, may be helped by all the world; and if there is a people from whom they have a right to ask help, shelter, work, and temporary or permanent homes, it is ourselves. The Belgian people are the wards of the world. In all the circumstances, Belgian refugees should be the especial care of this great island country and race, whose interests were sheltered at a critical time through the heroic stand made by King Albert and his army against the ruthless invasion of Belgium by German hosts. Will not the British Government pay something of our debt, and prove the true humanity of our people by organizing on an adequate scale the transportation of Belgian refugees to this country? And will not every man and woman here treat them when they come as though they were our own?

* * *

MAY we interpose a word here to strengthen and maintain the desire to offer the hospitality of our homes to Belgian refugees now that the first wave of emotional sympathy has a little spent its force. People are beginning to discover that philanthropy of this kind is not all plain-sailing. The stranger under their roof may be an interruption to the normal course of family life, and there are difficulties of temper and differences of habit for which allowance has to be made. The truth is that some of us are growing a little weary in well-doing, and are inclined to think that it is about time for somebody else to shoulder the burden. It is not a very brave or worthy kind of feeling, but it is one with which we have to reckon. Let us, at least, remind ourselves that some personal inconvenience is a very small thing compared with what others are bearing with uncomplaining endurance—our soldiers in the trenches, our sailors on the high seas—for the common cause. Let us also remember to be very patient and to make every allowance for people who have been violently uprooted from their homes and find themselves anxious and distraught, without any useful and interesting work to do, in a strange land. If they seem at times a little exacting, or do not always express their gratitude in very eloquent terms, should not we do the same in similar circumstances and put it down to our nerves?

* * *

THAT there is real gratitude we do not doubt for a moment. It becomes articulate in the words of their great men. Many a humble peasant feels in his heart what M. Maeterlinck has expressed in the following letter. The letter was written to his sister, who is at present a guest in Manchester, to explain his reasons for declining an invitation to lecture at the Rylands Library. We quote it in the translation which appeared in The Manchester Guardian on Thursday:—

"I am very glad to know you are so well entertained by our friends the English. They are really a great people, trustworthy, chivalrous, and generous, the ideal example of what some day after this war all European civilization will become.

"I regret very keenly that I cannot say yes to the friendly invitation of the Manchester Committee. I am not a speaker. I have no voice, and after two minutes speaking in public I become completely dumb; a pitiful spectacle which even the kindest of audiences ought to be spared. That is why I never do lecture and never shall. Every one must work according to his powers, and in his own way. I do what I can for our unhappy refugees by devoting to them the proceeds of the articles which I write on the war. Every man to his trade. Mine is to write, not to speak in public. But I am not less disappointed, for all that, that my incapacity as a speaker robs me of the joy of coming to express personally and face to face to our dear friends of great England all my admiration and my gratitude. I rely on you to make my excuses to them."

* * *

ONE of the best things which has been written on the Spirit of France since the outbreak of the War is an article by M. Emile Boutroux, which appeared in The Daily News and Leader on Monday. It shows that the country is still reasonable and little inclined to courses of re-action in spite of the romantic dreams of writers with clerical and royalist sympathies. One guarantee of national steadiness is to be found in the fact that the majority of the successful generals in the field are sensible republicans. M. Boutroux points out that one effect of the German menace has been to produce moral unity in the rising generation, and to bring many of the finest qualities of French character to the surface. "Our young soldiers' letters [he says] tell of a sympathetic understanding, a spirit of solidarity, a sense of common duty, which effaces all differences of opinion. The questions which interested us so much but a few weeks ago are now no more than abstractions, or, at all events, one of secondary importance, incapable of producing dissension in a healthy nation."

* * *

M. BOUTROUX concludes with a noble tribute to the spirit of French patriotism, which does not consist in the hatred of other nations and is little likely to yield to the coarser appeals for revenge.

"Assuredly, it would be only too natural, [he writes] to return cruelty for cruelty, destruction for destruction. When all reflective will is absent, one's instinct inclines to vengeance and reprisals. The German people, itself, is essentially vindictive. How, confronted with such a foe, can one help saying: an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth? It is not probable, however, that France will act in accordance with this instinctive reply. Our youth, more particularly, even now, in the midst of their awful trials, think that in order to defend France we ought to feel inspired with the spirit of France. Now, the patriotism of Joan of Arc, of Turenne, and of the armies of the Revolution, was not based on hatred. It was essentially love for France, the desire to see her free and great, beautiful and glorious. France, from the times spoken of in the chansons de gestes on to the present time, has ever meant the union of a generous heart and a clear reason. Nor has the importance attributed to delicate and lofty feelings been a source of weakness to our country. Bismarck affirmed that the amiability of the French was more to be dreaded than all their cannons."

* * *

It has occurred to the Pope and to many people of smaller official importance that Christmas Day might be observed by the belligerent armies as a "Truce of God." It would be a satisfaction to the sentiment of Western Christendom if this could be done. But there are two reasons against it, which must be regarded as insuperable. The first of them is military. The cessation of hostilities might occur at a critical moment in the campaign, and so alter the balance of forces as to postpone the final peace instead of bringing it nearer. The second reason has to do with the fact that Russia still observes the old calendar, and celebrates her Christmas thirteen days later than ours. Moreover, in Mohammedan countries December 25 is not a religious festival, and there is no reason why Turkey should refuse to fight on that day, unless it suited her military convenience. We fear that the proposal must be set aside as entirely unpractical.

* * *

In quieter times the death of Prof. Campbell Fraser in his 96th year would have called forth many tributes of admiration and respect. If he did not stand in the first rank as a thinker, he may justly be described as a great teacher, for he laid the impress of his mind upon the teaching of philosophy in the Scottish Universities, at Oxford and Cambridge, and in many distant parts of the world. His Gifford Lectures on 'The Philosophy of Theism' were an important contribution to the constructive theological thought of our time, but he will be remembered chiefly outside the circle of his pupils and friends as the editor and interpreter of Berkeley. His great edition of Berkeley's Works is a monument of critical insight and patient research.

THE GOSPEL OF FORGIVENESS.

CHRISTIANITY is a Gospel of Love, and because it is that it is also a Gospel of Forgiveness. When men want to express its meaning in a few words they take some short sentence from the New Testament about the love of God or our duty to forgive our enemies, and utter it as a challenge to our lack of faith or sincerity. We cannot be too grateful to the simple and earnest souls, who out of the depth and richness of their own experience recall us to the hard ways of Christian loyalty. We have all known such people and stood abashed in their presence. But there are others with the same words upon their lips who simply provoke us to arguments and explanations, because they skim lightly over the deepest mysteries of life and treat the spiritual confidence, which we can only achieve through the travail of our souls, as easy and obvious. At the present time many fragments of Christian teaching are being bandied about in this way. People write to the newspapers to remind their degenerate friends that as Christians they ought to forgive their enemies, or they pride themselves on turning away from the horror of pitiless crimes, because it shows a forgiving disposition. Do they really understand what Christian forgiveness means and the terrible cost at which the power to forgive must be won?

There are many ideas about forgiveness in the popular mind which are weak and sentimental, and we had better get rid of them at once. It has little to do with complacent amiability, or the belief that we can easily forget, or the refusal to look facts full in the face because they are ugly and shameful. It does not mean incapacity for anger and stern condemnation, or a confession of partnership in guilt which makes friendship easy, whatever happens, because we are all scoundrels together. Forgiveness is the renewal of a spiritual relationship, which has been broken by the treachery of heart or the infamous conduct which destroys mutual trust and makes the joyous confidence of friendship impossible. Now in every relationship there are two terms, and forgiveness may fail in its perfect work from the absence of a forgiving temper on one side or a lack of hearty repentance on the other. God himself cannot forgive us until we are ashamed of our sin, and turning to Him in penitence ask that we may be cleansed from our iniquity. But God, the Fountain of all goodness, is always ready to forgive. With Him there is no vindictiveness, no smouldering fire of hate or ill-will towards the children of men, though He is swift and stern in his judgments, and has no balm of comfort or message of peace for us while we continue in our sins. And we are to be ready to forgive, because we are the children of God, partakers of the divine nature. That is the measure of our obligation and of its difficulty. We must test our capacity for forgiving first of all in cases where we ourselves have suffered personal injuries and are tempted to be resentful. Let us think of the coldness that creeps over a violated friendship, or the bitterness of our lingering memories of ancient wrong, or the difficulty of generous kindness in circumstances where we know we ought to be angry. It is only when we have triumphed in these strictly personal ways that we earn the right to speak, without suspicion of insincerity, of heartfelt forgiveness for those who are guilty of public crimes against the helpless and the weak. But it is in reality far harder, it requires a much closer walk with God, to cherish the forgiving temper here than in the case of personal injuries, for we cannot build any golden bridge of reconciliation by taking some share of the blame upon ourselves.

While we try in this way to escape from the snares of malice and ill-will, and fight resolutely against the temptation to indulge the base satisfactions of revenge, we must not forget that forgiveness means that there is something to be forgiven, some dark and evil thing which ought to fill the heart of man with shame, something which deserves punishment. The whole doctrine of Christian forgiveness hinges upon the real difference between right and wrong. It is a spurious kind of Christianity which goes about the world treating the wicked man as the victim of delusions, and asking us only to pity where we ought to condemn. The way of the transgressor is hard, and hardest of all in this, that he cannot be forgiven until he repents. We may heap coals of fire on his head. We ought to show him kindness in time of need. "If thine enemy hunger feed him, if he thirst give him to drink." But one thing we must never do. We have no right to treat his transgression as an easy and venial thing, which ceases to exist when it has been buried decently out of sight, or to imagine that we can clasp hands in happy confidence and trust across barriers of unrepented sin. This is not the confession of superior virtue. It is the law which binds our own experience. We have discovered its inflexible justice in our own hearts.

The line of thought which we have followed in this article has an obvious application to many of the problems of forgiveness and reconciliation with which we are confronted at the present time. We cannot be too grateful for every warning which is raised against a policy of vindictiveness, or be too earnest in our efforts to impress upon the people of France and Belgium, whose fields and cities have been laid waste, that there must be no policy of burning for burning and outrage for outrage. When, however, we hear talk about forgiving our enemies, as though it were one of the easiest things possible for respectable men and women to do, and at the same time we are invited to adopt a policy of silence about the hideous things which our enemies have done, we confess that there is something in us which refuses to respond. It is not, we venture to think, helpless rage against violence, or an unholy love of atrocities, or perverted military ardour, from all of which we pray humbly that we may be delivered. It is rather a deep conviction of the tremendous difficulty of forgiveness, and of its sheer impossibility until the lust of conquest and the policy of outrage have been replaced by the humble and the contrite heart.

A man who has convinced himself that the devastation of Belgium and the torture of its people by exile or slow starvation are things which always happen in war, and need not be remembered when peace has been signed, may, perhaps, succeed in the policy of turning a blind eye to facts. But for us this is impossible. The thing which has to be forgiven is one of the most treacherous crimes of history, which will be remembered with loathing from generation to generation. We cannot without falsehood speak one word to extenuate it or to relieve the horror of its menace to everything that is holy and good in the world. Can we forgive it? The very thought of such an act of redemption seems almost too great for our weak human hearts to hold. It is hard, even for God, to forgive when His children rise up against Him, and triumph in their defiance of his laws. Slowly, now by the terror of his judgments, now by the pleading of his mercy, He wins them back and unites them to Himself by the mystery of reconciling Love, which is the essence of his Godhead. For ourselves, we can only pray that some gleams of this love may shine in the darkness of our hearts, that here and there we may piece together the ravelled threads of life, and make a few aching and repentant hearts glad with the Gospel of Forgiveness.

Good Thoughts for Ebil Times.

UNIVERSAL CHARITY.

THE next branch of the divine life is an universal charity and love: The excellency of this grace will be easily acknowledged; for what can be more noble and generous than a heart enlarged to embrace the whole world, whose wishes and designs are levelled at the good and welfare of the universe, which considereth every man's interest as its own? He who loveth his neighbour as himself can never entertain any base or injurious thought, or be wanting in expressions of bounty: he had rather suffer a thousand wrongs, than be guilty of one; and never accounts himself happy, but when some one or other hath been benefited by him; the malice or ingratitude of men is not able to resist his love; he overlooks their injuries, and pities their folly, and overcomes their evil with good, and never designs any other revenge against his most bitter and malicious enemies, than to put all the obligations he can upon them, whether they will or not: Is it any wonder that such a person be revered and admired, and accounted the Darling of Mankind? This inward goodness and benignity of spirit reflects a certain sweetness and serenity upon the very countenance, and makes it amiable and lovely: it inspireth the soul with a noble resolution and courage, and makes it capable of enterprising and effecting the highest things. Those heroic actions which we are wont to read with admiration, have for the most part been the effects of the love of one's country, or of particular friendships; and certainly a more extensive and universal affection, must be much more powerful and efficacious.

From The Life of God in the Soul of Man. By Henry Scougal.

THEY drift away—Ah, God! they drift for ever!

I watch the stream sweep onward to the sea

Like some old battered buoy upon a roaring river,

Round whom the tide-waifs hang—then drift to sea.

I watch them drift—the old familiar faces

Who fished and rode with me by stream and wold,

Till ghosts, not men, fill old beloved places,

And, ah, the land is rank with church-yard mould.

I watch them drift—the youthful aspirations,

Shores, landmarks, beacons, drift alike!...

Yet overhead the boundless arch of heaven

Still fades to night, still blazes into day....

Ah God! my God! Thou wilt not drift away.

KINGSLEY.

HERE we offer and present unto thee,

O Lord, ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy, and lively sacrifice unto thee. And although we be unworthy, through our manifold sins, to offer unto thee any sacrifice, yet we beseech thee to accept this our bounden duty and service. Amen.

O LORD, my God, Patience is very necessary for me, for I perceive that many things in this life do fall out as we would not. Give me strength to resist, patience to endure, and constancy to persevere. Amen.

BOUGHT WITH A PRICE.

From a Sermon preached at Manchester College, Oxford.

By J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, D.D.

THE call to arms has been sounded in this country, and it has been answered with a splendid self-devotion. But what of those of us who remain at home? What new light is thrown for us on duty, what fresh energy is quickened in our daily life, by the knowledge of all these perils and sufferings so bravely met that we may dwell secure? I do not speak now of the measures undertaken by the State for the maintenance of the wives and families of those who fight by land or sea, or the relief of those whom the disturbances of trade throw out of work; still less of those great financial risks which the Government has thought it right, with the consent of all parties, to take upon itself, assured that the people which fights for a "scrap of paper" will honour the bills of trade as well as those of war. With our local obligations as citizens I am not now concerned. They must to some extent vary from place to place under different conditions of industry and population. But we are most of us conscious that in some way or other new demands are laid upon us. We rise in the morning with something more than an appetite for a new sensation out of the columns of the newspaper upon the breakfast table. As the day goes through, all kinds of pictures fill our minds of the heroism and the agony of the far-spread battlefields. We lie down at night half reproachfully for our own comfort while our soldiers must snatch a broken rest in the trenches, and wake to the sound of renewed cannonade. What means for us this clash of armies all along the mighty line? It is for our sakes that they are fighting. They purchase our safety by their steadfastness. They face the hail of shot and shell that we may go about our daily work unharmed, may sit at punctual meals, may sometimes share in innocent pastimes. From day to day our security is won by pain and death. From day to day the cost mounts up with frightful speed. All the huge sum of operations on which the welfare of this nation rests, the complex network of the industries which are still active or only partially disabled, the manifold energies that must combine to provide our homes with but one day's food, the ships that must sail the seas bringing the produce of every continent upon the globe—all this depends from hour to hour, week to week, and month to month, on the fidelity of the troops that face the hostile batteries, and the sailors who are ready at a moment's notice to go down beneath the wave. We are bought with a price, and when we realize its magnitude, it must give higher values to that which is so dearly purchased, and throw over all our possessions the solemn sense that they are held on the tenure of countless human lives.

In the first place we are made conscious that we are members of a community in a manner that we have often failed to appreciate. These sacrifices are not made for us as individuals only. The husband and father thinks upon the march of wife and child, of hearth and home. But behind those whose portraits he bears, perhaps, upon his breast, whose image is ever present to his mind, rises the dim, obscure multitude from the palace to the cottage, from the crown to the labourer, whose united endeavours have built up the greatness of England. In this larger life we have our share. Whether or no we have kindred and friends in the struggle, we know that each man fights not for himself alone, or even for his nearest and dearest, but for the Whole. This vision of the interdependence of all parts, which ought never long to be absent from our thoughts in days of peace, so potent is it to raise us above the sordidness of meaner interests and petty gains, is quickened into keener intensity of consciousness by war. We think and feel no longer singly. We are not limited to the outlook of our personal occupations, our class, profession, sect. Even the bitterness of party strife is hushed in the presence of transcendent deeds of self-forgetting sacrifice. We cease to urge our own claims, and ask only to be shown the way of help, that we, too, may do something for the general good. Many are stirred by this feeling now. The enthusiasm of generosity is fresh and strong. We have discovered larger meanings in our national existence. We count for something higher and worthier than we had dreamed. We are like spirits moving about in worlds hitherto unrealized. It is a kind of self-assertion which is not ignoble, but it has its risks. Will it make us more loyal to simple duty, more faithful in daily tasks, more strenuous in the dull and plodding ways of that drudgery which enters more or less into every lot, bounded and compassed by the common round? When we think of the wounded lying in hospital, or worse still, alone, untended, bleeding, on the field for hours, it may be for nights and days, shall we be more ready to endure our aches and weaknesses more patiently? Or, as we read of the courage with which men advance to certain death to silence a battery or blow up a bridge, shall we look forward more fearlessly to our closing hours or face with more cheerful calm the attacks of pain? We are in a mood of exaltation now. The test of our sincerity has yet to come. How long can we maintain our endurance? When murmurs rise, as rise they will, at the burdens which must fall upon us and the charges we shall have to meet, when self-denials are imposed on every home, and the tax-gatherer enters with enlarging claims, shall we then think honour and liberty still worth their price? Will the memories of those who have given their all—limb, life, themselves—be as inspiring? Will their example still kindle the glow of pride that they once walked among us? Shall we respond as readily as they responded in the hour of need? Each one of us must answer for himself.

And this sense of participation in a larger life will help to explain to us the attitude of many of our opponents, for whom we have so long felt respect and admiration. We in this College know well what is our debt to German scholarship. Where a Pfeiderer, a Wendt, a Krüger, an Eucken, have lectured, we cannot forget all that students of theology and philosophy owe to generations of German teaching and research. But with them, as with us, in the hour of national danger every other interest drops away. All classes share the same duty, are moved by one impulse, participate from east to west and south to north in a common life. The German universities, like our own, send their best youth to the War. From almost every home throughout the Empire men have banded themselves loyally to defend the Fatherland. They know not, it would seem often, why or where or whom they fight; but in the consciousness of the mighty movement of the whole they take their places faithfully, and lay down their lives freely for the country that they love. That ought to make it possible for us to fight without hatred. Whatever may be our judgment of the military system which has made this War possible, however we may condemn the teaching which for a quarter of a century has advocated the extension of German civilization by force of arms till the claim is raised that Germany shall impose her ideals at the point of the sword upon all Europe, and war for world-power is presented as a solemn obligation—these challenges must not be supposed to represent the spirit either of all the educated or of the mass of the people. The greatest living German historian, Oncken of Heidelberg, has recently (before the War) deplored the mischievous influence of Treitschke and his school; and I have heard a German graduate declare that, during all the years of his university career, he never heard a word of hostility against this country. By intermarriage, by travel, by community of pursuit, by relations of commerce, by personal friendship, by the love of music, by the advance of science, ten thousand interests have been built up with men and women whom we know to be incapable of the deeds of horror with which, unhappily, the fair fame of the whole nation is now soiled. If we fight such as these, as fight we must, we ought to do so without rancour. They are the unwilling accomplices of atrocities which issue, not from the resolve of a nation, but from the brutal passion of a clique. The terrors of Louvain and Termonde reflect the temper of a dominant caste, not that of myriad homes of simplicity and gentleness and peace.

It is the strange paradox of this conflict that those who are now so freely laying down their lives for their friends are bound, first, to take as many of the enemy's lives as possible. For war upsets all our ordinary moral values. Slaughter is its lawful end; to kill becomes a duty, not a crime. There are those among us who would embody this principle as a permanent element in our civilization. It is not the German, but the Englishman who tells us that the litanies of peace which have gone up from this country during the present century argue the coward and the slave at heart. There is a rising school on both sides of the North Sea which affirms the religion of valour to be nobler than that of brotherhood, and extols war as the great arbitrament of God. What men are these who exalt the worship of Odin above the God of Jesus! who prefer Napoleon to Christ, and tell us that Corsica has conquered Galilee! They forget that they, too, have been "bought with a price." Their daily food has been brought them by those who have conquered the perils of the deep, who have been cheerful in the storm and self-forgetting in the wreck. That they may travel fast and far whole regiments of railway servants must be exposed to accident, to mutilation, even to death. That they may write in comfortable libraries more regiments must daily descend into the pit, and pass long hours upon their backs in momentary risks of being crushed by falling rock or suffocated by fire-damp. I will not for a moment belittle the splendid heroism of the battlefield, in the excitement of strife, in the presence of numbers, in the defence of a common cause, in the vast exaltation which uplifts multitudes in the presence of danger. But I say deliberately that the sailor, the lifeboatman, the engine-driver, the shunter, the miner who works in darkness and solitude—on whose exertions day by day and week by week, all round the globe, the safety and welfare and comfort of our people depend—pay toll of life and limb from year to year as much as an army in battles such as were fought in the last great European war. These men also lay down their lives for their friends. There are many kinds of warfare beside that which begins with blare of trumpets and beat of drums. The most moving sight I ever saw was in the great epileptic colony at Bielefeld, in Westphalia. Spread over two valleys and the hill which divided them were homes that would accommodate between two and three thousand patients. Some could be taught, with infinite labour, simple farm-work or useful trades. Some lay—mere semblances of humanity—unable to feed themselves, with a strange horror of vacancy and animal brutality upon their faces. From hour to hour more than two hundred nurses—men from the universities, women of gentle birth—tended and guided them; they could never be left. In the cemetery I learned at what cost. A special alley told the moving tale. Many laid down their lives between the ages of 25 and 32. Those who could stand the strain and pass that limit might fight on another score of years, and then, at 52 or 53, their labours ended. Here was a service as perilous as that of the field, willingly rendered for the love of God and man, needing a valour as splendid in its long endurance as any march up to the enemy's guns. Thank God, capacity for sacrifice is no possession of the soldier only. From Scott and Oates and their brave companions, meeting death upon the Antarctic heights, to the fishermen in the trawlers on the North Sea amid winter storms, one impulse of courage is ever taking risks and facing odds, and I will not admit that it is only among decaying peoples that Christianity is found incompatible with the passion of militarism. For it is not the exaltation of self-sacrifice, but that of self-assertion which animates these ideals, which proclaims war a duty for a young and manly nation, which elevates the struggle for power above the restraints of law, devastates villages, sacks towns, shoots non-combatants, and tramples recklessly on the aged and the child. There is a danger lest the excitement of combat and anger at cruelty may betray this people in its resolve to overthrow oppression into like passion for supremacy. We are engaged in a struggle the duration and magnitude of which we cannot foresee. On either side defeat must involve infinite bitterness and tragedy of loss. It may be that the issue of this War may give to the ideas which have begotten it a temporary justification. We trust that, on the other hand, they may be forever condemned. All the more needful, then, is it that we should do what in us lies to overcome the enmities which this conflict breeds, and out of the havoc, the confusion, the ruin of a million homes at last bring the peoples now hostile into enduring peace.

CHRISTMAS AND INTERNED ALIENS.

SIR,—I understand that there are now about 30,000 "aliens" and prisoners of war interned in the camps in this country, and that the Emergency Committee, which has its headquarters at 169, St. Stephen's House, Westminster Bridge, S.W., is hoping to send a small Christmas parcel to every one of these men. May I appeal to your readers to assist as generously as possible this Committee, originally convened and largely supported by the Religious Society of Friends, in the noble work they are doing? It seems to me that among the many sufferers from the war, these men having made their homes in England, and having doubtless come to love her as a second mother, are much deserving of sympathy. Among them, I am told, are some who have been brought to this country as children, and are English in everything except the technical sense of that term. Many had built up large business connections or occupied responsible positions to the entire satisfaction of their employers. The majority probably intended to apply for naturalisation sooner or later, but had deferred doing so, as we all in the course of a strenuous life defer so many things not of immediate necessity. Any one acquainted with German families in England will have been struck by their ready adaptability to English life and institutions. Their children generally are "more English than the English," and now they naturally feel intensely mortified at seeing themselves suddenly classed as "alien enemies."

But apart from the above, who no doubt have friends that will not forget them at this season, there are the German and Austrian soldiers, who have never troubled about politics, and have never had any quarrel with humanity at large. Many of them will be dreaming of the Christmas tree in the little German home, and in their ears will ring the old, old melody, "Stille Nacht, heilige Nacht." Would you not have them remember this their first Christmas (and probably their last) spent on British soil as one made beautiful by the divine bond of Christian love which, when all is said and done, will prove to be the only sure guarantee of an abiding "peace on earth"?—Yours, &c.

THE CHURCHES AND THE SICK AND WOUNDED.

SIR,—I beg to ask that you will help the Joint Committee of the British Red Cross Society and the Order of St. John by giving in your columns the widest possible publicity to the following appeal, signed with such splendid and striking unanimity by the heads of the religious bodies in this country:—

We venture to recommend that on Sunday, January 3, the day appointed for Humble Prayer and Intercession in connection with the War, the money collected at our services should, wherever possible, be devoted to the Fund for the Care of the Sick and Wounded, administered by the Joint Committee representing the Order of St. John of Jerusalem and the British Red Cross Society.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT. London: Macmillan & Co. 2 vols. 15s. net.

COLLECTED editions satisfy the demand for completeness, but they lack some of the intimacy of appeal of the slender volumes in which much of the best poetry is first given to the world. Some of Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's work seems to become suddenly docile and tame, more literary and less vital when it is thus edited for the library. Here, for instance, are the sonnets of 'In Vinculis,' published in 1889, but without the defiant dedication "To the Priests and Peasantry of Ireland, who for three hundred years have preserved the tradition of a righteous war for Faith and Freedom," and without the striking portrait of the author in the garb of a convict. To compensate us for these losses Mr. Blunt's splendid translations from early Arabian poetry are now made available for a public that has never set eyes upon the rare original edition of the Seven Golden Odes. But here again we miss the general introduction and the historical notes, which are something more than the adornments of scholarship, for they place the reader at the right point of view to feel the power of an unfamiliar literature. A good deal of verse appears in these two volumes for the first time: some of it written in recent years shows that in meditative age Mr. Blunt's hand has lost none of its cunning. We may quote the concluding lines of a dedicatory ode in memory of George Wyndham:—

And who shall wonder if to-day we weep
Our prince of happiness,
Our warrior dead?
If we, who saw
These wonders beyond law,
And his proud soul's essay
To live the great life of the Fellowship
In our late day,
Should mourn him fled,
Yet, none the less,
Give praise
To God, with chastened but undoubting lip,
For this exemplar of His works and ways?
Since that we know that in his scheme of bliss
No permanent anguish is,
But beauty only, and high ruth and truth,
And that Life's law is this:
Pleasure is duty, duty pleasure
In equal measure;
And Time's happiness
God's all sufficient reason with the wise,
As with this man
Who sleeps in Paradise.

BUDDHA AND HIS SAYINGS. By Pandit Shyama Shankar, of Rajputana. London: Francis Griffiths. 3s. net.

In this little book an attempt is made to state briefly, from the Indian point of view, what Buddhism stands for, and to present to English readers a selection of the sayings of its founder which many students will be glad to have in an easily accessible form. The difficult philosophy of the annihilation of the self is dealt with in a helpful manner, though we are still left considerably in the dark as to what is really meant by the doctrine of Nirvana, as Buddha expounded it, since his great object seemed to be to discourage all needless speculations as to the ultimate union of the soul with Brahma. It is, however, the gentle, modest, self-sacrificing spirit, the infinite compassion and wisdom of this great religious reformer that win our heart when abstruse metaphysical abstractions have no charm for us, and his influence over the lives of men for so many centuries is undoubtedly due to his lovable personality and humane actions more than to his discourses on matters that bewilder even the sage. But we utterly mistake his message, as Rabindranath Tagore pointed out to one of his London audiences, if we suppose that he taught the annihilation of the inner self—the spirit which, veiled by flesh, is ever conscious of a yearning towards the source of its life in a world beyond human experience. It is only the false self that has to be destroyed, that Maya of the senses which involves us in strife and misery and illusion; and active love is the first lesson to be learnt. “Go ye now,” says Buddha to his disciples, “and roam over the country for the welfare of the many, for the good, for the gain, and for the benefit of men.” And again, “Lo, the world is mine—the world I cast away only to save.” What becomes of the soul, he says in effect, is really no immediate concern of ours, even if we could understand so great a mystery: it is enough for us to know that we have a long fight to wage with the enemies that menace our true life, and that evil must be conquered by good. “Never in this world is hatred overpowered by hatred. Hatred ceases by love alone.”

READERS in search of a Christmas present which combines the two essential features of cheapness and beauty may be recommended to consider the new edition of ‘Cranford,’ equipped with an introduction by Mr. E. V. Lucas, personal and topographical notes by the Rev. G. A. Payne, and a number of drawings of old Knutsford by Mr. Edmund New (London: Methuen & Co., 3s. 6d. net). We can imagine nothing more refreshing in these days of stress and alarm than an occasional hour spent in the quaint domestic interiors of ‘Cranford.’ Our only complaint against an excellent edition is that Mr. New has not given us a glimpse of the Brook Street Chapel, which is so closely associated with the memory of Mrs. Gaskell, and still retains, in spite of the renovator, so much of its old-world character.

A CHRISTMAS sermon, by Dr. Stopford Brooke, will be published as a pamphlet-supplement to The Christmas Commonwealth on December 16.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE LITTLE BIRDS’ SONG.

Old song and new song the little birds sing,
“Love is our Helper, and Love is our King.”

Love made the mother-bird build the warm nest,
All for her babies, and Love teaches best.

Love made her patient to sit there and wait
All the long days for them, early and late.

Love sent his wonderful gift for her care,
When the shells broke, and the wee birds were there.

Love made her toil for them all the day long,
Till every nestling was feathered and strong.

Love told her, one day, to drive from the nest
Each frightened baby, for wise Love knew best.

Love saw the tiny thing flutter and cry,
Held him up safely, and taught him to fly.

Love helps him now to find all his own food,
Leave what is hurtful, and take what is good.

Love, when the winter is chilly and drear,
Clothes him all warmly, and keeps him from fear.

Love, in the springtime, will send to him too
New love to sing for, and new work to do.

Father-bird, mother-bird, Love teaches best,
Till the new baby-birds fill the new nest.

Old song and new song the little birds sing,
“Love is our Helper, and Love is our King.”

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. PHILIP H. HOLT.

THE REV. C. CRADDOCK has sent us the following character-sketch of Mr. Philip Holt to supplement our notice of last week:—

To have been associated with Mr. Holt was to feel that he had escaped the chill of monotony, and that to the last, even under the snows of old age, there was always a gaiety and buoyancy about him, a marked animation and vitality, a capacity to move forward and to keep step with progress, and the power to enliven, to interest, and to inspire men. He was of too great and too simple a nature to neglect and to undervalue sources of enjoyment and of blessedness which lie near to us and are open to us, and by ministering of his abundance to the need of others he was constantly renewing the springs of his own gladness, and replenishing the store of his own joy.

Whilst few men anticipated more eagerly or more confidently than he did the fulfilment of those promises of good for all our race which Time has brought us, few men saw more clearly or felt more deeply than he how much of heaven has been given here and now to the seeing eye and the understanding and loving heart—in the study of the life of man and of nature—in a mind cultivated to the enjoyment of art and literature—in the observation of the coming of the kingdom of God as seen in the progress of men and nations. And possessing in himself such sources of pure and lasting blessedness, which he rightly conceived to have been intended for all men, but from which many are excluded by reason of their life being made dull and wretched by ignorance, by lack of opportunity, and by evil habits, he made it part of his life’s aim to help to give sight to these blind in regard to what is beautiful and good, to what enriches and ennobles life.

‘There is no sorrow’—so one of the teachers of his earlier manhood had said—that we cannot contemplate with faith and hope, if we will only place ourselves in beneficent relations towards it, for it is impossible to think that God is regardless of that for which we are full of helpfulness and mercy.” It was in the spirit of this fine saying of Mr. Thom’s that Mr. Holt shaped the course of his activities, with such result as Mr. Thom had foreseen.

Mr. Holt was one of those wealthy men who, by regarding their wealth imaginatively, make it romantic—the fountain of rivers of pleasure and utility. He did this in many ways—by fostering education and learning, by coming to the help of poor students of fine promise, by the gift of a great tract of land for the pleasure and health of the people, by the demolition of slum dwellings, and by furthering great public works and interests. In respect of these larger benefactions, as of many smaller ones, if they were not made under cover of anonymity, they were made in the observance of as strict a secrecy as was possible.

It may be thought that Mr. Holt’s value for his city and for the nation would have been even greater than it was had he been able to overcome his almost invincible modesty, and allow himself a greater prominence in public affairs. But, though in private and among friends, his conversation was singularly informing, interesting, and stimulating—the free and natural outcome of a well-stored, orderly, and statesmanlike mind—yet those gifts of expression which are needed to move public audiences were not his. And his friends preferred him as he was.

Not the least achievement of his life was surely this, that after playing so large and so successful a part in the development of a vast shipping industry during a period marked by keen, competitive struggle, the things that remained with him, and were accounted by him as being of quite incomparable worth, were the great and imperishable things of the spirit—trust in God and in God’s purpose of good for all men and, on that as a foundation, great hopes for the future of mankind; the supreme value for life of goodness, truth, beauty, simplicity; comradeship in all high endeavour, and the union with God and with man, which is the fitting consummation of all life's discipline and of all holy and noble desire.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

LIKE other places, Liverpool is intensely preoccupied with the universal subject. The churches are facing its necessities in their several ways, and most of the women are engaged in patriotic activities. The Domestic Mission, Mill Street, has sent over seventy men, Hamilton Road over thirty; and of the ordinary congregations Ullet Road Church has contributed the largest number, inspired perhaps by the enlisting adventure of its former junior minister, the Rev. E. Stanley Russell, who is now promoted, on merit, as sergeant. Mr. B. P. Burroughs, energetic secretary for so many years of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, is awaiting appointment to service when "the right place is found for the right man." For seventeen years Mr. Burroughs served in the artillery volunteers, and retired with the rank of major. With Col. Kyffin-Taylor, M.P., his former chief, he offered himself again for service in this time of national emergency. Two of our ministers have also applied for commissions. Both have had volunteer experience, and one has had good preliminary cavalry practice. They have been thanked for their readiness to place their services at the disposal of the War Office, and their applications have been duly noted.

Intercession services are being held on Thursdays at Hope Street Church, Ullet Road Church, and the Ancient Chapel in rotation. This occasion for spiritual recollectiveness in a devotional atmosphere in mid-week is very opportune, and a box is placed in the vestibules for voluntary offerings to the Belgian Fund. A suitable and beautiful "Litany for the Time of War" has been compiled. One petition runs: That in the day of settlement we may be uplifted in spirit, and show ourselves humble enough to be just, and great enough to be generous. The services have been conducted by the ministers of the three congregations, and by the Revs. H. W. Hawkes, J. C. Hirst, and H. D. Roberts. Mr. Hirst, at the Ancient Chapel, gave the worshippers a space for silent prayer—an excellent precedent, which might be more often followed with spiritual advantage. We each have our own heart-searchings and heart-bitternesses to bring into the divine light; and why, indeed, should we be talking or listening all the time?

Valuable suggestions have been made to the Town Hall Relief Committee by the organisers of the Liverpool Anti-Sweating League, who both serve personally on special committees. Their special function is the welfare of the women-workers who bear the brunt of the industrial dislocation brought on by the War. Mr. C. Sydney Jones is Chairman of the Employment Sub-Committee. Miss Palethorpe in Liverpool is using her artistic powers to develop the fine-art side of doll-making. More will be heard of this venture. There has been an interesting result at West Kirby of a resolve registered at a ministerial breakfast table, à deux. Mr. and Mrs. Roper, with the Women's League as the organising body, have opened a hostel for Belgian refugees. A congregational meeting adopted the scheme, and members promised loans of furniture and guaranteed weekly contributions of money. A Belgian family of three generations is snugly housed. Two delightful little girls speak their newly acquired English with the purest of accents; a younger little fellow, their brother, makes vigorous efforts to spout the English names for "kettle," "chair," &c., but, with a masculine lack of vocal adaptability, produces a very wonderful mixture of Flemish and English. A visit to a Belgian (French-speaking) hostel which provides for refugees of a higher social status sends one back with an awful realisation of the horrors inflicted on that heroic country by the German "necessities" of war. Here are ladies who have lost their all, and questions of sympathy put to them evoke tears both from the sympathisers and the victims of the war-machine. This large suburban residence is lent by an Anglican, and £5 a week is given towards its support by one of our household of the faith. These are but instances of international Good Samaritanism evident on all sides. "The dreadful medicine of war," as Treitschke calls it in one of his blasphemous phrases, is, in fact, proving a purgative; and the strange negation of the spiritual which we are contemplating in an entire nation (as it sadly seems) is bringing home to ourselves in horror and terror the real spiritual values. In all this is much room for humility and discernment, "lest we forget" in the cold doings of our normal everyday experience.

Liverpool is afforded various opportunities of hearing Belgian and French professors at the University and the Royal Institution. The unspeakable wrongs of Belgium are thus assailing our very ears, notwithstanding the dignified restraint of manner which nearly always marks the speakers. A notable occasion was the magnificent delivery of two Russian women—Miss Zinaïda Vengerova and the Princess Bariatinsky, before a fine audience at the University, of a plea for British understanding of the Russian people. Each dwelt in her own way, and with amazing eloquence (in English), on the innate mysticism, the inborn spirituality, the national idealism of the Russian, and neither failed to contrast these with the pedantic and didactic worship of material force by the Teuton. Russia, freed from militarist influences after the war, would begin a new life, for her people were essentially democratic and humanitarian. The war (unlike the Japanese war, which divided her) was a national war—a war of deliverance, a holy war. The people, said the Princess, saw Germany and Russia symbolized respectively in the names Nietzsche and Tolstoi. This impassioned presentation of the Russian ideals by these gifted women was received with immense enthusiasm and evident conviction.

At Hope Street Church Dr. Mellor has been speaking to full evening congregations on Bernhardt, Nietzsche, Tolstoi, and such topics of the time. One earnest Churchwoman, after hearing the address on Tolstoi, told the writer that she had heard no such Christian teaching anywhere. I intimated that if she visited any of our congregations she would probably hear the same idealism, even if the complete theory of non-resistance could not be maintained. She had wondered whether she should leave the Church of her affections, but comforted herself with the thought that "a few Anglicans were sound." I made no effort to make her change. Such can only be a matter of the most sacred private judgment.

Only the briefest notice can now be given of a valuable experiment at Gateacre of a Men's Meeting, which affords a noteworthy suggestion to congregations in the smaller places. It is held once a week. There are a short opening prayer, Bible reading, an address on any subject, followed by discussion or questioning. On alternate evenings a "Bible Topic" is presented by the minister. Each meeting concludes with the Lord's Prayer. Nothing strictly political or divisive in theology is within the compact, for the idea is to gather together men of all creeds. Several agricultural labourers attend this broad educational effort.

One wonders what the leading and eminent Liverpool citizens think of the liberal Unitarian faith, whose members bring them so frequently to funeral services at Ullet Road Church and the Ancient Chapel. They must put these places of worship in the category of a local St. Paul's Cathedral or Westminster Abbey. Just lately Mr. Alfred Booth and Mr. Philip Holt have called forth their tokens of personal esteem and homage to public service. Space forbids me to dwell upon this pregnant thought; and also to leave inarticulate happy thoughts of Mrs. Darbishire, who went to rest at the age of 95, a very embodiment of gentle and thoughtful womanhood. But the same spirit, and even a more vivid and conscious spirit, animates the younger generations. Words spoken of Miss Montgomery in Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester, testify graphically to this quiet conviction: "Thy children thank Thee for the dutiful and loving daughter; the motherly sister, the affectionate and loyal friend, the sympathizer with all great causes, the helper of her kind, one faithful in the congregation, earnestly fulfilling her vocation in life's toilsome way, ever a humble striver after the will and purpose of the Eternal Spirit, a willing and active citizen in the growing Kingdom of our God."

TEMPERANCE AND PATRIOTISM.

THE connection between moral and physical efficiency and the desire to be of service to our country is sufficiently apparent to all Sunday School and Band of Hope workers, but it is not always fully realized that definite instruction on the subject is required by the children, who must be encouraged to think the matter out for themselves, and to express their own thoughts clearly and intelligently. At the present time teachers have a splendid opportunity of bringing home to the minds of their young scholars the necessity for equipping themselves for the duties of citizenship, and the National Unitarian Temperance Association has come to their assistance by offering prizes for the best essays on 'Why should boys and girls be abstainers?' and 'Why should boys and girls join a Band of Hope?' (Class A, under 12 years), and on 'Patriotism and Abstinence' (Class B, 12 to 15 years). The latter is an excellent subject for the older members, particularly now, and may be treated in many different ways, special emphasis being laid on the reasons why people should abstain from intoxicating drinks. The essays must be written unaided, though not, of course, without such help as preliminary talks may give, and must be from 300 to 500 words. Competitors should write on one side of the paper only, and must put at the top of their essays their name, age, and address, together with the name of the society to which he belongs, whether it be Sunday School, Band of Hope, Boy's Own Brigade, Boy's or Girls' Life Brigade, Scouts, or Children's Guild. All essays must be sent in by February 1, 1915, addressed to Mr. E. F. Cowlin, Hon. Secretary of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, 19, Northwood Road, Forest Hill, London, S.E. Mrs. Solly, the President, will be one of the three judges, and she expresses the hope that the competitors will be very numerous. Book prizes of the value of 7s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 2s. 6d. will be given in Class A, and 10s. 6d., 6s. 6d., and 3s. 6d. in Class B.

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

THE REV. W. H. ROSE writes:—"I shall be pleased if you will permit me through your columns to make my usual Christmas appeal for Rhyl Street Mission. My Poors' Purse is empty, and I require help for the children's Christmas parties. Also books for our Young People's Library, and new or cast-off clothing for women and children. I know there are many special appeals this year, but I trust these appeals will not interfere with the regular work amongst the poor which is carried on at our Missions. Parcels should be sent to Rhyl Street Hall, Kentish Town, London, N.W., and cheques addressed to me at Shirley, Essex Road, Leyton, London, N.E."

THE REV. W. J. PIGGOTT writes from the Blackfriars Mission, Stamford Street, S.E., appealing for donations to the Poor's Purse, and gifts of clothing or toys for distribution at Christmas-time. All such gifts, together with news of temporary work, coal, food, surgical aid, and hospital letters will be gratefully received and acknowledged.

THE REV. A. GOLLAND writes from 46, Bell Street, Edgware Road, N.W.:-

"At this season many of your readers send generous help to the Domestic Mission stations. May I remind them of the needs of Bell Street? War relief work has necessitated the collection and expenditure of much money; but friends will not forget that our regular work goes on, and needs support too; and that at least the usual amount of distress, not directly due to the war, and therefore having no claim on war relief funds, exists. Our institutions are all in a vigorous condition, and particulars of our work would be gladly supplied by me to any inquirers. Subscriptions for the Poors' Purse, the special Christmas funds, the funds for Sunday School, club, and class work would be gratefully received."

Friends who intend to respond to the appeal for Belgian children in Holland, which appeared in our columns last week, are asked to note that Mrs. Aves' address is No. 12, Thurlow Road, N.W., not No. 15.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Aberystwyth.—Mr. D. J. Davies, Hon. Secretary of the New Street Meeting House, writes from 16, Cambrian Street, Aberystwyth, to say that, as some 10,000 soldiers are about to be billeted in the town, it is hoped that parents, ministers, and friends who happen to know if any officers or privates belong to Unitarian or kindred congregations are amongst the number will send him, without delay, their names, rank, battalion, and billet addresses in order that everything possible may be done for them.

Belper.—Services of Intercession are being held in all the churches of Belper in which the various denominations are uniting. A large congregation attended to hear the sermon preached by the Rev. A. Leslie Smith at the Unitarian Church.

Birmingham, Small Heath.—A Sale of Work was held in the Schoolroom of the Waverley Road Church on Saturday afternoon, December 5, the opening ceremony being performed by Miss Lloyd. A sum of £31 10s. was realised, which will be devoted to church expenses.

Carmarthen.—Mr. Ronald P. Jones delivered two lectures recently on 'Church and Chapel Architecture' to the students of the Presbyterian College and others interested in the subject. The first lecture gave an outline of the development of Church architecture in the west of Europe, while the second was devoted to Reformation architecture, especially in England, the history of chapel building in the eighteenth century and in the periods of the Classic and Gothic revivals being presented in a very interesting manner with the aid of numerous slides. The lectures were greatly appreciated, and Mr. Jones was heartily thanked.

Chester.—We regret to record the death of Mr. Arthur Orrett, which took place on Tuesday, December 1, in his 61st year. Mr. Orrett had for the long period of thirty-six years acted as Superintendent and Treasurer of the Sunday School, and for eleven years was the Hon. Secretary of Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester. He was one of the founders of the South Cheshire Association, and was the Hon. Treasurer until four years ago, when his health broke down. He had, up to his illness, taken a keen interest in the affairs of the Chapel, was a member of the Vestry, a Trustee, and filled other offices with ability and distinction. He also took a leading part in the political life of the City, and for a period of twenty years acted as Hon. Secretary of the Liberal Association, and for the same period was Secretary of the Merchant Taylors' Company. The funeral was held on Friday, December 4. A service was held in Matthew Henry's Chapel, at which the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans, who also conducted the service at the graveside, officiated. Last Sunday morning a Memorial Service was held at Matthew Henry's Chapel, conducted by the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans.

Evesham.—The Rev. H. H. Johnson, who was publicly welcomed to the ministry of Oat Street Chapel on December 10, is conducting a weekly Ministers' Class, which already numbers thirty-three members, the average attendance since November 16 having been twenty-four. The meetings this month will complete a course preparatory to a religious service to be held on the first Sunday in the new year, when new members will be admitted into the church, and will be invited, together with the present members, to sign their names in the Roll of Members. On November 25 Mr. Johnson addressed the Social Union of Soldiers' Mothers and Wives at the Town Hall, about seventy being present. Fourteen members of the Church and Sunday School have joined the colours.

London: Forest Gate.—The first annual display and prize distribution in connection with the Martineau Lodge of Young Christian Citizens was held at the Unitarian Church on Wednesday, December 2. It is the aim of the Lodge to instil into the minds of its members a desire to follow high ideals, and the pledge which is taken by each boy and girl requires that they should pay attention to health and cleanliness, avoid intoxicating drinks and tobacco, and seek to be honest and true in their conduct, doing good to all wherever they go. These ideals were illustrated in a series of effective tableaux arranged by Sister Knight and Sister Seymour, who had trained the children for their parts. Many messages of goodwill and apologies for absence were received, and several friends from the City Temple, and the members of the Drummond Lodge from Walthamstow, were present. The Rev. T. P. Spedding gave a short address, and the prizes were presented by the Rev. A. H. Biggs of Ilford. The opening and closing services were conducted almost entirely by the children.

London: Mansford Street.—The London Battalion of the Boys' Own Brigade attended a united service at Mansford Street Chapel on Sunday evening, December 6, between 230 and 240 boys and officers being present. The sermon was preached by the Minister, the Rev. Gordon Cooper.

London: Stepney.—Mr. Walter M. Long, who for some time past has been helping at College Chapel, has now accepted the invitation of the congregation to act as lay-worker during the time he is studying to qualify for entrance into the Home Missionary College. Mr. Long will reside in Stepney, and hopes to take up active missionary work in the neighbourhood.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE WINTER EXHIBITION AT BURLINGTON HOUSE.

The Winter Exhibition at the Royal Academy, which begins in the first week in the new year, will consist of paintings by members of all the independent societies as well as those of the Royal Academy. In addition to these there will be a number of important works by Belgian artists, and a selection of Belgian sculpture recently exhibited at Glasgow. The money taken at the door will be devoted to charity, a portion being set apart for the Belgian relief funds and the Red Cross Society.

HELP FROM THE HAWAIIANS.

Another consignment of good things will be shipped from New York shortly for the war refugees; but this time it is to the people of the island of Hawaii that thanks will be due. A committee has been engaged in packing up contributions of clothing which have been made by the residents, without distinction of race, colour, or nationality, and Mr. Carlsmith, the chairman, states that the first shipment of forty-five large packing cases will reach New York about December 20. From there the goods will be sent to London, where arrangements are being made for their proper distribution. Several hundred dollars have also been contributed, the regret being expressed that the sum is not as many pounds. In going through the bundles which were sent in, a packet containing a doll was found which bore the following inscription: "To some little Belgian girl who has lost her dolly. From a little Hawaiian girl." The majority of the inhabitants of the island, it is interesting to notice, are either English, Scotch, German, Austrian, or Japanese, and each of these has large contributions to make to the people at home.

TEMPERANCE IN THE NAVY.

In the course of an address delivered at Wallasey, Cheshire, on Saturday last, Admiral Sir George King-Hall, K.C.B., who was introduced by the Chairman as "The Father of the Australian Navy," said he had been asked to speak in regard to Temperance in the Navy. As President of the Royal Naval Temperance Society, he could testify to the manner in which efficiency was effected in the Navy by total abstinence. There were now 22,000 members, all of whom, of course, had to stop their grog. Their motto was "For the glory of God and the good of the service." The one drawback to their work was the spirit ration, which in his opinion should be abolished altogether. He might say that it had never been introduced in the Australian Navy. It was quite wrong for Band of Hope boys to be unnecessarily exposed, on entering the Navy, to the danger of breaking their pledge. He would, of course, give the men 1d. per day, to which they would be entitled in lieu of their spirit ration, the drinking of which undoubtedly affected the shooting of the men, as well as their health and intellect. No spirits were allowed on the ships in the German Navy, and he did wish the Admiralty would see the wisdom of adopting the same rule. The late Lord Roberts had said: "Give me a teetotal army, and I will lead it anywhere." It was, the speaker remarked, a profound mistake for us to be sending spirits to the soldiers in our trenches, for it was putting temptation in the way of the men, 75 per cent of whom in some regiments were teetotalers. It was for the reason he had mentioned that Lord Charles Beresford, when in command of the Channel Fleet, became a total abstainer, being a firm believer that by setting a good example to his men he was helping to promote the efficiency of the service.

THE FEAST OF ST. NICHOLAS.

St. Nicholas's Day, which, we are reminded by The Manchester Guardian, is the children's festival in Holland and Belgium, was celebrated this week at the Belgian refugee camp at Earl's Court with presents for the children, stockings hung up, a Christmas tree, and all the rest of it. The Dutch settlers took the feast of St. Nicholas, or Sankt Klaus, over to the United States, where it was transferred to Christmas. Sankt Klaus was turned into Santa Claus, and came to England under that name in quite modern times. The Christmas tree, of course, is borrowed from Germany, and seems to have been introduced here shortly after the marriage of Queen Victoria to the Prince Consort. It is not quite as popular with us as Santa Claus, whom we have quite taken to our hearts, and rechristened Father Christmas. Santa Claus is only a corruption of St. Nicholas, by the way, the patron saint, as some would have us believe, of thieves as well as children!

THE NATION'S CHILDREN.

At a time like the present, when so many demands are made upon our sympathy, a plea for Dr. Barnardo's Homes comes with special insistence. The splendid work which has been done in connection with these Homes, for the last forty-eight years, among orphan and destitute children, should never be forgotten when we are talking of patriotism, for Dr. Barnardo and his followers have fought a ceaseless battle against the deadliest foes of the human race in the form of vice, drunkenness, hereditary tendencies, bad influences, and poverty, which sap the life of the nation at its source. Over 400 old Barnardo boys are giving their services to their country at the present time as part of the Canadian contingent, and more than 100 have enlisted in Lord Kitchener's new army. But never was the work of those who are carrying on the homes more difficult, or their anxieties greater, and it is to be hoped that amid the pressure of other claims their urgent needs will not be forgotten this Christmastide.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE German naval raid on East Coast towns is a disagreeable incident, and the loss of life is lamentable. For a few hours it has turned our attention from the decisive events of the War. It will probably produce a crop of amateur critics of naval strategy in the newspapers. But for the rest it is likely to act as a powerful stimulus to recruiting, and it will certainly strengthen the decision of our people to see this thing through at whatever cost. We hope that it will also make some impression upon the small group which still regards every appeal to national honour, and every warning against the menace to freedom and justice, a little sadly. We have had our own critics of that kind. But we are deeply convinced that we can only carry this struggle through to victory and peace, when we look at the German menace without any blurring of the lines or obscuring of the facts, and realize that it is civilization itself and the obligations of honour, which alone can make a fellowship of free nations possible, with which Germany is at war.

ONE of the agreements of the Hague Conference, which was accepted by all the Powers, including Germany, in 1907, is in the following terms:—"The attack or bombardment by naval forces of ports, towns, villages, habitations, or buildings which are not defended is prohibited." The attack on Scarborough is in clear contravention of this clause. It may have done something to gratify the lust of destruction which has been so rampant in this war, and no doubt it is hoped in Berlin that it has produced a wholesome fear among the civilian population. We doubt, however, whether officers in the German fleet, who are proud of the traditions of the naval service, can feel any gratification in being the instruments of this ignoble kind of warfare. To elude the enemy and attack the unarmed are the traditional methods of pirates.

LORD BRYCE has put the British case admirably in a letter which he has written to The American Review of Reviews. After commenting upon the frightful suddenness of the outbreak of the European war due to the absence of popular control over foreign policy in Austria, Russia, and Germany, and the consequent detachment of the military groups from public opinion, he continues:—

You may ask me whether Britain also was not swiftly hurried into war, although her Ministry is controlled by the people. Doubtless the British decision was swift, because the case was urgent. But the point on which the decision turned was one admitting of a clear, simple, prompt determination. All turned upon the violation of Belgian neutrality; and upon that point public opinion expressed itself within a few hours.

If the question had been whether Britain should go to war to maintain the so-called balance of power, or because she had reason to believe that Germany meditated an attack on her a little later, there would have been a strenuous controversy, and so much opposition that war might well have been avoided. Anyhow, time for possible pacific adjustment would have been secured. But when the question was seen to be whether Belgium should be defended against attack, the nation thought for itself, and decided promptly.

In other words, while it is of supreme importance for our Government to secure the support of a sensitive and critical public opinion upon all vital issues, under an autocracy it does not matter. Whatever public opinion exists is largely a prearranged and mechanical thing, which can be relied upon to obey rather than to think.

The New York Times has issued a most significant appeal to Germans resident in America to help their countrymen to realize the situation and to come to a better mind. It recognizes that however long it may be continued the War can only have one end, for Germany is already beaten, and cannot retrieve her blunders. Moreover, the world cannot and will not let her win and dominate over other nations. Why, then, should this frightful waste of life go on?

Germany is doomed to sure defeat. Bankrupt in statesmanship, over-matched in arms, under the moral condemnation of the civilized world, befriended only by Austria and Turkey, two backward-looking and decaying nations, desperately battling against the hosts of three Great Powers to which help and reinforcements from States now neutral will certainly come should the decision be long deferred, she pours out the blood of her heroic subjects, and wastes her diminishing substance in a hopeless struggle that postpones, but cannot alter, the fatal decree,

The New York Times turns the tables cleverly upon the German Press campaign in the following passage. At the same time it expresses exactly what many of the best minds in this country hope and long for, and would give much to see accomplished.

Have not the men of German blood in this country a duty to perform to their beleaguered brethren in the old home? The American of German birth and German descent should see and feel the truth about the present situation of Germany—the probability of a near, the certainty of a remote, future. At home Germans cannot know the whole truth. It is not permitted them to know it. It will be unfraternal and most cruel for German-Americans further to keep the truth from them or to fail in their plain duty to make known to them how low the Imperial militaristic ideal has fallen in the world's esteem, and bring them to understand that the enemies they now confront are but the first line of civilization's defences against the menace of the sword that for ever rattles its scabbard. The sword must go and the scabbard too, and the shining armour. If the Germans here have at all the ear of the Germans there, can they not tell them to stop? They have come here to escape the everlasting din of war's trappings; they have come to find peace and quiet in a land of liberty and law, where the Government rests on the content of the governed, and where people, by their chosen representatives, when there is a question of going into the trenches to be slain, have something to say about it. Have they ever tried to get into the heads of their friends in the Fatherland some idea of the comforts and advantages of being governed that way? Instead of trying to change the well-matured convictions of Americans, why not labour for the conversion of their brother Germans?

AN equally illuminating utterance is to be found in a speech by Dr. Michael Sadler at Keighley last Monday. We call attention to it, because careful study of the reasons why the excellent qualities of the German people have been exploited so easily by militarist ambitions is one of the best contributions which we can make to a better understanding in the future. Dr. Sadler pointed out that in the modern world the force of working-class opinion had usually proved fatal to military autocracy. In Germany this had not taken place, and the reason was to be found in the doctrine of the State which underlies German Socialism. The theory of Karl Marx seized the mind of the German working-class in the cities and urban districts, and became for them a sacred dogma and a political war cry. It disposed the working-men of Germany to look to the State as the employer of the future, to the State as the custodian of national wealth, to the State as master of the destinies of all its citizens.

It was this theory, Dr. Sadler pointed out, which lay ready to the hand of Prussian military ambitions, and the commanding genius of Bismarck. But it was not militarism, but the centralized authority of the State that misled the German working-class into a hesitating acceptance of the new Imperial order. They had been hypnotized by the theory of the State. Bismarck, with cunning combined with patriotic purpose, lured them into the trap of thinking that they could in the end get more out of the State, even though based on militarism, than from the slower and more devious road of non-militarist, decentralized liberty. Militarism gave Germany discipline. Industrialism, helped by discipline, gave her wealth. The doctrine of the State secured general obedience and a certain form of self-sacrifice. And by this combination of good and evil modern Germany grew very rich and very strong.

DR. SADLER concluded his striking analysis of the subservience of German industrialism to the autocracy of the State by referring to our own preference for self-direction, and a less disciplined life, and our distrust of centralized organization:—

On the whole [he said], and without making any apology for our slackness, for our indifference to science, or for our lack of discipline, I think that we have been more nearly right than Germany. But we, like they, have played a perilous game. We have wasted energy through not clinching by decisive action the truths which have emerged in free discussion. The Germans have deadened independence of moral judgment and the power of shrewd observation by overbearing individual liberty, by an excessive use of State authority, and by too persistent an appeal to national self-interest. And now has come a decisive struggle between two conflicting ideals of the State, the British and the German. But in the war each is learning from the other lessons which when peace comes it may apply to its own advantage. And I venture to predict that after the war Germany will make experiments in political freedom, and that the Government of Great Britain will pay more anxious attention to systematic scientific research, to national discipline, and to technical education.

WEDNESDAY was the bicentenary of the birth of George Whitefield. Unlike Wesley his name has become a dim memory and a distant tradition. For his was the matchless power of speech, the power to sway the emotions of the crowd, and he never impressed his personality upon a great organization. But he stirred English religion to its depths. He broke its stiff conventions, and kindled a flame of Evangelistic fervour which has never been extinguished. Whitefield had the rare gift of successful preaching in the open-air. It was said that 30,000 people could hear his voice, and he was such a master of moving oratory that men of all sorts and conditions were captivated and won. Garrick said of him that he could draw tears simply by pronouncing the word Mesopotamia. Even more remarkable is the story that on one occasion his words drew all the money out of the pockets of that sanest and most prudent of mortals, Benjamin Franklin. But the source of his power was not consummate acting but fiery conviction. In his preaching men felt the presence and reality of God. It was an act of genius alike in the intensity of its feeling and its power of communicating his own emotion to others. He has had many imitators but no successors.

A SERVICE OF INTERCESSION lasting continuously for twenty-four hours was held in St. Paul's on Wednesday and Thursday. The spirit which breathes through the instructions is good, and shows how far we have advanced from the spirit of a narrow nationalism, which simply asks for the triumph of our arms in our prayers. One of them was as follows:—"Pray for our enemies, ask that they may be forgiven; that there may be no spirit of personal hatred in our hearts towards them; that the causes of bitter misunderstanding between us may be taken away; that they may be recompensed for acts of kindness shown by them to our wounded and prisoners; that we and our Allies may be preserved from un-Christian acts of retaliation."

There will be a good deal of difference of opinion about the religious value of such a service. To many people who are not lacking in spiritual conviction and the desire to pray, it makes little or no appeal. Is it supposed that the mere fact of its continuance without interruption through the night, when many people must have been tired and over-wrought, makes it more likely that the supplications for help and peace will be heard? The object of Christian prayer is not to drag the Divine Will down to the level of our desires, but to lift our desires up into conformity with the Divine Will. In this high endeavour, to which we must bring concentration of mind and the freshest of our powers, we get little help from a service which is unduly prolonged. It has too much ecclesiastical mechanism about it, and encourages the belief, which still has a strong hold upon many minds, that we shall be heard for our much speaking.

THE GOOD WILL.

THE word good will, which comes so naturally to our lips at the Christmas season, emphasizes the active side of religion. It is something more than a condition of mind or a sentiment of benevolence. It is not merely the negation of enmity or vindictiveness. It is a strong and energetic quality, for it implies a will disciplined in the love of goodness, and devoted to its practice and pursuit. For the man of goodwill there is always not only a dream to be cherished, but also a duty to be done. He is not a solitary or an ascetic, absorbed in the task of suppressing his own desires, or caught in the meshes of Oriental fatalism. Instead of destroying his ambition to make his life strong and effective at the bidding of religion, he has turned his hand to the harder task of consecrating his strength to the service of goodness.

We hear a good deal at the present time about the duty of self-realization and the will to power. These are held up before the rising generation as the last words in the wisdom of life. Let a man make the most of himself. Let him express himself in boundless energy. Let his creative impulses have free play. Let him be strong and determined enough to make a dint upon the world before he dies. It is an appeal which finds its way to many a generous heart. It stirs the spirit of adventure. It is kindling and vital, so different from the caricature of Christianity as a religion of feebleness and acquiescence, fit only for people of poor health or a cowardly spirit. But self-realization without some heavenly ideal of character, the will to power without an ultimate aim, which it is our purpose to reach, have they any meaning except as the effervescence of youthful energy, which has still to make its choice between self-will and self-consecration, between the worship of God and the service of the devil? Concealed behind the high-sounding phrases of many modern teachers of revolt there is the crazy idea that energetic living without the checks of reason and conscience is in itself admirable. Their quarrel with Christianity is not its failure in action, but that its action is prescribed by rational and moral conditions, which we do not choose for ourselves, because they reflect the mind and will of God. They cannot abide it that the raw Will to Power should be controlled at every point by the trained Will to Goodness.

The great need of the world is a deeper sense of the value and obligation of the good will. Where it fails, everything which makes for the peace and happiness of men must necessarily fail as well. Put the tools of civilization into the hands of a man of unscrupulous ambition for wealth or power and they turn at once into weapons of destruction. We have seen this in our industrial life. When economic forces are isolated from the other interests of a good man's life, and are allowed to control our actions entirely for our own advantage, society draws near to the brink of disaster. We get money without morals, and then the energy which is stored up in money begins to create palaces for the wealthy and hovels for the poor. The selfish vacancy of idle lives, the miseries of the sweater's den, the sharp conflicts between capital and labour, the bitterness of class hatred, these are the evil things which prey upon us when money is made an excuse for doing as we please without regard to the claims of the common life and the goodwill which we owe to our neighbour. Many people in the modern world are under the delusion that bloated living, the noisy energy of extravagance, without any rational or moral end in view, is a symbol of greatness, and establishes a right to domineer over the weak and the poor.

We see a similar exercise of unbridled will when national pride throws off the shackles of moral obligation, and announces its right to conquer, to enslave, or to destroy because it is powerful. It has all the weapons of destruction at its command; science is its ready servant in creating desolation in the earth; all the crude instincts of self-interest masquerade as political wisdom. It is in a position to indulge the will to power as no one has ever indulged it before, and to plan its own colossal victories beforehand. What does it matter if it enlists cruelty and treachery and greed in its service, for they will help its cause? Only let men be enfeebled by fear and they will obey. It is an excellent programme for any nation, blinded by its own lust, which is stupid enough to accept it. No question is to be asked about its wisdom or its righteousness, for reason is bankrupt, and morality has ceased to exist. All that remains is energy pushing recklessly forward, rushing stormily to its doom, dragging the world with it into the chaos and barbarism from which it has slowly emerged, unless it is checked and thrown down in its mad career by men who have learned the lesson of humble and glad obedience to a law of goodness, which is greater than themselves.

The Christmas message has never come with such a piercing challenge to our conscience as it does this year. There is nothing weak or sentimental about it. It is stern, clear, and emphatic. We are to meet the evil will with the challenge of the good will. We are to be active in the service of divine love and righteousness. We are to delight in the law of God in the inward man, even in the hard terms of obedience which it exacts from us. We are to banish the desires which conflict with God's rational and loving purposes for all his children. We are to aim at no success which involves the crushing of another soul or the bankruptcy of another nation. All our energy must go into the life of fellowship and service, which is the life of victory. And then, but only then, we shall begin to understand what God means by the message of peace, and by his gift to us of the Prince of Peace. For it is not the dreaming heart but the active will which enters into the hiding-places of power. Peace is not the ease of an untroubled life, but harmony, profound, and at last unbroken, between the energies of the human soul and the living will of God. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee." Trust in its very calmness and its unquestioning obedience is energy at white heat, the energy of the good will reaching forth to grasp and to hold the reality of God. It is this confidence which the Christmas Gospel can inspire in the hearts of men, but only as the divine answer to their own effort. And when they have attained, no storms can touch them, and no terror shall make them afraid.

Stronger than steel
Is the sword of the Spirit!
Swifter than arrows

The light of the truth is !
Greater than anger
Is Love, and subdueth !

The dawn is not distant
Nor is the night starless—
Love is eternal !
God is still God, and
His faith shall not fail us !
Christ is eternal !

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

NO ANARCHY IN THE UNIVERSE.

It is a sad thing, most sad indeed, to see the reckless flinging away of such blessings as we have hitherto enjoyed ; most sad to contemplate as a near probability the destruction of our national existence ; saddest of all to believe that the South is bringing awful calamities upon itself. But on the other hand there is a comfort in the belief that, whatever be the result of present troubles, the solution of Slavery will be found in it ; and that the nature of these difficulties, the principles involved in them, and the trials that accompany them, will develop a higher tone of feeling and a nobler standard of character than have been common with us of late. All we have to do at the North is to stand firm to those principles which we have asserted and which we believe to be just—to have faith that though the heavens fall, liberty and right shall not fail, and that though confusion and distress prevail for the time in the affairs of men there is no chance and no anarchy in the universe. We are reaping the whirlwind—but when reaped the air will be clearer and more healthy. I write hastily, for it is almost the mail hour, and I want to send this to you to-day. But even were I to write at length and with all deliberation, I could do no more than show you more fully the condition of anxious expectancy in which we wait from day to day, and of general distress among the commercial community. Of course in these circumstances there is little interest felt in other than public affairs. It is a bad time for literature ; the publishers are drawing in their undertakings ;—and among other postpone-ments is that of your poems. So much do our personal concerns depend on political issues. The only new book of interest is Emerson's [i.e., 'The Conduct of Life']. It was published a day or two since, and could not have appeared at a fitter time, for it is full of counsels to rebuke cowardice, to confirm the moral principles of men, and to base them firmly on the unshaken foundations of eternal laws.—From a letter written by Charles Eliot Norton to A. H. Clough on Dec. 11, 1860.

MANY loved Truth and lavished life's best oil

Amid the dust of books to find her,
Content at last for guerdon of their toil
With the cast mantle she hath left behind her.

Many in sad faith sought for her,
Many with crossed hands sighed for her ;

But these our brothers fought for her,
At life's dear peril wrought for her,
So loved her that they died for her !

Their higher instinct knew,
They love her best who to themselves are true,
And what they dare to dream of, dare to do !

They followed her and found her
Where all may hope to find,
Not in the ashes of the burnt-out mind,
But beautiful—with danger's sweetness round her :

Where faith made whole with deed
Breathes its awakening breath
Into the lifeless creed.

LOWELL.

O GOD, who hast taught us to keep all Thy heavenly commandments by loving Thee and our neighbour ;
grant us the spirit of peace and grace, that we may be both devoted to Thee with our whole heart, and united to each other with a pure will. Amen.

PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

IN these days it is difficult to think or speak of anything but of the War. The horror of it is an obsession by day and a nightmare by night. And perhaps it is well it should be so for a while, for it is strange how soon, after the first shock of it all, the mind becomes dulled, and one can continue to eat one's breakfast whilst reading of unspeakable horrors. Even the poverty and misery and tragic bereavements around one, which cut us to the quick in their fresh appeal, will become so common that gradually we shall accept it all in the same sort of way that we have done the miserable conditions in the midst of which we have lived for so many years. It is merciful that our imagination is limited, and that beyond a certain point one cannot suffer ; but whilst our sympathies are still fresh, and the shock of the nation's moral failure is still with us, now is the time to see how we can make of this failure a stepping-stone to spiritual triumph.

It were well to begin by trying to see and act straightly, and by being candid in our utterances. In the midst of this severe national trial there is one great truth that many are realizing in humiliation of soul, and that is, that the nations engaged in warfare are reaping the punishment of their sins. Others there are who admit the fact, but dismiss the thought of it with a fleeting sigh, whilst not a few merely take up the parrot cry "We are being punished for our sins," in a cheerful, "pious," offhand manner that leaves more than a doubt as to the depth and sincerity of the sentiment. A more honest attitude, and a fuller realization of what these words imply, is surely what is specially needed just now. Far worse, it seems to me, to give expression to this admission of sin in a light, uncomprehending spirit than to say, "I don't see where we are to blame." How seldom does he who exclaims "We are being punished for our sins" say in the depths of his soul "I am being punished for my sins." It is easy to repeat that we are "miserable offenders, and there is no health in us" ; but which one amongst us will be rebuked for a single fault without showing any feeling of resentment or without any attempt at self-justification ? We listen to denunciatory sermons in church, and remark as we come out what a fine one it was, and how much we "enjoyed" it, and, if we are to be honest with ourselves, we know that in nine cases out of ten it is because we have not taken it as a personal rebuke unto ourselves.

We need to realize that "I" is part of "we" ; that "our" sin and "our" responsibility includes "my" sin and "my" responsibility ; and that the nation is made up of a number of units closely linked together, of which "I" am one. Whatever affects one affects all. The fact that many of us feel that we are in no way responsible for this particular war, which is, after all, only a culminating act of wickedness to which other acts and thoughts had led the way, does not clear us from the charge of sin, or make it possible for us to loosen the chains that bind us all together. Each one of us helps to make society, and to that extent we are each individually responsible. If the comparatively innocent suffer disproportionately, be it remembered that though the fact of our solidarity brings vicarious punishment and suffering all along the line, it also often brings unmerited joy and glory. Instead of repeating quite so often "This is God's judgment on His people," "We are suffering through our sinfulness," would it not be well for us to look inwards, each one into his own soul, and find out there the shortcomings and sins that have helped to hinder the coming of God's kingdom upon earth?

This is a time of suffering for us individually and collectively, and if the trial is a fiery one, let us pray it may be a purifier. On all sides we now see men and women enthusiastically devoting themselves to the relief of suffering, but if the world is to be redeemed, it needs more than this. Its redemption can only be effected through a wider and deeper spirituality, which shall become the ruling power of our lives, and the responsibility of realizing this ideal rests with every individual. RED CROSS WORK.

SIR,—The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at their meeting on December 9, warmly approved of the Appeal of the British Red Cross Society, and they commend it to the generous support of Unitarians all over the country. A copy of the letter and leaflet issued by the Society has been forwarded from Essex Hall to all ministers of congregations, along with a stamped envelope addressed to the Hon. Treasurer, Lord Rothschild, 83, Pall Mall, London, S.W., to whom contributions should be forwarded. It is suggested that a collection be made in all our Churches on the first Sunday in the New Year; or if for some local reason January 3 is inconvenient, on another early date. Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Jewish religious communities are joining in this common effort for the relief of the sick and wounded on the battlefields; and the Committee of the Association are confident that Unitarians will desire to do their part.—Yours, &c.,

W. COPELAND BOWIE,
Secretary.

RELIGION WITHOUT THOUGHT.

Practical Mysticism. By Evelyn Underhill. London: J. M. Dent & Sons, 2s. 6d. net.

WE think that it is more than time that a voice of warning was raised against the flood of talking and writing about Mysticism, which is the latest whim in religion. Most of it is lacking both in insight and experience, and the hard discipline of soul, without which the whole thing is simply a form of affectation. A few years ago Miss Evelyn Underhill wrote a fairly good book on Mysticism, and since that time she has become the fashionable journalist of the subject. Her latest book reveals her as the victim of her own posé. "I write only," she says, "for the larger class which, repelled by the formidable appearance of more elaborate works on the subject, would yet like to know what is meant by mysticism, and what it has to offer the average man.... For this reason, I presuppose in my readers no knowledge whatever of the subject, either upon the philosophic, religious, or historical side." Some people will, no doubt, be attracted by this promise, but they will soon find themselves plunged into strange, abstract arguments, flavoured with tags of learning, which have no meaning unless the reader has made a special study of the subject. Does Miss Underhill expect the average man to know who "the Victorines" were without a word of explanation, or to accept her casual references to Ruysbroeck, The Cloud of Unknowing, and St. John of the Cross without asking questions? What, again, will the average man make of a sentence like this: "Self-mergence is a gradual process, dependent on a progressive unlimiting of personality"? or of the following mysterious statement: "You have begun now the Plotinian ascent from multiplicity to unity, and therefore begin to perceive in the Many the clear and actual presence of the One: the changeless and absolute Life, manifesting itself in all the myriad nascent, crescent, cadent lives"?

We wonder, too, how the average man will regard Miss Underhill's prescription for mystical piety, which may be described bluntly as religion without thinking. She is fascinated by Keats's words: "O for a life of sensations rather than thoughts!" She craves for "absolute sensation," and nothing seems too bad to say about our stupid inclination to use our minds. "The doors of perception," she writes, "are hung with the cobwebs of thought; prejudice, cowardice, sloth. Eternity is with us, inviting our contemplation perpetually, but we are too frightened, lazy, and suspicious to respond; too arrogant to still our thought, and let divine sensation have its way." She even goes the length of suggesting that the lower animals have a better knowledge of Reality than human beings, because their sensations are less subject to "the cooking filtering process of the brain." "Will you suggest," she asks, "that my terrier smelling his way through an unco-ordinated universe, is a better mystic than I?" And the answer comes pat: "To this I reply, that the terrier's contacts with the world are doubtless crude and imperfect; yet he has indeed preserved a directness of apprehension which you have lost. He gets, and responds to, the real smell; not a notion or a name." But why should we not go a step further, and regard a jelly-fish as the best symbol of the soul of man in the act of divine contemplation? There are several other directions in which Miss Underhill is a dangerous guide. A popular book ought to have been careful to emphasize the retention of real moral distinctions within a sane mysticism, and the influence of history in saving the greater Christian mystics from the disasters of fluid emotion is a fact of great importance, which has been entirely overlooked. There are far better guides to the treasures of mystical literature and the secrets of mystical experience than Miss Underhill, writers without her feminine petulance against the intellect, her lack of humour, and the external familiarity with which she treats the whole subject. Let the average man turn to them for information and help. The mysticism of the drawing-room and the literary coterie must always be dead-sea fruit to the Christian soul.

VERHAEREN.

Émile Verhaeren. By Stefan Zweig. London: Constable & Company, Ltd., 6s. net.

THIS study of Verhaeren was well worth translating, and it has appeared at an opportune moment. Hitherto he has been little more than a name to lovers of poetry in this country, and there has been no adequate attempt on the part of an English critic to survey the whole body of his work. A book written in a quieter manner, a little less exuberant and explosive than it is natural to this ardent German disciple to be, would have suited our need better; but it reveals, as a more balanced treatment might have failed to do, the unbounded enthusiasm which his poetry has aroused. To the people of Belgium Verhaeren is a national poet, but his expositor (who hails from Vienna) prefers to regard him as the embodiment of the new European consciousness which is being created by fellowship and a common type of civilization.

"It would be a tempting task," he says, "and full of interest, to set up the Pan-European in antithesis to the Pan-American. But to say that Verhaeren was the first of lyric poets to feel as consciously European as Walt Whitman felt American is to establish his rank among the most considerable men of our time. Verhaeren is possibly the only lyric poet who has felt in accordance with contemporary feeling. That epitomizes his whole claim to gratitude, for it sufficiently expresses the fact that he has taken to his heart the problem of the multitude; the energy of social innovations; the æsthetics of organization; the grandeur of mechanical production; in a word, the poetry of material things. It is our own time, the new age, that speaks in his verse; and it speaks in its new language."

We have quoted this passage because it illustrates the point of view, the anti-romantic realism, which dominates the whole of Herr Zweig's interpretation. It also reveals the reason of the close harmony between the national and the cosmopolitan point of view in Verhaeren's work: He has given to 'Toute la Flandre' an epic value for the world. The towns which he loves and understands are symbols of the places created by the crowd everywhere to be the reservoirs of their skill and the abodes of their toil and sorrow. In another respect also Verhaeren reflects the spirit of modern city life in the value which he attaches to energy and the life of action, as opposed to the meditative calm which he had once touched, but hardly shared, in the cloister.

Lassé des mots, lassé des livres,

Je cherche, en ma fierté,
L'acte qui sauve et qui délivre.

But Verhaeren has other moods. He can confess "Ceux qui vivent d'amour vivent d'éternité"; and some of the most beautiful pages of Herr Zweig's book are devoted to the poems in which he escapes from "les Forces Tumultueuses" into the quiet sanctuary of wedded love. The translation is by Mr. J. Bithell, and is a creditable piece of work considering the serious difficulties of a highly coloured style which he has had to face. No attempt has been made to translate the numerous long quotations from Verhaeren's poetry, though a passage from the German poet Dehmel is honoured with a prose version in English.

ST. CLARE OF ASSISI: HER LIFE AND LEGISLATION. By Ernest Gilliat-Smith. London: J. M. Dent & Sons. 10s. 6d. net.

THERE is room for a good book in English on St. Clare. It is this gap which Mr. Gilliat-Smith has attempted to fill in this learned and argumentative volume. The material for a Life of St. Clare, as the modern biographer understands the term, is scanty, and it is consequently very tempting to fill the empty spaces with digressions upon Franciscan questions generally. This the writer has done, much to the injury of the unity of his book. He is quite as much occupied with his own views of the early history of the Order and his vehement dislike of Protestant admirers of St. Francis as with the life-story of the Seraphic Mother. M. Paul Sabatier in particular comes in for a good deal of severe castigation. He is described as the chief hierophant of the fashionable cultus of St. Francis outside the Church, a phrase which is evidently meant to throw discredit upon his historical work before it has been examined. No doubt some of the judgments which M. Sabatier formed twenty-five years ago require modification, especially in the light of the admirable work of research in which he has been the inspirer and the pioneer; but the tone of petulant disrespect which Mr. Gilliat-Smith adopts towards a scholar who is certainly his equal in learning only throws doubt upon the fairness and sobriety of his own judgments. He swings round to the opposite extreme in his view of the early dissensions in the Order. Brother Leo is represented as the evil genius of St. Francis when he was weak and ill, while Elias of Cortona is extolled as the man raised up by God to continue and consolidate the real work of the founder. In a similar spirit the naive stories of friendship between St. Francis and St. Clare are dismissed as offensive to pious ears with a contemptuous remark about "the morbid writers who provide prose-poems and word-paintings for the cultured admirers of St. Francis who are not of the Household of the Faith." We are afraid that Mr. Gilliat-Smith will find it hard to convince the world that the band of serious scholars outside the Catholic Church who have made a special study of Franciscan origins are trespassers on forbidden ground. We regret these blemishes of taste in a book which contains enough careful scholarship to command attention, even more than the erratic arrangement of its material, the failure to observe a uniform rule about translating Latin quotations, and the absence of an index.

CANDLE AND CRIB. By K. F. Purdon. Illustrated by Beatrice Elvery. Dublin and London: Maunsell & Co. 1s. net.

"THERE is a lot of nature in people, more than they get credit for," some one says in 'The Folk of Furry Farm.' The truth of this homely saying comes out very forcibly in the little volume which Miss Purdon has brought out for the Christmas season. Here we are back again in Ardenoo, among the peasants of County Meath with their warm hearts and delightful speech, entering into their griefs and pleasures as if we had known them all our lives, and quite sharing the feeling that there are joys to be obtained under a thatched roof, if the homemaker is a "notorious Vanithee," not to be exchanged by any but the foolish for the doubtful luxuries purchased so dearly in the Big Smoke (Dublin). This charming little story is just an episode taken from the simple annals of the poor, and if those who read it allow their fancy to play in the region of religious symbolism as they follow Big Michael into the stable where the mother and child (his daughter-in-law and her baby, worn out after a weary walk through the windy bogland) lie on the straw beside the manger, it will be quite in keeping with our Christmas sentiments. Miss Purdon deals with facts of everyday life, and thus reminds us of things which are eternally true—the tenderness of mother-love, the humanising influence of sorrows but partly understood, the gladness of reconciliation when the Christ-child is born in the heart. The coloured illustrations by Miss Beatrice Elvery are delightful, and add greatly to the attractiveness of the volume as a gift-book.

PHILIP IN FUNNYLAND, by Hubert St. Clair (Francis Griffiths, 2s. 6d. net), has evidently been written for those who are foolish enough to wonder whether the Man in the Moon, Margery Daw, Miss Muffet, and the Old Woman who lived in a Shoe ever really existed. Mr. St. Clair makes it very clear that scepticism on the subject is a mistake, and, moreover, if you can contrive to fall asleep at the proper moment, and nobody wakes you for a long time, you will perhaps be taken by Mother Goose in a quite up-to-date aeroplane to a land with an unpronounceable name, where they all foregather to this day. How they employ their time, and the strange company they keep, is described in this amusing book, which is full of "utter nonsense," and therefore points no tiresome moral, and does not even pretend to give instructive information. The pictures by Miss Winifred St. Clair are droll and quaint, and will certainly evoke much laughter from the young readers who are introduced to 'Philip in Funnyland' this Christmas. For many people the fact that Mr. St. Clair and his sister are the son and daughter of the late Rev. George St. Clair will add a touch of personal interest to the book.

WE have received the 'Boys' Own Daily Reminder,' a well-printed calendar with a decorated cover in cheerful yellow, which has been prepared for the members of the Boys' Own Brigade. Each month has its appropriate motto and quotation. The only criticism we would offer is that these are printed twice over in consequence of two pages being given to a month. The result of this repetition, however, may be that the wise maxims and stirring extracts will be more deeply impressed on the mind and taken to heart. We could not desire anything better for the Boys' Own Brigade than that.

'YOUNG DAYS' (The Sunday School Association, 1s. 6d. net) is always full of good things, and a more acceptable present for young readers could hardly be found at this modest price. Stories, pictures, poems, and puzzles, as well as articles intended to give useful information in a pleasant way, and details of Guild work for students in training for useful citizenship later on, are generously provided, and the illustrations form, as usual, an attractive feature. We hope 'Young Days' will find its way into many homes among other gifts on Christmas Day.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE COURAGE OF THE UNARMED.

WE are hearing a great deal about the wonderful bravery of the soldiers and sailors who are fighting for their country at the present time, and we must all feel that, however horrible war may be, there is something splendid in the very recklessness with which these men throw away their lives for something that is dearer to them than life itself. But what of the bravery of those who, unarmed and defenceless, and, very often, in deadly peril, go about on errands of mercy among the poor and destitute in the desolated towns, or minister to the sick and aged, the wounded and the dying? Many stories have already reached us of the heroism and devotion of the clergy who are with the armies in the field. A French soldier tells us of one who quite calmly stood on an earthwork in full sight of the enemy reading a prayer to the battalion "amid a very hail of bullets." This particular priest does not appear to have been hurt, but many have been killed, some just at the very moment when they were whispering words of comfort to a poor fellow with but a few minutes, perhaps, to live. Two priests protected with their own lives some wounded Germans who tried to leave the Cathedral of Rheims while it was being bombarded a few weeks ago. A fierce crowd met them outside, for the people were roused to the bitterest wrath as they watched what seemed like the complete destruction of their beautiful Cathedral. "A mort!" they cried as they caught sight of the stricken creatures. "Let us kill them!" "If you do," said the priests, "you must kill us first." Rifles were raised, but no shots were fired, and although a few of the men who tried to escape another way were caught, the larger number of them were taken to a place of safety without a hair of their heads being injured.

Inside the Cathedral a band of nuns was attending to the wounded Germans lying there on the straw—their enemies, remember—when the bombardment began. What did they do? What could they do, these devoted followers of Christ, but kneel and pray by the side of the poor souls who, like themselves, looked for death every moment? One account says that some of these nuns tried to get the men out of the building, and were struck down as they did so. Another writer says that he saw four lying dead on the floor of the Cathedral when he entered it, with the flames leaping up and the falling glass crashing about them. Noble sisters were they of Joan of Arc who crowned her King within those very walls, and was herself destined to die at the stake rather than deny the angel voices which had called her to do God's bidding.

Then there was Sœur Julie of Gerbéville. She too was nursing the sick and wounded, and she too went on doing her duty in perfect calmness though the town was bombarded three times, absolutely refusing to leave her post, though the French officers implored her to go with them when they were obliged to abandon the defence.

The doctors and nurses, too—when will the story of all their bravery and devotion be told? Upon these a very special responsibility rests, as upon the Sisters of Mercy, for their work has none of the dash and glory about it which excites the soldier and warms his blood as he goes into an engagement. They must keep cool whatever happens, for the sake of their patients; their eyes must be fearless, even smiling; and their hands must not tremble, though others may be unnerved and on the verge of panic. They must be ready, though roofs crash in and houses are set on fire, to give food to those in their charge, or soothe them with gentle words, making sure that they lack no comfort which they can provide. There are many other stories of personal bravery and unselfishness during this great war which might be set down here if time permitted, and how many more are there of which we shall never hear—which will never be known at all save to God? L. G. A.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MRS. C. J. SPENCE.

It is with deep regret that we have to record the death of Mrs. C. J. Spence, which took place on Monday, December 7, as the result of an accident.

Born in 1868, youngest daughter of the late Charles Weiss of Huddersfield and Caroline Weiss of Hampstead, she spent her schooldays in Heidelberg and Neuchâtel. On the return of her family to England, Lily Weiss entered as a student at Bedford College. At first with her family she was attached to Rosslyn Hill Chapel, but later she came under the influence of Dr. Stopford Brooke at Bedford Chapel. Dr. Stopford Brooke's teaching—his insistence on practical Christianity—appealed to her, and to these days we can trace the beginning of that desire to serve others which was to the last a dominant characteristic. The Honor Club for Girls gave her an opportunity for social work, and for some time she acted as an Assistant Secretary of the Postal Mission. In 1892, the appointment of her brother, F. E. Weiss, to the Chair of Botany at Manchester University brought her to the Northern town, where for some years she was her brother's companion. During these years she came in close touch with many of the most vigorous minds then in the University, and formed lasting friendships. In 1899 she married Mr. C. J. Spence of North Shields, a near relative of the late Dr. Spence Watson, and, like him, a member of the Society of Friends. Six years of perfect happiness followed. Her husband was deeply interested in all that was live on Tyne-side—politics, social questions, education and art—and through him and his relatives Mrs. Spence found her youthful enthusiasms widened and deepened. After his death in 1905 she returned to Manchester and became a resident in the University Settlement at Ancoats. Her neighbours were in want of many things, but most of all they were in want of friendly human sympathy and understanding. Mrs. Spence strove to supply this want. With delicate tact, a ready ear for the difficulties and troubles of others, and a cheery presence, which hid from the outside world her own grief and loneliness, she offered her help. Material assistance was often sorely needed by those amongst whom she spent her days, and such help she gave freely, though it was characteristic of her to use other hands as the medium for her gifts. She gave herself; weary and broken souls came to her and went away comforted, refreshed, and cheered. For several years she had resided at Cheadle, but to the end she maintained her active interest in the poor of the city. It was a never-failing pleasure to her to entertain in her house and garden, and for many people Cheadle Old Hall has been the friendliest of havens.

In politics Mrs. Spence was a Liberal by tradition and training, but the failure of present-day Liberalism to make headway with some urgent social questions, particularly those affecting the status and welfare of women, had weakened her enthusiasm for the party. Although she had much sympathy with Labour hopes, she hesitated to throw in her lot with the Labour Party, fearing that its members did not sufficiently value individual gifts and qualities. But in politics, as in religion, she had learnt to care little for dogmas. She was not afraid to make mistakes, and to learn from failure. Of the deeper experiences of the soul she spoke seldom and with great diffidence. But those who knew her intimately felt not that she had seen God, but that she saw Him always. She moved among her fellow-men with a quiet eagerness to serve, so constant and unresting as to have been impossible without divine stimulus and support. On the day of her death the calendar in her room bore this quotation from Lord Bryce, which expresses what her friends feel under their immediate sense of loss and bewilderment: "What more can we desire for our friends than this—that in remembering them there should be nothing to regret, that all who came under their influence should feel themselves for ever thereafter the better for that influence."

MR. N. M. TAYLER.

MR. NATHANIEL MANNING TAYLER suddenly and quietly passed away at his home at Ranelagh Gardens, Barnes, on December 14, at the advanced age of 85. Born June 15, 1829, son of Stephen Tayler, grandson of Wager Tayler, who was a brother of James Tayler (the father of John James Tayler), Nathaniel Tayler was a member of a family well known and honoured among Unitarians. For many years Mr. Tayler, like his late brother Mr. S. S. Tayler, was closely identified with Stamford Street Chapel, Southwark. He held the office of treasurer for a quarter of a century. On removing to a greater distance, Mr. Tayler took an earnest interest in the religious services at the newly-formed congregation at Richmond, and also at Wandsworth. He was elected a representative of the Stamford Street congregation on the Presbyterian Board in 1875, and he continued to hold office up to the time of his death. Mr. Tayler was at all times greatly interested in movements affecting the welfare and progress of mankind. He formed his own opinions on most questions, and held to them courageously. Discouragement, or criticism never daunted him. He was always eager in the pursuit of what he deemed wise and good in the field of economics, as well as of politics and religion. However much one might disagree with his line of argument, no one could doubt the transparent sincerity of his mind and the purity and uprightness of his motives. During his later years he frequently suffered from ill-health; but he was always cheerful and buoyant, considerate and kind.

Mr. Tayler was in business in the City for a number of years; but the qualities required for making money he never professed to cultivate; and he was evidently glad to be rid of the burden as soon as he possibly could. He married in 1867 Marion Wright, a woman of strong and beautiful character; and their home and family life was delightful to behold. Mrs. Nathanael Tayler died several years ago, after a long and trying illness. There were three sons and a daughter, all of whom survive their parents. The eldest, Mr. Athelstane A. Tayler, is secretary of Stamford Street Chapel and Blackfriars Mission; the youngest, Dr. John Lionel Tayler, is minister of Newington Green Chapel; the second son, Mr. Stephen Tayler, is a Labour Exchange official. The only daughter, Miss Mary Tayler, has tended with a rare devotion, first her mother, then her father for many years past.

The funeral service at West Norwood on December 18 was conducted by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, a former minister at Stamford Street Chapel, and an intimate friend of the family circle.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE PROTECTION OF NATIVE RACES.

AN AMERICAN SOCIETY.

THE ANTI-SLAVERY AND ABORIGINES PROTECTION SOCIETY has received information from the Rev. Herbert Johnson of Boston, U.S.A., that a Society has just been formed there for the protection of aboriginal races, more particularly those of the two Americas. This is the outcome of a recent visit to America by Sir Harry H. Johnston, G.C.M.G., who, on behalf of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society, of which he is a Vice-President, sought, by means of conferences as well as private conversations with prominent Americans in different cities of the Union, to promote the formation of a similar Society in the States. He addressed a large public meeting at the First Baptist Church at Boston, arranged for him by Mr. Johnson, its minister, who has been very active in the movement, at which representatives of the Roman Catholic and other religious bodies were present. Among other meetings, Sir Harry Johnston had an encouraging reception from the professors and students of Clark University (Worcester) and Yale. On visiting Canada he found many persons in Toronto and Ottawa ready to take up the idea.

The Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society has long felt the urgent need of an organization in the United States like its own with which it could co-operate, and to which it could appeal to inform and concentrate public opinion in America on native race questions, and to approach its Government thereon. This need has been especially felt since the revelation of the cruelties in the Putumayo drew attention to the widespread conditions of debt slavery over large portions of South America, and its appalling results. Dr. Stanley Hall, Principal of Clark University, who is well known on both sides of the Atlantic as an authority on practical anthropology, has consented to be President of the new Society.

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

REPORT OF THE SEASON'S WORK.

THE ninth season of the Van Mission opened as usual in the middle of May. Tours were arranged as follows: No. 1 Van, Tredegar via Hereford to Birmingham; No. 2 Van, Gainsborough via Doncaster to Elland; No. 3 Van, London district; No. 4 Van, Wigan via Chester and Llandudno to Carnarvon, and back to Llangollen.

With promises of ministerial assistance (including that of one American and one Canadian minister), and with the co-operation of the Pioneer Preachers and the London Lay-Preachers (for the London district), it was possible to announce a programme providing visits for about seventy centres.

The Mission met with much success until the outbreak of war interrupted the work. Results warranted the belief that the season would not fall short of the record of earlier years. With the exception of the meetings in the No. 2 district, anticipations had been more than fulfilled. This Van, however, did well among a widely scattered population, which in the places it visited amounted to not more than 80,000 people. At Wath-on-Dearne, after a fortnight's mission, a meeting was held for the purpose of forming a society. In the neighbouring village of Highgate, entirely destitute of religious or social agencies, it was intended, with the co-operation of the Sheffield Society, to found a mission, and an appeal by the Missionary Agent produced a promise of £50 and some smaller sums for the provision of a hall. The work, however, in both places is postponed for the present.

In South Wales an unusually interesting series of meetings was held at Tredegar, where the Van remained for five weeks, gathering every evening meetings of from 200 to 500 people. The missionary-in-charge, the Rev. A. Amey, on several subsequent Sunday evenings returned to Tredegar to conduct the service. A society was formed, and is now affiliated with the South-East Wales Unitarian Society. Scarcely less interest was occasioned at Abertillery, where week evening lectures are being continued by the Rev. W. T. Lucan Davies and Mrs. Davies, of Newport, Mon.

In London the meetings were successful in each centre.

No. 4 Van, after several weeks in Lancashire and Cheshire, with particularly good meetings at Wigan and Runcorn and Chester, was touring the North Wales towns and seaside resorts under an arrangement with the Liverpool District Association. A notable week's work was done at Holywell by the Rev. D. J. Evans. The Van reached Llandudno at the end of July.

Two hundred and fifty meetings had been held before the outbreak of war, with an attendance of over 50,000.

At the close of the Mission the Vans were offered for the period of the war to the British Red Cross Society for hospital or ambulance purposes. The offer was gratefully acknowledged, but owing to the more than sufficient supply of motor ambulances no use could then be found for the vans, which, however, remain at the disposal of the Society in case of need. The Caravan Society has also been advised that the Vans are available.

The Mission has lost in the late Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence one of its most generous supporters. With Sir John Brunner he presented a van in 1908, and had liberally contributed to its support since that time.

The Mission has cost just over £650, which is about £170 less than last year. This figure includes all salaries, travelling, road charges and repairs, ministerial supplies, maintenance, and literature. Between December 1 and the end of the year it will be necessary to raise over £200 in order to avoid loss, and the Missionary Agent appeals to all who have hitherto contributed to the funds to assist.

Donations should be sent to the Rev. T. P. SPEDDING, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

ESSEX HALL WAR DISTRESS FUND.

CLOTHING DEPARTMENT.

OUR readers will be interested to learn that upwards of twelve hundred garments have been cut out at Essex Hall, and made up by members of our Churches and Missions, and in some cases by paid labour, to assist women out of work owing to the War. The garments have included a large number of men's shirts and of women and children's under-clothing. The material was purchased and paid for out of the Essex Hall War Distress Fund. The garments have been distributed among Belgian refugees at various centres in London, and a large consignment was forwarded to distressed Belgians in Holland. Indian soldiers have had several parcels. Individual Austrians, Belgians, Germans, and Hungarians resident in London, who were in want of clothing, were assisted from time to time. A few of our own Unitarian poor have also been helped in this way.

Among the women workers (in addition to several individuals) who have made up a great many garments, special mention should be made of the churches at Ilford, Kentish Town, Lewisham, Peckham, and Wandsworth, and the Missions at Bell Street and Dingley Place. Miss Knight and Miss Seymour, the Sisters at Forest Gate, Stratford, and Walthamstow, have been very active. The congregation at Tenderden has also busied itself making up many articles for distribution through Essex Hall.

The work at Essex Hall will be suspended during the Christmas holidays, as most people are busily engaged with domestic and local duties. It will be resumed early in January, when Mrs. Bowje, Mrs. Pearson, and Mrs. Spedding, who are in charge, will welcome additional helpers. Essex Hall is only intended to provide opportunities for humane service for those who are not already fully occupied with work at their own local centres. Most appreciative letters have been received from the various recipients of gifts of clothing.

NEWS FROM HUNGARY.

THE REV. F. HANKINSON received a few days ago a long letter from Miss Rosika Boros from Kolozsvár. Her English friends will be glad to know that she reached home safely by way of Holland and Vienna, at which latter place her mother met her. She reported that her father, Prof. Boros, and other members of the family were well. Kolozsvár itself was quiet and undisturbed by actual warfare. Bishop Ferencz was very well indeed. Warm gratitude was expressed for the kindness shown to Miss Boros and to other Hungarians in England. The news had reached his family that Mr. Balazs Létay, who will be remembered as attending Unitarian meetings in London and the services at Kentish Town, was killed. Mr. Létay was a brilliant student, being engaged in the study of Assyrian and Babylonian history at the British Museum when the war in Austria broke out; he hurried home to Hungary at the beginning of August to take his place in the battlefield. He feared he might never return to London; and so left minute instructions with Mr. Hankinson what to do with his books and personal property in the event of his death.

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

THE REV. GORDON COOPER writes from the Parsonage, Mansford Street, Bethnal Green, E. :-

"Several of your readers have already sent me their subscriptions to the Poor's Purse and the Christmas Fund at the Mansford Street Mission—for which I am very grateful. May I remind other friends, old and new, that I shall be very glad to receive further donations, which this Christmas will be more than usually welcome. I should like to thank an unknown friend at Eastbourne for a contribution which I have received to-day."

MISS REDFERN writes from the Mission House, Willert Street, Collyhurst, Manchester, appealing for funds to help the workers at the Mission, which is at present without a settled minister to carry on the agencies which have been in existence for so many years. The War has greatly increased their difficulties, and rendered the problem of poverty more acute; but this makes it all the more urgent that everything should be done to make Christmas as bright as possible, especially for the children. Miss Redfern will undertake to distribute any money, clothing, &c., that may be sent to her.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Carmarthen: Presbyterian College.—At a recent meeting the Managers of the Presbyterian Board had placed before them an interesting return showing the number of students passing through the College and the number who have secured permanent ministerial settlements. The figures for the period 1900 to 1909 are as follows: Number admitted, 94; number settled in the ministry, 87; of the remainder, 2 are still at the College, having taken up the Advanced Theological Course; 2 are occasional preachers, without pastoral charge; 2 have died, and 1 is invalided. These figures are a striking practical testimony to the work the College does in fitting young men for the actual work of the Christian ministry, and give a record of which the College authorities may justly feel proud.

Chowbent.—In response to the urgent appeal we printed a fortnight ago, we are glad to hear that Chowbent Chapel and School—out of money mainly raised by the young people—have this week sent £70 worth of suitable winter clothing of all kinds for the 25,000 lost and orphan Belgian children now in Holland to Mrs. Aves, 12, Thurlow Road, Hampstead, N.W.

Evesham.—The Rev. H. H. Johnson was inducted into the ministry of Oat Street Chapel on December 10th, when the Rev. Joseph Wood gave the Charge to the minister, and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas that to the congregation. The service was of a most impressive nature, and will remain a cherished memory. There were appropriate hymns, readings, collects, and prayers, the only break from the ordinary free service being the Charges and the following Benediction, which the Rev. Joseph Wood pronounced over the newly appointed minister: "The God of Peace, that great Shepherd of the sheep, make thee perfect in every good work to do His will, working in thee that which is well pleasing in His sight, through Jesus Christ, to whom be glory for ever and ever." The early part of the service was taken by Mr. Thomas, the latter part by Mr. Wood, the minister of the chapel pronouncing the closing Benediction. There was no welcome of a social nature, both minister and congregation preferring the religious service only.

Leeds: Hunslet.—A special gathering of teachers, scholars, and worshippers was held in the Schoolroom of the Hunslet Unitarian Church on Sunday afternoon, December 13. During the service the pastor, the Rev. Frank Coleman, unveiled and dedicated a beautiful memorial portrait of the Rev. Horace Ruskin Tavenor, who was minister from 1911 to 1913. Mr. Thornton delivered an appropriate address, eulogizing

Mr. Tavenor's work here and at Manchester, and urging the scholars ever to keep in mind his cheering personality, and to hold fast to the good he had always taught them. Mr. James Woffindin, Secretary of the Sunday School, also spoke of the good work Mr. Tavenor had accomplished in the school. The portrait is a duplicate of that at Willert Street Mission, Manchester, and has been presented to the Church by teachers and scholars of the school in whom Mr. Tavenor always took a very great interest.

Loughborough.—On December 13 and 14 we celebrated the fiftieth Anniversary of our occupation of the present Church buildings. The preacher on Sunday, December 13, was the Rev. C. M. Wright, M.A., of Mansfield. On Monday evening there was a congregational meeting, at which there was a good attendance, including many friends from Leicester and Nottingham. The Rev. E. I. Fripp was in the chair, and the speakers included Ald. Wm. Moss, Mr. E. Wilford (President of the N.M.P. & U. Association), Mr. J. T. Perry, and the Revs. J. Ballantyne and S. Spencer.

Southern Unitarian Association.—On Monday evening, December 14, a Special Service of Recognition was held in the Hill Street Chapel, Poole, to welcome the Rev. H. Maguire, B.Sc., of Wareham, as a fully accredited minister. Mr. Maguire was formerly connected with the Stratford congregation in East London, and of recent years, while engaged in his profession as a teacher at Poole, has been active as a lay-preacher in the district. During the past year he has been in charge of the Wareham congregation, and, having passed the final examination under the National Conference Scheme for the training of lay workers, has received the recognition of the Southern Advisory Committee. The service on Monday evening was conducted by the Rev. W. B. Matthews, of Poole, the lessons being read by the Rev. V. D. Davis. The Rev. H. S. Solly, President of the Southern Association, gave the address of welcome into the ministry, and Mr. Maguire made an earnest response. The evening unfortunately was very stormy, but Bournemouth and Wareham, as well as Poole, were represented in the congregation that assembled. It was a quiet and helpful service, which fully justified the purpose for which it was held.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE AWAKENING OF EUROPE.

In a recent sermon preached at the Unitarian Church, Wandsworth, and printed in the East Hill Pulpit, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant pleaded that if War is to be abolished it will be necessary for the peoples as a whole to realize fully the insanity of it, and for the Churches of Europe to make up their minds what they actually stand for. "The need of the hour," he said, "is for stalwart men in many fields, and surely not least in the field where the victories are won for all—not for one party or for one nation. From time to time one nation has been, and may be again, the enemy of another; but war as an institution is the enemy of the human race. Let us admit that in these days there has seemed no way open before us but that of war; but let us not forget that after the hour of violence the hours of reconstruction must come. We were born, let us believe, and maintain, for better things than this wrath and ruin. The real needs of man go deeper than greed. The breath of a higher life is in his nostrils. Men who have not yet 'come to themselves' may go on feeding swine and filling their bellies with husks; but when they become aware of what they are they want better food to feed their souls upon. Justice, order, beauty—these Man must have, or Man will perish."

LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY IN JAPAN.

A COPY of the Far East which has just reached us contains, among other illustrations, a group photographed in the garden of the Sanyen-tei, Tokyo, on the occasion of the twenty fifth anniversary of the founding of the Unitarian Mission in Japan. On Tuesday, November 3, a dinner was given in honour of Dr. Clay MacCauley, who went to Japan as the representative of the Liberal Christians of New England in 1889, and has been carrying on a successful work there, with but one short interval, ever since. On the following Saturday and Sunday services were held in the Unitarian Church, about 300 persons being present, when Dr. MacCauley in an interesting speech described the growth of the movement, referring to the pioneer work of the Rev. A. M. Knapp, the devoted, though all too brief services rendered by the Rev. W. I. Lawrence, and the difficulties which had to be met and surmounted in the early days. The gathering at the dinner numbered about sixty, and included many representative men, professors of the Imperial University and the Military Staff College, and members of other missions in Tokyo.

WOMEN DOCTORS AND THE WAR.

Dr. Mary Scharlieb has been urging the necessity for a greater number of women training as doctors, not only to meet emergencies like the present, but in order to supply the needs of missionary and other societies which are suffering from the inability to obtain sufficient medical women to staff their hospitals. The medical profession offers a great sphere of usefulness for women of education and ability, and it has this advantage, that those who wish to qualify for it need not necessarily be very young. The more mature woman has certain qualifications for the task by reason of her trained mind and experience of life which cannot be possessed by the youthful student, though her verbal memory may not be so strong. Prof. Howard Marsh in a letter to The Times warmly endorses all that Mrs. Scharlieb says, and expresses the hope that her words will be interpreted in a liberal spirit. Even before the war, he says, it was becoming more and more difficult to procure resident medical officers at many institutions, and hard-worked practitioners have often lost their annual holiday because they could not secure a locum tenens. So many doctors are now at the front, and, unhappily, the losses in their ranks have already been so heavy, that the shortage is becoming still more serious. Next year it will be even greater, while, if the war goes on, the demand for doctors in the Army Medical Service must steadily increase. Prof. Marsh believes that women ought to take advantage of this great opportunity, which opens up before them a new epoch.

THE RIVIERA IN WAR TIME.

The winter resorts on the Riviera, which are hopelessly deserted as a result of the war, are so greatly crippled already in their resources that the deputies representing the Department and the Communes of the Alpes Maritimes have gone to lay their woes before the Government at Bordeaux. From Cannes to the frontier of Italy, says the special correspondent in The Times, the impression is created of a gorgeously mounted scene waiting for the players to come on and the play to begin. The dainty villas are empty, the harbours seem to be waiting for the yachts that do not come, and the purple clematis and golden fruit give an insistent note of life and colour to gardens and terraces where nobody walks. Nice is a hospital centre, the principal hotels having been requisitioned at the beginning of the war for Red Cross purposes; but although 4,000 beds are in use the number is rapidly diminishing, owing to the fact that the Paris hospitals are now receiving the wounded. The losses sustained by these winter resorts along the Côte d'Azur can be dimly realised when we learn that the number of strangers registered as transient guests of the Principality of Monaco alone last year was close on 1,800,000. Nice and Mentone are much frequented by Germans, the number of whom last year was estimated at 40,000.

THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION.

One of the inevitable results of the war is the postponement of the proposed meeting of the British Association which was to have been held in Manchester next year. It is doubtful whether it will be possible now to carry out the arrangements already planned, and, in any case, all preparations for the meeting have been suspended until the middle of March, when a final decision will be made.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE send our Christmas greetings to our readers amid the anxieties of the War. There was never more need of the spirit of generosity and kindness than there is to-day, and it has been called forth in our midst in an unexampled degree. We may all thank God that we can help and serve. The spirit of love and self-sacrifice shines even through the horrors of the battlefield. We cannot see how this dread experience through which we are passing can be overruled for the good of the world; but it is clear, even to our limited sight, that everything which we do with a pure motive, not with malice and anger in our hearts, but in the unselfish desire to uphold the good and defend the right, must strengthen the forces which make for peace and goodwill among men.

* * *

The most significant event of the past week is the announcement that Egypt has been made into a British Protectorate. This step has been rendered necessary by the War. The Turkish suzerainty, which has been a source of much mischief, and encouraged the Khedive in a policy of intrigue and reaction, has been swept away, and there is now for the first time a fair chance for enlightened methods of government. The spirit in which we are prepared to face our new task—the burden of which we have borne for a long time—is expressed admirably in the words of the official communication, which has been addressed to Prince Hussein, who has succeeded to the Khedivial position with the title and style of the "Sultan of Egypt":—

In the field of internal administration I am to remind your Highness that in consonance with the traditions of British policy it has been the aim of His Majesty's Government, while working through, and in the closest association with, the constituted Egyptian authorities, to secure individual liberty, to promote the spread of education, to further the development of the natural resources of the country, and, in such measure as the degree of enlightenment of public opinion may permit, to associate the governed in the task of government. Not only is it the intention of His Majesty's Government to remain faithful to such policy, but they are convinced that the clearer definition of Great Britain's position in the country will accelerate progress towards self-government.

THERE is no reason why any reasonable people should suspect the good faith of our Government in this momentous action. We did not intend to stay in Egypt when the disorders of the country first forced us to intervene, and for many years we have borne the heavy task of administration in face of the difficulties created by an anomalous position. Circumstances have changed since 1882. Turkey—which was rotten then—is more rotten now. The condominium has shown itself to be fatal to the impartial administration of justice and the proper development of the resources of the country. We could not renounce our responsibilities without gross unfairness to the people. But the most important factor in the situation is this: that the proclamation of a protectorate has been hailed with satisfaction by the Egyptians themselves, though doubtless there will be some malcontents. Mohammed Wahid, chief of the Egyptian Liberal party, has sent the following message, which reflects the temper of happy expectancy which seems to be prevalent in Cairo:—

In the name of the Egyptian Liberal party and of humanity, I thank Great Britain for its deliverance of Egypt from the chains of a tyrannous rule and for its establishment of a Protectorate. This Protectorate the Liberal party welcomes with a joy I cannot express. It realizes the desire which for long years the party has formulated in its programmes and declarations. Egypt passes from the hell of tyranny to the heaven of justice.

* * *

THE Government has taken a wise course in appointing a Special Committee, which will examine the accusations of outrage and breaches of the laws of war on the part of Germany since the outbreak of hostilities. The presence of Viscount Bryce and Sir Frederick Pollock on this Committee is itself a guarantee of public confidence, and will give judicial weight to its verdicts in America and other neutral countries. It will also perform the very useful function of discrediting mere rumour and rebuking the inclination of weak minds to accept hideous stories without evidence. For ourselves, we have never paid much attention to the sporadic tales of personal atrocities, though it is probable that some of them are true. It is the policy of burning and outrage—which has been adopted with official deliberation, and openly confessed by Germany—that stares us in the face, and cannot be dismissed from our thoughts. In face of this crime against civilization all other atrocities sink away into insignificance.

* * *

THE position on these difficult and painful matters, which we have maintained all along, is supported by an admirable letter by Mr. George Haven Putnam on 'German Misdeeds,' which appeared in The Times on Tuesday. Mr. Putnam is, of course, an American citizen, and an old soldier of the Civil War, and readers of his recent 'Memories' will recollect that he has also many reasons for regarding the Germany of his student days with partiality and affection.

In the several letters that I have brought into print [he writes] I have carefully avoided reference to the so-called individual "atrocities." My criticisms, and those of Americans generally, who are in a position to judge impartially in regard to the issues of the war, have been restricted to the official acts which have attended the devastation of Belgium and the destruction of cathedrals and towns in France. We condemn these acts, not because they have been committed by Germany, but because they are in themselves abominable, and are contrary to precedent and to civilized standards. As an old soldier, and as a student of the history of campaigns, I have some knowledge of war regulations, and of the procedure of civilized countries. I maintain the contention that unless or until a city is under siege (and the notice of siege is, of course, a caution to citizens to withdraw as far as such withdrawal is possible), the throwing of bombs into groups of unarmed people, men, women, and children, is not warfare in any present use of the term. The killing of these unoffending people can, of course, have no effect whatsoever upon the success or the direction of the campaign; and if this be the case, such killing is properly to be characterized as murder.

* * *

THERE is a legitimate feeling of pride and satisfaction in the success of the appeal of the former German Consul at Sunderland against his conviction for treason. We know nothing about Mr. Ahlers. He may have acted worse than foolishly and be quite unworthy of sympathy or respect. What we mean is this, that it is a salutary lesson for us all, and especially for people who are inclined to let excitement warp their judgment, to find that the administration of justice will not swerve a hair'sbreadth from its integrity under the influence of popular passion. Men of German blood can be tried as fairly in our courts as our own countrymen. They need not fear that racial prejudice will tell against them. This is of the essence of justice. It is one of the elementary obligations of honour. We hope that the incident will be duly marked by the best minds in Germany.

* * *

THERE is something very noble and dignified in the words with which General Botha pleads that, now the rebellion in South Africa is over, nothing should be said or done to increase the feeling of bitterness. Let the curtain be rung down, he says, with as little declamation, as little controversy, and as little recrimination as possible. "For myself, personally," he confesses, "the last three months have provided the saddest experience of all my life. I can say the same for General Smuts, and, indeed, for every member of the Government. The late war, our South African War, is but a thing of yesterday. You will understand my feelings, and the feelings of the loyal commandos, when among the rebel dead and wounded we found from time to time men who had fought in our ranks during the dark days of that campaign. The loyal commandos have had a hard task to perform, and they have performed it. The cause of law and order has been, and will be, vindicated. Let that be enough. This is no time for exultation or for recrimination. Let us spare one another's feelings. Remember, we have to live together in this land long after the war is ended."

* * *

At the meeting held in the Queen's Hall last week in support of Women's Work in War Time, Prof. Gilbert Murray revealed once again his capacity for dealing with the situation with courage and directness. His close association with wounded soldiers made him conscious, he said, that the demand now made was especially a demand for that old-fashioned, unspecialized form of service which women had rendered to men in the time of need ever since the beginning of recorded history. We were getting a touch of that primitive state of society in which the men were fighting and the business of the women was to love and pray. Young men were going out to the war. One after another he saw them go—his own pupils, friends, not rowdy and violent men looking out for adventure, but men who were gentle and kindly—happy men, contented men, young men with long lives before them—offering to die for him and them. "That is a thing that haunts me [he said], and when I say it is our business to love and pray, I mean in general that we are to remember that. Let us remember what they are doing, and let us be able when they return to look them in the face."

* * *

THE quality of life, Prof. Murray continued, had become older, more primitive, and deeper. He felt that there was more evil in it and more good, that it was more filled with terror and cruelty and death, and at the same time more filled with love and loyalty. We had to resist emotion and be strong. At the same time, there was a deeper emotion moving all about us. We had moved away from an easy, polite, superficial world, in which people were habitually a little apt to be vexed with their colleagues and bored with their near relatives, into a world in which the tears came into men's eyes when they spoke of their comrades in the trenches, or heard messages from their people at home. He was hoping that in the future, when they looked back on the time of this great war, there would be a link that would not break, some little shadow everywhere of the feeling that might exist between two people who had looked together into the face of death, and who had smiled because they felt that each could trust the other.

* * *

THESE words of Prof. Murray seem to us much wiser, and they deal with the situation in a far nobler spirit, than the foolish attempts which are made in some quarters to prove that one class or sect is more patriotic than another. Rivalry in good works is excellent, but not when it leads the Churchman to crow over the Nonconformist in matters like recruiting which are truly national. Since the days of Cromwell there has not been so much Puritan blood in the army as at present. Nonconformist churches and Sunday Schools all over the country have sent their young men to fight for freedom and defend their homes. The new officers, too, have been drawn, in an unprecedented degree, from simple middle-class surroundings. Ministers who have been outside military and governing circles all their lives have encouraged their sons to help to staff the new army. Already these men are introducing a new spirit. There will be less snobbery and extravagance, and more industry and alertness of mind in professional duties, when the war is over. For this we shall have to thank these days of national crisis first of all; but some credit will also be due to the influence of the new men who have not been bred in the tradition that in politics and religion and social habits there is only one way of thinking, and one rigid standard of correct behaviour.

CHRISTMAS, 1914.

CHRISTMAS DAY this year will be remembered by most of us as the strangest we have known. There is no merriment in our hearts. There is little stir of excitement in the streets. We have gone dutifully about our ordinary work up to the last moment, hardly realizing that the great festival is at hand. In many homes the family circle will be broken, and anxiety sit as spectre at the feast. Would it not be better, we are tempted to ask, to let the day slip past unmarked, without the sound of rejoicing and the familiar symbols of kindness and good cheer? Can we really thank God for the blessings of the Prince of Peace, or dwell with loving delight upon the pleasures of home and memory?

Many elements enter into our ordinary thought of Christmas. Some of them are purely Christian, and touch the deepest affections of the soul; others are concerned with feasting and good-fellowship, and appeal to us chiefly because they are human and pleasant. Many of us are strongly attached to our ancestral Christmas customs, and pay little heed to the divine glory with which they have been brought into intimate connection. If this year the Feast is less lavish and magnificent, we shall do well to think with all the deeper affection of its religious meaning. The words "Unto you is born this day a Saviour which is Christ the Lord" are good tidings of great joy to lonely hearts and sorrowful homes, to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death. When we celebrate his birth, we thank God not only for the heavenly teacher of the beatitudes, but also for the Man of Sorrows who died and conquered on the cross. "They shall call his name Emmanuel," because God is with us, a living presence in our hearts, a light to guide our stumbling feet, tender, compassionate, and very pitiful, when He makes us to lie down in the green pastures and leads us by the water of comfort, and when His yoke is heavy upon us, and we go forth to face the terrors of the dark valley. Let the prayers and thanksgivings of Christmas Day deepen within us the sense of a present God, who will never fail us or forsake us.

But with this deeper note there should blend our special acts of homage to the Christ-Child. When their security is threatened, our homes become more sacred to us. In contrast to the carnage of war and the havoc of human hate the spirit of childhood shines with a heavenly radiance. We do well to snatch one day from all the evil and trouble which beset us, and to consecrate it to the simple and holy things with which God is well pleased. Our hearts will be stronger to endure for their refreshing influence. Have not many of us in these recent days thanked God, as we have never done before, for the innocency of little children and the heaven which lies about their infancy? The prattle of a little child, musical with laughter and confiding trust, has recalled us to a better mind, and awakened thoughts which do often lie too deep for tears.

And if ever it is good to remember on Christmas Day, it is good that it should be a day of holy and happy memories this year. We need to remember, not only to give us confidence, but also to set life in a true perspective at a time when we are troubled and oppressed. If this war is a real thing in our experience, intruding its hideous imagery upon our most private thoughts, and smiting our affections with its cruelty, there are a thousand other things laid up in our hearts which are just as real,—days of victory and peace, consecrated to the joys of human fellowship; hours of high endeavour, when righteousness triumphed visibly before our eyes. Memory is one of the divine powers of the soul by which we lay hold upon God. For we discover God, not merely in the storm of to-day or the threatening cloud of yesterday, but in the slow discipline of his love, the gradual unfolding of his purpose, the rich tokens of his presence and his power, through all the days of all the years. By memory we reach back to touch the hand of Christ, and in the act we know that his life and spirit are not a dream of the past, for there has never been a moment when their vital power has failed, and it is living in us now. And so, as we remember, all the mightiest influences for good which the world has ever known are quickened in our hearts.

Confidence is renewed, trust is confirmed, our love of spiritual things is replenished, the spectres of doubt are driven from the mind, and we are more than conquerors through Him who loved us and gave himself for us. "The Lord is King, be the people never so impatient: He sitteth between the cherubim, be the earth never so unquiet." And the God who reigns is also the God who loves. This is the good news of Christmas Day for all who remember and give God thanks.

Love is and was my King and Lord,
And will be, though as yet I keep Within His court on earth, and sleep
Encompass'd by his faithful guard,

And hear at times a sentinel
Who moves about from place to place
And whispers to the worlds of space,
In the deep night, that all is well.

Good Thoughts for Ebil Times.

LOVE is indeed Heaven upon Earth: since Heaven itself would not be Heaven without it....What we Love, we'll Hear; what we Love, we'll Trust; and what we Love, we'll Serve, ay, and Suffer for too. If you love Me (says our Blessed Redeemer) keep My Commandments. Why? Why, then He'll Love us; then we shall be His Friends; then He'll send us the Comforter; then whatsoever we ask, we shall receive; and then where He is we shall be also, and that for ever....Love is above all; and when it prevails in us all, we shall all be Lovely, and in Love with God and one with another. Amen.

TRUE RELIGION.

THERE are but too many Christians who would consecrate their vices, and hallow their corrupt affections, whose rugged humour, and sullen pride must pass for Christian severity, whose fierce wrath, and bitter rage against their enemies must be called holy zeal, whose petulancy towards their superiors, or rebellion against their governors must have the name of Christian courage and resolution. But certainly religion is quite another thing, and they who are acquainted with it will entertain far different thoughts, and will disdain all those shadows and false imitations of it. They know by experience that true religion is an union of the soul with God, a real participation of the divine nature, the very image of God drawn upon the soul, or in the Apostle's phrase, it is Christ formed within us. Briefly, I know not how the nature of religion can be more fully expressed than by calling it a divine life.

PEACE.

My soul, there is a country
Far beyond the stars,
Where stands a winged sentry,
All skilful in the wars;
There above noise, and danger,
Sweet Peace sits crown'd with smiles,
And One born in a manger
Commands the beauteous files.
He is thy gracious Friend,
And—O my soul awake!—
Did in pure love descend,
To die here for thy sake.
If thou canst get but thither,
There grows the flower of Peace,
The Rose that cannot wither,
Thy fortress, and thy ease.
Leave then thy foolish ranges,
For none can thee secure,
But One, who never changes,
Thy God, thy life, thy cure.

HENRY VAUGHAN.

LET not the hearts whose sorrow cannot call
This Christmas merry, slight the festival;
Let us be merry that may merry be,
But let us not forget that many mourn;
The smiling Baby came to give us glee,
But for the weepers was the Saviour
born.

H. COLERIDGE.

Was it a fancy bred of vagrant guess,
Or well-remember'd fact—that He was born
When half the world was wintry and forlorn,
In Nature's utmost season of distress?
And did the simple earth indeed confess
Its destitution and its craven need,
Wearing the white and penitential
weed,
Meet symbol of judicial barrenness?

So be it: for in truth 'tis ever so,
That when the winter of the soul is bare
The seed of heaven at first begins to grow,
Peeping abroad in desert of despair.

H. COLERIDGE.

ALMIGHTY and everlasting God, who dost govern all things in heaven and earth, mercifully hear the supplications of Thy people, and grant us Thy peace all the days of our life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

GRANT, O Lord, that in this time of anxiety and distress we may walk worthy of our Christian profession.
Grant unto us all that we may be united in one heart and mind to bear the burdens which this War has laid upon us. Help us to respond to the call of our country according to our several powers. Put far from us selfish indifference to the needs of others, and enable us by patient continuance in well-doing to glorify Thy name. Amen.

Christmas Verse.

COME TO THE CRADLE!

"COME, Kings, to the Cradle,
And ring your Christ around,
For Herod's men draw near again
To curse with blood the ground!"
Alas, the Kings are playing,
They follow their ancient plan,
And ever the same is the royal game—
Slaying the Sons of Man.

"Haste, Kings, to the Cradle,
And beat the heathen down;
The Roman comes with a roll of drums,
And a cross, and a thorny crown!"
Alas, the Kings are Christians;
They swear that the Gospel's true,
While millions die on their Calvary—
And what would the heathen do?

Come, come to the Cradle,
Shepherds of Bethlehem;
The oaths of Kings are idle things,
Enough of the Kings and them!
Enough, for hearts are breaking,
And blood doth curse the ground;
Up, in your might, for home and right,
And ring your Christ around!

THEIR SONGS WERE MORE THAN MUSIC.

WE miss the lads who made our Christmas
bright
With merry speech and open-hearted
jest;
To revel in their laughter was delight,
Goodwill their guide and guest.

Their songs were more than music, as the day
Is more than sunshine; every note and word
Revealed a secret in their happy play
Beyond the seen and heard.

O joy of youth! How fair and pure it seems!
Faith offering promise in the time to come
To make realities of visions, dreams,
And earth the attractive home.

Came then the harsh, tyrannic crash of strife.
Dreams! Visions!....Duty sent her clarion call:
"Honour the bond. A nation needs your life;
In honour stand or fall."

We could no other. God in His good grace
Give us a heart of wisdom that we see
Our nearest, dearest, lift the human race
In holy loyalty.

A passion for the urgent call of peace
Possess the souls of our aspiring youth;
The cry of justice nerve them, and increase
Their reverence for the truth.

Men, noble men, are eager for the hour
When righteous brotherhood shall rule
all lands,
Harmoniously advancing in its power,
Love waiting its commands.

WE miss the lads who made our Christmas
bright
With merry speech and open-hearted
jest;
Their songs were more than music and delight....

O God! Thou knowest best.

J. L. HAIGH.

Not yet upon the lap of earth
Peace and Goodwill abide:
A sword still pierces Mary's soul
At merrie Christmas-tide.

Our peace is at the tossing helm,
Old England's weal's aboard:
O, Mary, mother, must thy soul
Know only Cross and sword!

CHRISTMAS CAROLS.

THE word carol is generally derived from the French carole, the joyous song accompanied by a dance which was greatly in fashion both in the homes of the gentry and the common people during the Middle Ages. It can trace its origin much further back than that, however, for in St. Owen's 'Life of St. Eligius, Bishop of Noyon,' which dates from about the year 672, it is mentioned and placed among the things that are forbidden, the list also comprising "balls, dances, or diabolical songs." Human nature, in some of its aspects, does not change very much, and after many centuries the reforming zeal of the Puritans in England once more tried to repress the revelries and merry-makings which had intruded even into religious festivals. Carols on Saints' Days were prohibited, and even the Nativity itself was regarded less from the dramatic standpoint than as a scheme of salvation. The Puritans are hardly to be blamed, for anything more antagonistic to their usual habits of thought and conduct than some of the carols of the day, whether in the form of adaptations of old love-songs or mystical compositions with a distinctly "Popish" flavour, can hardly be imagined; but it is, unfortunately, true that their prohibition discouraged for a very long time the use of music as a means of religious expression, and stopped the sources of inspiration which produced such a wealth of lyric poetry in mediæval times.

As an illustration of the purely secular character of the carol when it first spread over Europe, and became a popular feature at Christmas entertainments and other popular festivals, a story narrated by Giraldus Cambrensis in his 'Gemma Ecclesiastica' may be mentioned. He is describing the story of a wake in a churchyard (churchyards were frequently used for these song-and-dance parties!) somewhere in Worcestershire. The revelry went on so long, and the dancers sang one refrain over and over so many times, that the unfortunate priest who was kept awake with it all night could not get it out of his head in the morning, but repeated it at the Mass—saying (instead of "Dominus vobiscum") "Sweet Heart, have pity"! Ben Jonson, in 'Christmas his Masque,' presents a carol "in a long tawny coat, with a red cap and a flute at his girdle, his torch-bearer carrying a song-book open; and Wassail, like a neat sempster and songster, her page bearing a brown bowl dressed with ribands and rosemary before her."

It is rather curious to read in Miss Edith Rickert's introduction to her collection of 'Ancient English Christmas Carols' that "Carol-writing was a part of the great fourteenth-century movement of the middle classes in England, of the stir towards democracy," for the social struggle of our own day has found little expression in popular lyric poetry, and modern carol-writers seem to aim more at imitations of the old style in archaic phraseology than at new forms of expression embodying the modern spirit. The Christmas carols which appeal to us most are, of course, those which have for their central theme the birth of the Infant Jesus and the maternal love of the Virgin Mary. These often take the form of lullabies, full of tenderness and charm—sometimes not without a brooding sense of tragedy and the shadow of the cross. The Countess Martinengo-Cesaresco quotes one of the best examples of this particular type in her 'Essays in the Study of Folk-Songs,' and the following verses convey something of the note of mingled sorrow and triumph which dominates the poem throughout:—

Why dost thou weep, my Babe? alas!
Cold winds that pass

Vex, or is't the little ass?

Lullaby, O Paradise;

Of my heart

Though Saviour art;

On Thy face I press a kiss.

Wouldst thou learn so speedily,

Pain to try,

To heave a sigh?

Sleep, for thou shalt see the day

Of dire scath,

Of dreadful death,

To bitter scorn and shame a prey....

Sleep, sleep, thou who dost heaven impart

My Lord thou art;

Sleep, as I press thee to my heart.

Poor the place where thou dost lie,

Earth's loveliest!

Yet take thy rest;

Sleep, my child, and lullaby.

This version was communicated to the writer above-mentioned by a resident at Vallauria, in the heart of the Ligurian Alps. In that district it is sung in the churches on Christmas Eve.

THE MORAL STIMULUS OF THE WAR.

SIR,—Some of your readers seem to look upon this war as a punishment. Well, it may be, but to me it seems more like an inspiration, a new birth, terrible, indeed, as birth and death are apt to be, but, like them, opening on to fuller, nobler life. Day by day we feel ourselves growing mentally and spiritually. No longer are our thoughts centred round our own petty interests. We had taught ourselves to believe that only adepts could serve the State, and that the chief duty of a good citizen was to pay his taxes cheerfully—meritorious, perhaps, but exceedingly uninspiring. Then came the call, "Your country needs you," and gladly and proudly we answered it. Many of us gave our lives, many have given our nearest and dearest. The war has called out the best that is in us: faithfulness, generosity, courage, self-sacrifice. Certainly these qualities must have been there before they could come out, but there is all the difference in the world between the sun hidden in fog and the same sun shining in noonday splendour.—Yours, &c.,

LUCKY E. ROBERTS.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE SPADE AS TEACHER.

AMONG the lines of advancing knowledge to-day that which is pursued by the excavator of ancient sites is certainly as valuable as it is romantic. To lay bare the veritable relics of generations that lived thousands of years ago, to discover their usages—domestic, commercial, military, and religious—and to become possessed, not only of their works of art, but also in some cases their literature, is to deepen the historic consciousness in many fruitful ways. That we have precious legacies of tradition preserved in the classic writers is clear, but that they gain immensely by archaeological confirmation and enlargement is no less obvious; and in many cases they have received much necessary correction. During the past twenty or thirty years the rate of progress in this direction has been far greater than ever before. No one conversant with the facts will undervalue the services rendered by earlier explorers; but in these days the methods pursued are much more systematic than they could well adopt, while the resources available, thanks to the formation of learned societies in many European centres, as well as in the United States, have been sufficient for long and extensive operations, even if there is still need for generously increased support.

Future generations will reap the harvest of present spade-work in a more balanced and adequate view of human developments than we have yet attained, and immensely truer to fact than the fanciful pictures familiar to our predecessors. To many of us the interest of the development of religion takes the lead; and, debtors as we are to the Jewish-Christian system of thought and practice, it is inevitable that we should attach supreme importance to whatever throws light upon its origins and growth. The Nile Valley has gladdened the lover of Greek by yielding in our day classical works which had been thought to be lost for ever; but much wider and intenser has been the interest created by its surprising contributions to our knowledge of early Christian literature. In the Holy Land itself, as I had opportunity to point out some time ago, excavation has been extensive in recent years; and while, contrary to Egypt, it has not hitherto given us much script, it has added greatly to our knowledge of the conditions of the country and its peoples before and during the Jewish settlement and monarchies.

A book dealing with Babylon,* and comparable to Macalister's exhaustive account of Gezer, has just appeared in an English translation, and demands the attention of all who are interested in Bible story. It gives a record of work carried on from 1899 and still in progress when the original German edition went to press in 1912. The author, Robert Koldewey, who has directed the operations from the start, has from time to time reported progress, but the present volume gives the first survey of results as a whole. The book is copiously illustrated, some of the coloured pictures of enamelled brickwork being particularly fine, and the photographs are, as a rule, admirably clear. The only complaint to make in this regard is that the reduction of the plans in several cases has rendered necessary the use of a fairly strong lens to follow the index references. The translation (by Agnes S. Johns) has been rather a difficult piece of work, owing to the numerous technical terms involved in the architectural descriptions. One reader at least who was now and again pulled up by the German expressions tenders here his thanks to Mrs. Johns, whose learned husband appends a useful note to the book. The inexperienced, it may be confessed, will very likely find some of the detailed descriptions of walls, and doorways, and drains, and ramps, and revetments, &c., rather dry reading; but Herr Koldewey really seems to have the popular mind in view, and, at any rate, from time to time lights up his account with touches of the picturesque, and supplies useful summaries.

It is generally known that the site of Babylon has been for many centuries marked by huge mounds, mostly without external signs of the buildings whose ruins they cover. Into these mounds, burrowed tentatively by marauders for centuries and by explorers for decades, a regiment of 200 to 250 diggers, armed with pick and spade, have now made their way, the debris being carried in baskets to a spot judged to be of small importance. The vast work involved is best appreciated on looking at the photographs, which reveal massive structures on a scale little known in our Western world. These structures, consisting of fortifications, citadels, palaces, and temples, are usually made of brick, either burnt or raw, though stone is sometimes found, especially in the pavements. Upon many of the blocks inscriptions are impressed or cut, recording the names of the monarchs by whom the respective works were accomplished. These royal builders are traceable by the inscriptions as far back as Hammurabi—dated by the author variously 2500 B.C. (p. 311) and 2250 B.C. (p. 228); M. Jastrow, jun., brings him later still by two or three centuries. It is noteworthy that the oldest remains are those of the modest city dwellers, who built on low-levels like their dim predecessors, the flint implement men.

When the Assyrian conquerors of the eighth and seventh century B.C. held the city, among other works the great temple of Esagila, sacred to Marduk, was raised to great magnificence, and a fine long Procession Street was paved for ceremonial purposes. "With Nebuchadnezzar (604-561) began the colossal rebuilding of the entire city with the restoration of" at least six temples and the famous tower of Babylon. "He restored the Arachtu wall, constructed the earliest stone bridge over the Euphrates at Amran, the canal Libil-higalla, that flowed round the Kasr [Acropolis] on the north, east, and south; completed the Southern Citadel with his palace, and enlarged it towards the north in three successive extensions, in which the Procession Street was heightened and paved with stone, and the Ishtar Gate [a colossal structure] acquired its latest form, while both were decorated with the coloured enamelled frieze of animals. He built a new castle far out on the north, and surrounded the city which he had enlarged in this fashion with the great outer city wall"—which, however, would seem to have been about a fifth of the length assigned to it by Herodotus, and was even so about thirteen miles in circuit (square).

If we please, we may picture the Jewish captives gazing with awestruck faces upon these monuments of their captor's magnificence, though, pace Herr Koldewey, we shall probably not see Daniel walking along the Procession Street. He takes us to the splendid throne-room where, no doubt, the imagination of the Jewish writer fixed the scene of the writing on the wall that startled Belshazzar, and also shows us the poor remains of that mighty King who may have been Sardanapalus himself. But space fails for commentary. Let us hope the author's diggings will still go on; there is much still to explore, and the correlation of all these discoveries will be one of the tasks of peace.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF IRELAND. By John Campbell, M.A. M.D. Belfast: Mayne, Boyd & Son, Ltd. 1s. 6d. net in cloth; 1s. net in paper.

DR. JOHN CAMPBELL has written an admirable sketch of the history of the section of Irish Presbyterianism known as Non-Subscribing. Almost confined to Ulster, and holding Unitarian opinions, this group of churches has passed through a stormy period of ostracism and persecution, but has recently shown sufficient vitality to organize and consolidate its forces. Not the least interesting of Dr. Campbell's pages are devoted to an account of the way in which traditional methods of Presbyterian government have been applied to a church which is liberal in temper and resolute in its refusal to accept any obligatory standards of belief. Lack of cohesion has been a fatal weakness to liberal movements in religion in the past, and this experiment in a controlled freedom is one full of interest. "The Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church [Dr. Campbell writes] is at present well organized without any formal statement of doctrine; its financial position is steadily improving, and, more important than anything else, its constitution is drawn up in such terms as to give the effect of a Christian moral creed. This leaves ministers and teachers free to lay special stress on morals, and to devote their foremost attention to the cultivation of character, in the belief that true Christianity is the highest expression of the divine in humanity." In this attempt to combine doctrinal tolerance with loyalty to the commandments of Christ it is true to the Scottish Confession of 1560, in which the following remarkable words occur: "We ought not sa meikle to luke what men before us have said or done, as unto that quihilk the Haly Ghaist speaks within the body of the Scriptures, and unto that quihilk Christ Jesus himselve did and commanded to be done." This practical spirit was banished in most places by the dogmatic arrogance of the Westminster Confession; but it survived for a long time in the North of Ireland, and the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church is its lineal heir. Dr. Campbell writes with fairness, and is at no pains to conceal some of the blunders of the past. At the same time, there is no suppression of his strong personal affection for the church of his fathers, or of the opinions which he holds with a characteristic Puritan rigour upon denominational policy.

RELIGION AS AFFECTED BY MODERN SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY. By Stanley A. Mellor, B.A., Ph.D. London: at the Lindsey Press. 2s. net.

DR. MELLOR'S book has the distinction of being one of the first attempts, if it is not actually the first, to popularize the new attitude of Science towards Religion. A great change has come over the situation. Science no longer professes to hold the key to all the mysteries and reduce everything to atoms. In Dr. Mellor's words: "As the great century of science drew to its close, the first proud claims of science were silenced, and it began to be said that the function of science was not to explain the wonders of life, but to describe them." Teachers like Prof. Karl Pearson and Prof. J. Arthur Thomson, and a number of Continental physicists, have convinced us that science "does not deal with ultimate truth: it is descriptive and not explanatory. Causation, for science, is simply a convenient method of description. It is a way of serving the great scientific ideal of order and system." And causation is not interpreted by modern science as an iron law or an implacable destiny, in the sense that everything in experience is fatally necessitated by its cause. Materialism, Naturalism, and the mechanical view of Nature, which once upon a time were put forward as the true philosophy of science, are now admitted to be question-begging opinions. Dr. Mellor does good service in setting forth these conclusions at some length, for they cannot as yet be said to have found their way from learned books into the newspapers and ordinary knowledge. Equally interesting is Dr. Mellor's statement of the present position of religious belief in the light of modern philosophy. While he decides that "science cannot set religion on one side," he also finds that "philosophy on the whole supports the verdict of faith." "The weight of modern philosophical opinion is on the side of an ultimately religious view of life." Readers will probably appraise most highly those portions of the book in which the present situation in philosophy is reviewed with all the writer's well-known competence in these matters. Very informing and illuminating are the sections on Bergson and William James, and, perhaps most of all, James Ward. It is all so well done, and so fairly done, that we have no right to complain if the argument has a remarkable way of turning out to the advantage of that philosophical sect of which Dr. Mellor himself is so doughty an adherent. But is it to this particular count that we are to set down the somewhat colourless and negative character of the "religion" which the book contemplates throughout? Dr. Mellor's Science, and his Philosophy, are both much more satisfying realities than his Religion, which is "the faith that the ultimate meaning of the universe is spiritual, expressible in terms of absolute truth, beauty, and goodness, formulated possibly as belief in the being of God." When we take this "possibly" in conjunction with the non-committal attitude on Immortality, and the statement that "Religion is above all a present experience, something to be possessed here and now, and without future reference," we feel that "Science and Philosophy" are still allowed to domineer over the whole field, and Religion is made to talk with bated breath in the presence of such dignities. Faith, we are told, "seems to be concerned with probabilities rather than with certainties." Not so has the world learnt Faith from its great Masters. The trouble here is a narrowly intellectualist view, which too sharply contrasts knowledge as something certain and explicit, with faith as something vague and inexpressible. And this defect might have been remedied if Dr. Mellor's "Religion" had allowed itself to be sustained by the rich collective tradition of the Christian Church. But this is precluded by his severely individualist attitude, which makes personal intuition the sole organ of religious knowledge.

LABOUR SONGS By Dorothea Hollins.
Keighley: Wadsworth & Co. 1s. net.

THE readers of THE INQUIRER are familiar with the work of Miss Hollins's pen, and will welcome the little collection of 'Labour Songs' in which she has enshrined the hope of democracy and the love of peace and brotherhood which are her chief inspiration. A reproduction of Millet's 'Angelus' on the cover gives the key-note to the verses which follow. It reminds us that the proudest empires are established upon the toil, the patience, and the poverty of the poor, which is exactly what Miss Hollins desires. She cares more, indeed, about showing where her sympathies lie than about writing good poetry; but this does not mean that her songs are not tuneful, or that they lack the genuine lyrical quality. It is the thought of what "the People" endure to-day, and what they may hope for to-morrow, that fills her mind continually, and in such poems as 'A Great Love and Much Serving' (a tribute to Margaret E. Macdonald), 'The Mother's Song,' 'Charles Reilly,' and 'A Labour Woman's Cradle Song,' she expresses it with appealing simplicity. There is a little group of war poems at the end of the book which emphasizes the discordant note in all the music we make this Christmas-time, and deepens the shadow which clings to the lives of the poor till its greyness almost hides the face of beauty where we need her most. Miss Hollins and other poets of the Labour Movement must emerge from this night of sorrow before they can sing the advent songs of true democracy.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

WHILE SHEPHERDS WATCHED.

In fields the shepherds watched their sheep,

For they would shield from harm
The weakest little lamb that bleats
At night upon the farm.

There rose a Star o'er Bethlehem,
And 'neath a lowly stall
With ox and ass the shepherds found
The infant-Lord of all.

Two thousand years have come and gone,
And still the tale is told
Of one wee babe in Bethlehem
Born when the nights were cold.

Good Shepherd of the folded sheep,
And Guide of souls astray,
Thou who wast once a little child,
O feed thy lambs to-day.

H. H. JOHNSON.

THE OLD FIRE SCREEN.

ABOUT fifty years ago a gentleman bought an old fire screen at a sale in Bridgenorth in Shropshire. He took it home; it was very large and dull and dingy, and though it had seemed worth buying when he had seen it in the old house it came from, he was not at all sure of it when he got it home. He put it in front of the fire, which was blazing merrily in the grate, and it was so large and so dingy that it not only hid the fire, but made a great dull shadow fall eerily over the room. Besides—and this was, perhaps, worse—as the fire-light shone dully through the thick stuff it was made of, there seemed to be two great eyes staring out of the middle, and this frightened the children.

"My dear," said his wife decidedly, "you must give it away. However you came to buy such a kill-joy I really don't know."

But the little girl saved it. She had stayed at home that day instead of going out with her brothers, and whilst her mother was busy, she had crept into the front room to look at the new screen. The eyes had fascinated her; somehow she could not believe that it was as dingy and fearful as it looked. She turned it round so that the light from the window fell full upon it, and then looking at it closely she found to her surprise that the eyes were indeed there, but so grave and gentle in expression that she knew that it was only the fire-light that had made them seem fierce. There was the trace, too, of a forehead, and a strong firm face. Oh, decidedly, the old screen was quite interesting.

"I believe if I cleaned it a bit," said the little girl, "it would look much less frightening. Perhaps it is quite beautiful when you see it as it really first was."

So she asked her mother's permission, and spent a long two hours cleaning the old screen. But the time seemed to fly as more and more of the strong, grave face came into view, and the gentle eyes seemed to say, "Thank you, little girl; some day when you know who I am you will be glad, perhaps, that you saved me for your own home."

And when her mother came to call her to dinner she could hardly tear herself away. "Oh, just a moment, mother, dear," she pleaded, "I have found some writing at the bottom of the screen; I believe it will be her name. I do so want to know."

But it took a long time to read what was there, and it was not until her father came home that she could make it all clear. At last, however, the secret was discovered. A fine heroic old face, and a strong dignified bearing belonged to this handsome old lady who stood before them on the screen. Underneath ran her name thus:—

"Dame Penderel, Anno Dom. 1662." And they were all not very much wiser at first.

"Who was she, father?" asked the little girl.

"Well," said the father, "I can guess. Don't you remember how King Charles II. after the battle of Worcester had to hide all up and down the West Country before he could escape to France, and how for a little time he was roaming about close to Bridgenorth with a faithful follower named Richard Penderel, trying to cross the Severn into Wales? The ferries over the river were, however, too well watched by the Cromwellian troops, and so Charles had to double back into hiding, taking shelter where he could, and at a very critical time finding a refuge at Boscobel House, not far from Bridgenorth, and, when the troops came to search the house, finding a hiding-place in the great oak near by. The house at that time belonged to this old lady's son, William Penderel, who lived there in great poverty with his mother and his wife. His four brothers, Richard, Humphrey, John, and George, all knew of the King's hiding-place, and though for them all one word of betrayal would have meant instant reward and surprising wealth, whilst the penalty for sheltering him would be certain death, not one of them proved disloyal, and so Charles escaped."

"Then she was a brave old lady, after all," said Fred.

"I think she was a heroine," said the little girl.

To mark the Diamond Jubilee of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, a record of its history from 1854-1914 is being published by Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes. The foundation and early growth of the College afford interesting illustrations of the general state of culture, and of the intellectual life of Manchester in the middle of the nineteenth century, while its whole development and its influence on the spread of Unitarianism constitute an important feature in the history of liberal religion in Great Britain and Ireland. Numerous portraits and views of local kindred institutions are included in the volume.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

WOMEN'S SERVICE AND THE WAR.

An excellent report has been issued by the Women's Service Branch of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, which was organised within a week of the War, a unanimous decision having been arrived at that all political work must be suspended, and that the energies of the members should be devoted to meeting the immediate needs of their country. It is a record of efficient work of which the Union will always have reason to be proud; indeed, there seems to be no field of charitable activity in connection with the War which it does not cover. Since the opening of the Central Clearing House in Victoria Street over 1,300 voluntary workers have been registered, and helpers have been supplied to no fewer than 293 organisations and individual applicants, including Belgian Refugee Committees, clubs under the Junior Advisory Committee, L.C.C., the Charity Organisation Society, the National Union of Girls' Clubs, and Maternity Centres. Local Clearing Houses have been opened in different parts of London, and the organisers in Battersea, Edmonton, Hammersmith, and Lambeth were appointed Hon. Secretaries to the Women's Work Committees, and were largely responsible for the drawing up of the schemes for work accepted by the authorities administering the Queen's Fund. Gifts of all kinds have been distributed to hospitals at home and abroad, to Belgian hostels, factories, workrooms and clothing depôts for the London poor, in addition to soldiers and sailors, men interned in Holland, and non-combatants in distress at home. The Society is, of course, also represented on most of the Municipal Relief Committees, and in one busy part of London a highly successful Employment Exchange for Day Domestic Workers, with nine centres in the neighbourhood, has been established.

An interesting branch of these numerous activities has been the assistance of Belgian refugees. On the eve of the arrival of the first batch the Society agreed to undertake their official registration, and to provide French and Flemish speaking interpreters. As the number of refugees increased the responsibility of this work became very great, and 150 interpreters were actively employed, while registration at the various centres continued, day after day, from 8.30 to 12 at night. When the charge of these visitors to our shores was taken over by the Government, the system of registration which the Society had evolved was approved and adopted without alteration. Hostels for Belgians have been opened in various districts, and the Fulham Branch has undertaken the organisation of regular entertainments for the refugees in the Government hostel at Earl's Court.

The needs of the wounded have not been neglected. Many members have taken part in the organisation of Red Cross work, and the Society has been enabled to present a London Suffragist Motor Ambulance to the War Office, to endow a bed in the new King George Hospital for Soldiers, and equip two beds in the National Union of Women Suffrage Societies' Scottishwomen's Hospital for the Continent. A very large number of members have busied themselves specially in the opening of clubs for the wives of soldiers and sailors, and to others the needs of the mothers and infants have made the most urgent appeal. Enterprises of a more far-reaching character are the Women's Patriotic Club, which is about to be opened by the Willesden Branch, and a Social and Educational Club for Women to be opened in Bow by the East London Branches immediately after Christmas. The Willesden Branch, with the cordial support of the local military authorities, is holding weekly concerts for soldiers camping in the district; the Fulham and Hammersmith Branches are organising the collection of overcoats for recruits from East London who have not yet received their uniforms; and the Hampstead Branch is hoping to open a coffee-room for soldiers exercising on the Heath who at present are obliged to take their midday meal in public-houses.

This is by no means an exhaustive summary of the various efforts that are being made in connection with the Women's Service scheme, but it is sufficient to indicate their variety and scope, and the zeal with which the duties of citizenship on a scale hitherto unprecedented have been taken up by women belonging to the Suffrage Movement.

THE YORKSHIRE DISTRICT.

To reprint the first page of the December Record of the three Sheffield churches would, perhaps, convey to your readers the most trustworthy information respecting the new energy which has taken possession of us all in this great county. On the part of the men there are added twelve names to the fifty-four already inscribed on the Roll of Honour as having given all to their country. On the part of the women, a United Sewing Meeting, which has already sent 1,218 garments to various war funds, gives evidence of extraordinary industry and interest; while among donations, such an item as that of 11s. 3d., realized by a little girl of 6 from "sale of tidies," shows how far extended is the enthusiasm to help. A "Whist Drive for the Benefit of the Funds" is proof that, seriously as the crisis is taken, there is no disposition to indulgence in melancholy.

Further on we read of two Congregational meetings to consider what should be done for the Belgian refugees, and the hiring of a large house and the loan of a cottage, of donations and weekly subscriptions ranging from 10s. to 1d., of classrooms given for their use, and a General Committee which meets every Wednesday. At Leeds the same spirit prevails, and from Church and School thirty-nine have enlisted, each one the priceless contribution of his family to carrying on the war. The Sewing Society, the Women's League, the Girls' Clubs are working steadily, and 300 pairs of socks had been knitted and disposed of by November 30. Vests, scarves, helmets, warm garments of every sort, clothing new and old, are brought in daily. Five houses have been given or hired for Belgian refugees. The large hall and buildings adjoining the Chapel are busy throughout, from the basement, where Belgians may be found engaged in making rugs, to the upper rooms, where a stranger entering by chance might think preparations were being made for a grand bazaar. These two congregations have at their disposal rooms and means and time and numbers which enable them to do more than would be possible for other churches; but the same spirit prevails everywhere, and ministers and people are, we believe, united in postponing all self-regarding activities to those which have for their high purpose the honour and defence of our country.

The death of the Rev. W. Rosling is a loss to his own congregation almost irreparable. He had led them out from their old home into the wilderness. They had worshipped with him over a stable, putting up with stable noises and odours—had, with him, joined themselves to strangers, and through the winningness of his manner and the trust he inspired obtained the funds wherewith to build themselves a church. For eight years he has taught and served them in the new home, and won the regard of us all. He was, indeed, a gentle-man, though roughly brought up, from 7 to 17 a farm lad, from 17 to 20 a miner. There would have been every excuse for him had he been as rough as he was genuine; but, in truth, he reminded one of the Christ, "Meek and lowly in heart," quiet in speech, and, like the Master, strong and determined. He came to our Annual Meeting in October with death in his face, and he knew it; could scarcely stand unaided; yet went on to Middlesbrough the same night to keep an engagement for the Sunday. He was to be reckoned chief among all of us ministers of the Union if service is the test of greatness, for, as was said at his funeral, he was ever ready to serve in any way asked of him, and spent himself to the last unit of energy in him. Such men leave after them a fragrance at once sweet and stimulating.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

A GREETING TO SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

MANY lists have been received at the office of the Sunday School Association at Essex Hall of teachers and scholars who are serving in the Army or Navy. The average number of men to each school represents a very fine response to the nation's call. The following letter of greeting has been sent to them by the President of the Association:—

DEAR COMRADE,—I am sending you just a few lines to convey the New Year's Greeting and Good Wishes of the Sunday School Association, of which I am this year the President. We thought that a message would be welcome from us, especially as several of our Sunday School centres are receiving letters from time to time from teachers and old scholars at the front and in the encampments, thus proving the strength of the association existing between them and their comrades at home. In some letters they speak of conduct and ideals that inspire them in the performance of their duty, and their determination to uphold in action the good name of the church and school to which they belong. Should the necessities of war bring you into the enemy's country how important these ideals will prove.

My letter will show you that we bear you in mind, and also that we recognise something of the hardships experienced and sacrifices made at our country's call. Deeply anxious as we all here are for the early success of our cause, we look forward to a success that shall secure a lasting peace, and that the time may come, and it surely will come, when on both sides we all may heartily echo Tiny Tim's wish in Dickens's 'Christmas Carol,' 'God bless us all, every one.'

Yours sincerely,
ION PRITCHARD,
President.

THE CENTENARY OF PEACE WITH AMERICA.

THE following letter has been addressed by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the President and the Directors of the American Unitarian Association, 25, Beacon Street, Boston, Mass., U.S.A. :—

DEAR BRETHREN IN THE FAITH,

We address you with deeply mingled feelings at this Centenary of Peace between your nation and ours. While profound thanksgiving ascends from our hearts to Almighty God, and while joy springs from our reverent remembrance of the many wise and good who have been His instruments in securing this priceless blessing for us and you, we are mourning with a grief beyond utterance the terrible calamity of War which has come upon us and our neighbours, a horror which stands out black and shameful against the fair record of Anglo-American relationship.

Knowing well that you share with us these conflicting emotions, alike the sense of triumph and of tragedy, we desire to clasp hands across the sea in mutual trust and fraternal affection; and now to consecrate ourselves with you again to the great task, which seems specially committed to our religious fellowship, of proclaiming practically and effectually the Brotherhood of Man, the underlying unity of all humankind.

In the discharge of that great task may we never grow weary, but dedicate to it our utmost powers of mind and soul, meeting all opposing obstacles with more than military courage, and seeking in its fulfilment a victory which all may share. And so, from generation to generation, may our children's children enjoy unbroken the amity in which we now gratefully rejoice, until, with the passing of the years, the very memory of strife between us fades into a dim antiquity.

Signed on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association,

J. F. L. BRUNNER, President.
HOWARD CHATFIELD CLARKE,
Treasurer.

W. G. TARRANT,
Chairman of Committee.

W. COPELAND BOWIE, Secretary.

December 18, 1914.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Lewes.—The Anniversary Services at Westgate Chapel were held on Sunday, December 13th, and were well attended. The preacher was the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, D.D. On Tuesday, the 15th, the annual Sale of Work was opened by the Mayoress of Lewes, who was accompanied by the Mayor (Councillor T. G. Roberts). Alderman Every presided, and nearly all the Nonconformist ministers of the town spoke a few kindly words. The Rev. Priestley Prime conveyed the good wishes of the Brighton congregation, several members of which were also present, as well as friends from Ditchling and elsewhere.

London: Essex Church.—On Sunday, December 27, the Rev. F. K. Freeston will close his long ministry of nearly twenty-two years at Essex Church. On Friday, the 18th inst., a Social Gathering was held in Lindsey Hall, attended by members of the congregation and a few of Mr. Freeston's old friends in the ministry. Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., expressed on behalf of the church their deep regret at Mr. Freeston's departure. They would miss the help of his sermons, which had grown in power and beauty as the years had gone by. He expressed the heartiest gratitude of the congregation for the work of twenty-two years, and their good wishes for the future. After a few cordial words from Mr. Charles Hawksley, Mr. Freeston replied in a speech of affectionate gratitude to his friends. Referring to his ministry, he said that he had never tried to play up to his personality, which was one of the besetting dangers of Nonconformity, and he had never regarded himself professionally. It had never been his desire to become a popular preacher. His business had been to quicken the spirit of true religion in the souls of men and the sense of eternal things amid the things of time. In all the work that they had tried to do at Essex Church they had recognised their duty to the neighbourhood in which they found themselves. After a tribute of gratitude to all the assistant ministers who had helped him during the past ten years, he commended his successor (the Rev. J. H. Weatherall) to the congregation, and urged them to recognise that they have precious things to offer to the world, and that, for that reason, they must make their church and minister known. A series of beautiful photographs of the interior of the church was presented to Mr. and Mrs. Freeston as a souvenir of the occasion.

Longsight, Manchester.—A successful concert was given in the Gaskell Hall on Friday, December 11th, on behalf of British wounded soldiers, for whom the ladies of the congregation have been working since September 23rd. About £25 was raised.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A CHAPLAIN'S WORK.

The following extract from a letter written by the Rev. Vivian Evans, chaplain at Versailles, author of 'The Soul of a Dog,' is quoted in The Animals' Friend :—

"When the war broke out the inhabitants left this town in hundreds, giving little or no thought to their poor animals; some shut their dogs and cats in their houses or in the gardens, but for the most part they turned them adrift in the streets. Wherever soldiers are bivouacked, poor half-starved dogs may now be seen gathered round asking for food. Be it said to his honour, the French soldier always spares them some. Some dogs, however, do not ask for food. It seems that they only wish to die. As many of these as possible I have taken to my house, hoping to find them homes after the war. The case of one large hound is very pathetic. He sat at the station waiting for his master who never came. I brought him food, but he would not eat. He got thinner every day, always expecting and searching every train with his great pathetic eyes for the creature so unworthy of so great a love. I could not stand the sight any longer, so I took him home."

An equally pathetic account of the forlorn condition of animals abandoned by their owners when fleeing from their homes is given by a soldier in the 1st East Lancashire Regiment :—

"Having fought at Mons and the retreat to within a few miles of Paris [he says] our regiment had the satisfaction of saving a large number of dogs that had been forgot by their owners that had to leave their homes in a hurry and move for safety, and some of them had forgot their dogs. We had several of them follow us all through our trying time, and it would teach some of the so-called City 'Aid' Society a lesson if they could see them in the firing line with us. It was a common sight to see them lick their new owners' hands and faces and lying between our legs; they shared the same danger as us, and several of them got killed one way or another. You could not help, whilst lying there, wondering what your own dog would do, that you had brought up and taught to do your bidding."

'THE ECHO OF THE ARNO.'

The title adopted by Signor Conte, of the Free Believers' Association, for the occasional bulletin which he is publishing in order to make the work of this Society known to friends in England and America, has a pleasant sound, though it does not indicate very clearly the object for which the little paper was started. Only the need of money, apparently, prevents Signor Conte from publishing it regularly, as a sort of supplement to La Riforma Italiana, a monthly magazine which has now entered upon the fourth year of its existence. The Echo of the Arno sets forth the reasons why the members of the Association decided to call themselves free believers rather than free thinkers, a title which in Italy, as in other countries, is chiefly adopted by those who disavow any kind of religious faith, and emphasizes the need for spiritual and intellectual development within the various churches rather than the separation of those who hold to the essentials of Christianity by denominational barriers. A useful branch of the work in Florence is the Brotherhood Club, which aims at promoting a cordial relationship between the people of Anglo-Saxon origin and Italians, and desires to be of service in every possible way to visitors from abroad ignorant of the laws, customs, and language of Italy, and to co-operate in the diffusion of more enlightened ideals of civic and religious reform.

WOMAN AND WAR.

The chapter on 'Woman and War' from 'Woman and Labour,' by Olive Schreiner, has been republished at an opportune moment by Mr. Fisher Unwin in the form of a booklet, price 6d. Mrs. Schreiner, as is well known, claims all labour as the province of women when they have been properly educated and trained; but she holds that by reason of woman's special function as the mother of the race, she is pre-eminently fitted to be a peacemaker, and that her opposition to war, and her hatred of its destructiveness, is based on a deeper instinct than that which dominates man. Given the power of control she believes that women will never carelessly throw in men's bodies "to fill up the gaps in human relationships made by international ambitions and greeds"; but, perhaps, she errs a little in assuming that the average woman, great as her anguish must be when she is called upon to sacrifice husband or brother or son on the battlefield, has, as yet, fully realized how vast is the responsibility laid upon her in regard to the promotion of peace.

* * *

It is, however, true, as Olive Schreiner points out, "that from the loftiest standpoint, the condemnation of war which has arisen in the advancing human spirit" is in no sense the outcome of the woman's point of view alone. "The man and the woman alike, who with Isaiah on the hills of Palestine, or the Indian Buddha under his bo-tree, have seen the essential unity of all sentient life; and who, therefore, see in war but a symptom of that crude dis-co-ordination of life on earth, not yet at one with itself, which affects humanity in these early stages of its growth, and who are compelled to regard as the ultimate goal of the race, though yet, perhaps, far distant across the ridges of innumerable coming ages, that harmony between all forms of conscious life metaphorically prefigured by the ancient Hebrew when he cried, 'The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them!'—to that individual, whether man or woman, who has reached this standpoint, there is no need for enlightenment from the instincts of the child bearers as such; their condemnation of war rising not so much from the fact that it is a wasteful destruction of human flesh, as that it is an indication of the non-existence of that co-ordination, the harmony which is summed up in the cry, 'My little children, love one another.'"

A TEMPERANCE ALMANACK.

The War Almanack published by the United Kingdom Alliance at 1d. is mainly devoted to the subject of alcohol and the War. The present time affords one of the best opportunities which temperance reformers have ever had of enforcing their principles, and the appeal which they are making to the patriotic spirit has been effectively backed up by Lord Roberts, Lord Kitchener, Sir John Jellicoe, Sir Ian Hamilton, Surgeon-General Evatt, and other well-known military and naval men whose words, for the moment, have more weight than those of medical practitioners or scientists. The Czar's prohibition of the sale of vodka in Russia, and the great benefits which have resulted from his welcome edict, together with Lord Kitchener's appeal to the public not to treat the men who have joined the colours, have brought home the drink evil to many thousands of people who have hitherto given no support to the war which is being waged against it, and the Alliance Almanack, if it gets into their hands, will certainly help to complete their conversion to the temperance cause. The statistics supplied are in themselves convincing, and will be very useful for purposes of reference and quotation.

THE MILITARY AND EARLIER CLOSING.

An important extension of the powers of the Military authorities was recently reported in The Morning Advertiser. Our contemporary states that among the regulations issued under the Defence of the Realm Act is the following, which specially applies to "The Trade," and which gives very wide powers to the naval and military authorities in other than "defended" districts: "The competent naval or military authorities may by order require all or any premises licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor within any area specified in the order to be closed, except during such hours and for such purposes as may be specified in the order, either generally or as respects the members of any of His Majesty's forces mentioned in the order, and if the holder of the licence in respect of any such premises fails to comply with the order, he shall be guilty of an offence under these regulations, and the competent naval or military authority may cause such steps to be taken as may be necessary to enforce compliance with the order."

EARLY CLOSING IN LONDON.

The figures given at the beginning of this month by the Chairman of the London Sessions, Mr. Robert Wallace, K.C., as to cases of "wounding" coming before him during the present year were a most remarkable testimony to the value of the early closing measures in the London area. In the first nine months of this year 103 cases of that kind were sent for trial—an average of nearly twelve a month. In September the cases rose to seventeen a month. In that month the 11 o'clock closing order was made, and the result was that in the following month the cases fell to five. In October the closing hour was made 10 o'clock, and the cases fell to two a month. At the present session, for almost the first time in the history of the county, there was not a single case of the kind for trial. These figures are extremely striking. "Wounding" cases, as the learned judge said, "invariably take place in the early hours of the morning, when the parties are drunk." Such cases are a far more reliable index of drunkenness than convictions for drunkenness, as they do not in any sense depend on the whim of the policeman. We hope the Government will note the inference which Mr. Wallace draws from the facts: "I trust the lessons which this War is teaching, and the experience we derive from it, will have effect in after legislation."
